Mr. William Busfeild Ferrand has the honour of representing the town of Knaresborough, and we have this week done ourselves the honour of representing him. Though he is just now one of the men whose names float on the stream of political conversation, he has not attained the print-shop level of popularity ; and we have therefore thought it our duty to anticipate the picture of him, which we feel certain will appear in next season's exhibition, in the orthodox attitude of a senator, which is as well known as the pattern pose for Colonels and Field Marshals. In his case, in addition to the usual accessories, we would suggest a bale of "paste-stiffened" calico at his feet, and a view of a "tommy shop" in perspective ; for great men ought always to be surrounded with the insignia of their greatness ; and on these foundations has the honourable member built his present fame. His reputation was rather suddenly acquired : like Jonah's gourd, it was the growth of a single night ; and like that, too, it will be but of short duration ; for if ever a man by one speech talked himself up into notoriety, and in every succeeding one seemed to have no object but to talk himself down into contempt, the member for Knaresborough is that individual. He certainly surprised the House in his first essay : no one could imagine that such recklessness of assertion could co-exist with such inability to support it by proof ; and his coarseness of manner was, in the excitement of the moment, mistaken for strength. He appealed to many latent prejudices, certainly existing but as certainly concealed, which prevail among a strong party in the house ; and his unqualified denunciations of all the manufacturers of the country seduced the more unguarded gentlemen of the agricultural interest into vehement cheers. He remained unanswered for a time, only to make the reply more crushing and complete when it did come ; and the silence of the parties attacked was construed into inability to answer the charges. For three days or more the lately obscure member for Knaresborough was a parliamentary lion, with a mane and tail of the first magnitude ; his name stood printed in leaders of great length and weight ; it was heard at the clubs, repeated at Bellamy's, and re-echoed in the lobbies ; party thought it had found a new weapon, and Mr. Ferrand was looked on as the two-edged sword wherewith the landed giant was to slay the hydra of the corn-law league. Party, however, was deceived ; the blade lacked fineness of edge, and was sadly deficient in temper ; they wielded it for a short time, but it cut nothing but their own fingers. When the rebound came, the fall was as rapid as the rise. The gentleman had "protested too much," and those who had cheered him the loudest were now the most cautiously mute : he signally failed to meet the reply of those he had accused ; and his numerous letters from nameless working men, in unknown factories, all containing a flaming compliment to Mr. Ferrand, went for nothing. The member for Knaresborough was dropped as an unsafe man. Every effort he has made since has increased the general feeling against him—nor is it to be wondered at. He is deficient in matter, for he takes but one view of a subject, and that the worst ; while his manner has nothing to recommend it. The cool but cutting speeches of Sir R. Peel and Sir J. Graham have completed his overthrow ; Mr. Ferrand is an extinguished politician. Truly may it be said, that in him a good cause has found a bad advocate.

His motives are, we doubt not, sincere ; his energy never abates, and he appears to act under the impulse of strong feeling ; it is a pity he cannot subject it to the rein, for it needs no spur. He is most effective when dealing with the administration of the poor-laws ; he produces bitter evidence, which his experience as a chairman of a board of guardians has enabled him to do. The contrast he drew between the statements of Dr. Kay before he was made an assistant-commissioner, and his actions afterwards, was complete ; nor was it answered. Yet the slaves of the factory system, and the victims of the new poor-law, may alike, while gratified for his intentions, regret that his manner has not been more calculated to serve them effectually.

In person the honourable gentleman is not prepossessing ; his figure and face, though not bulky, have something coarse about them ; there seems to be a continual and unamiable scowl upon his countenance, as if he was pondering the possibility of condemning the poor-law commissioners to three months of their own dietary, or of grinding the leaders of the corn-law league to "devil's dust," in the machinery of their own mills. Were we possessed of such a physiognomy, we should, in any unfortunate conjuncture of circumstances, earnestly pray that our jury might not be believers in Lavater. He is of rather pale complexion, with brown hair, and whiskers which surround his visage like a fringe ; his figure and presence denote the possession of enough physical energy, to render hopeless any attempt to put him down by those ingenious processes so well known to the House. But his oratory will never win attention. His is emphatically the "Erskes' vein," and he gesticulates with a clenched fist. He never gets through a speech without "challenging" this gentleman, and "defying" that : this is either from bad temper or bad taste ; but from whatever it arises, it is singularly ineffective. With no assembly of men is it so useless to attempt a bullying tone as the English House of Commons ; and they have the least possible sympathy with the "come-curse me Jacob, and defy me Israel" sort of style which Mr. Ferrand uniformly adopts.

Of his private life we know nothing ; his public career has been brief and not brilliant. He is of a good family, is a magistrate for the West Riding of Yorkshire, and an officer in the Yorkshire Hussars. He took the name of Ferrand on the death of an uncle, a process which is generally accompanied by something that renders the name worth taking. He entered Parliament in 1841 ; when he will leave it is known only to the political fates ; but were it to occur to-morrow, we believe his party would rejoice in his absence. He is bad neighbourhood ; the peltings he receives fall too heavily on themselves to be pleasant ; and he may say with Ovid :—

"vicina damno est,
Excipiunt ictu saxa repulsa meo."

 Mr. Cobden, M.P., in our next.

THE CONVICTS UNDER SENTENCE OF DEATH.—It has been already stated, that Francis after his conviction appeared completely unnerved, and it was nearly two days before he recovered anything like composure. He is now, however, much restored, and exhibits much the same appearance he did previous to the trial. He has been removed to the cell he occupied before his conviction, and turnkeys are with him day and night, as is customary in the case of persons under sentence of death. The Rev. Mr. Carver, ordinary of the prison, visits him several times in the course of every day, and the prisoner has frequently expressed his gratitude to him for the kindness and attention he has paid to him during his imprisonment in Newgate ; and, although, of course, the rev. gentleman has refrained from questioning the wretched young man in relation to the charge of which he has been convicted, yet it is said that Francis has frequently voluntarily brought up the subject, and has all along persisted in declaring that there was not only no bullet in the pistol, but that it contained in reality nothing but a small charge of gunpowder and some paper, and that he never had any intention to hurt the Queen. He appears now to be fully alive to the consequences that might have resulted from his crime, and his conduct and demeanour while in the prison, have gained the good opinion of all the officers and the other authorities with whom he has been brought in contact.—The conduct of Cooper, it is painful to state, has formed a striking contrast to that of Francis. His violence on several occasions has been extreme, and in lieu of preparing for the dreadful fate which awaits him, his only feeling appears to be that of regret that he was not able to inflict some mischief upon the police and the other witnesses ; and as yet the exhortations of the reverend ordinary have been unavailing with him, and have entirely failed in bringing him to a proper sense of his condition. He has been visited since his conviction by his mother, and although the latter was of course very much affected, the wretched culprit himself exhibited very little emotion. It has been rumoured that the execution of one or both of the culprits would take place next Monday, but it can be confidently stated that no definite arrangement has yet been come to upon this subject. With regard to Cooper, there can be very little doubt that the extreme penalty of the law will ultimately be inflicted ; but very great doubts are entertained whether her Majesty's clemency may not be extended to the prisoner Francis. It is probably known, that shortly after the accession of her present Majesty, the ceremony of the Recorder's report to the Crown and Privy Council, of the prisoners under sentence of death in Newgate, with a view to ascertain the pleasure of the Crown regarding them—has been abolished ; and now all the few remaining capital offences are placed in the same position, and a period of 21 days may elapse between the periods of conviction and execution, and the Sheriffs are empowered to fix any day they please within those periods. Her Majesty, of course, has the power of extending her pardon, or granting a commutation of punishment to any criminal ; but it will be seen that the Crown is now entirely relieved from the painful task which formerly was cast upon the Sovereign, of directly ordering the execution of a fellow-creature.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 It would seem that some misapprehension has arisen with some of our London readers with regard to the proprietorship of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. Either by misleading or mistake, or perhaps with a curiosity to discover a personal identity with the property—some communications intended for the editor or proprietors have been superscribed with the name of Marriot, (one, indeed, was directed to Captain Marryat, as if that gallant author and sailor were the accredited pilot of our ship). We, however, take this opportunity of emphatically stating, that the gentleman alluded to neither has, nor ever had, the slightest proprietorial or official connection with this establishment.

" C. E.," Hampstead, will have the engraving delivered to him by Mr. Lindsay.

" H. V.," Bath.—To his first question—yes. To his second—the parties should endeavour to compromise the matter.

" P. Q."—Your landlord cannot distrain before Michaelmas. If he should do so, he is liable to an action for replevin.

" A. B.," Norwich.—You are liable to an action of trover if you detain it.

" Blister."—If the bankrupt have not obtained his certificate, and you did not prove under the fiat, you can sue him for the debt.

" Z. S."—Chancery is your only remedy, and a very dear one too.

" William."—The act is repealed.

" J. B."—His verses are simple and pleasing, but not suited to the columns of a newspaper.

" B. L. C."—We cannot find the work he mentions: is he sure that we have had a copy delivered to us?

" Corregidor," Southampton.—We refer Corregidor to Mr. Brown of Edinburgh, who made 300l. a-year by minding his own business.

" Censor."—We have waited for our correspondent's communication, which we shall be happy to give a place to in our paper.

" No Humbug," Derby. If our correspondent under this signature can furnish information, and find the means of authenticating his statement, we will make it the subject of an article. He must give us, in confidence, his name and address.

" W. A. Delamotte."—Will he forward us a specimen of his artistical capabilities?

" H. S."—All in good time.

" An Enemy to Machinery."—We shall see.

" A Lover of Arts," Warrington, will perceive one of his suggestions anticipated in our paper this week. We will endeavour to attend to the other.

" William," May Fair.—We cannot notice private quarrels.

We shall next week commence an engraved series of the Churches of the Metropolis. No. 1, St. Martin's-in-the-Fields.

" A. B." must give an order to any bookseller or news agent. He cannot expect always to get the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS without giving an order.

" Munders "—Every information will be duly announced.

" H. C."—Reflections are too long: an extract in our next.

" W. H. S."—We are each, we are both, and we are neither.

" The Income Tax."—The gross statistic and mythology of this measure will soon be felt, and none will feel it more grievously than the class to which our correspondent belongs.

We beg to intimate to our Subscribers that, in accordance with the request of many correspondents, we intend giving early in the principal towns in the kingdom. We shall commence with Nottingham, to be followed by Dublin, Edinburgh, Bristol, Cambridge, &c. &c.

In answer to numerous inquiries, we announce that the grand "Colosseum Print" will be given only to regular subscribers of six months. The price to non-subscribers will be one guinea.

Newmen, booksellers, and all vendors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, are particularly requested to be careful in keeping this paper clean, and free from creases, as in most cases it will be wanted by subscribers to bind in monthly parts, and annual volumes. Title-pages and Index will be furnished gratis, affording additional cost on the paper.

Those Numbers of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS which were out of print are now reprinted, and any of the back numbers may now be had by order of all newsmen.

The First Part of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS containing Five Numbers, in a handsome wrapper, price 2s. 6d., may now be obtained of all news agents.

In answer to repeated applications for the Wrapper to the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, we state most distinctly that a sufficient number has been delivered to our publisher, and those subscribers who are not yet in possession of it must insist on receiving one gratis from the news agent who has supplied them with the paper.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JUNE 25, 1842.

It is always a graceless task to have to allude to self, and the axiom is as applicable to public journals as to public men. We should not therefore willingly intrude the few observations we have now to make in regard to the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, if technical circumstances connected with the circulation of the paper did not call for them so imperatively as a courtesy due to our readers and correspondents, as completely to plead fair apology for any apparent egotism in ourselves.

The fact is, we have suddenly found our journal in a very proud, though somewhat difficult position. The pride we shall seek to retain by desert—the difficulty we shall assuredly overcome. Perhaps, in plain language, we had better say that it is overcome already.

It is no boast to assert, that in the very outset of our career we have been honoured with a patronage fully expected by us, indeed, in amount, because we were determined to earn it—but quite unexpected in the overwhelming rapidity with which it has rewarded our early, and as yet immature, labours in the public behalf. We have found ourselves suddenly required to supply, with imperfect preparations for such an immediate result, an organized circulation of more than twenty thousand copies, with a rising demand of thousand upon thousand beyond that average—the aggregate of accumulated orders from all quarters of the land. We regret to find that these orders have been sometimes apparently neglected; and although repeated with additional urgency, and always to a larger amount, are still coupled with complaints which we have thought it only courteous at last thus to notice in our leading columns. Let us at once pray an understanding with our kindly importuning country readers.

Let them believe that there has been a greatness in the plan of this journal, which has required a careful and gradual development, only now beginning fairly to work itself out. The necessity for catching "events as they fly"—of reflecting the social action of each particular week—of being alive to every point of importance, every turn of public interest and news—and, above all, of crowning the moving panorama of life, with rich, faithful, various, and abundant illustration, has required an Argus-like perception—a vivid alertness of thought—rapid decision—and still more rapid execution of every determined design—and has demanded the exercise of as much energy and enterprise as it has been within possibility even imperfectly to achieve. With all our efforts, therefore, we have fallen short of our own project, both in the regularity of our vast circulation, and the perfectness of the newspaper, which we are anxious the public should enjoy—a newspaper, the first of its class and kind in the empire—the harbinger of a new world of public intelligence—the crowning high-priest of a natural and indissoluble union between national history and universal art. The mere technicalities of such a journal are alone formidable. In the first place, in order merely to work at press the beautiful engravings which we present with every current week, we are obliged to allow time for preparation at the engine, which, when all is properly directed, must even then sweep them off almost with wings of lightning, to supply the country demand; and it is in the evidence of our publisher, that many pounds have been paid by us on the evening of every Friday since we started on our career, to cover the contingency of late postages alone.

We have, therefore, resolved upon the adoption of a system by which it will be imperative upon us to abide, and which we are most anxious that our country readers should understand.

We shall print all day on Friday an edition for the country containing the news up to the morning of that day, and successive editions at intervals of twelve hours up to the morning of every Sunday in the year. And as we find the country demand exceeding our means of ordinary supply, we will resort to means extraordinary, and have our journal re-set, in order that we may work double tides, and throw off two impressions for every one that any of our contemporaries can produce. But above all things let our country friends order the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS of their bookseller or newsman in time for post direction, and not leave it to his own speculation or enterprize, and then complain that owing to the local demand that has anticipated them, they do not find it upon his counter. The omission of this precaution has been the cause of half the complaints we have received. Let the subscriber also state which edition he would prefer to have forwarded.

With regard to the general perfection of the design of our journal, we are daily paying fresh attention to it in all its many departments—in literature—in science—in politics—in public intelligence—and in arts. It is, at all events, most gratifying to us to know, that should we only rise in excellence and in the esteem of our readers half as fast as we do in circulation and influence, neither the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS nor the public will long cherish the slightest cause of complaint.

THE humane and benevolent measure introduced into the House of Commons by Lord Ashley for alleviating the cruelties practised on the wives and children of labourers in the mining districts, may, at length, be said to have virtually become the law of the land. This Christian measure—in the language of Parliament—passed through committee on Wednesday last, and was ordered to be reported on Friday (this day). We hail this advent of general emancipation in Great Britain with triumphant exultation and delight, and, as we see "the altar and the god of slavery sink together in the dust," we feel a strong degree of pride that a British Parliament—with all the imputed faults of its institution—has boldly wiped out the stain that hath so long been suffered to remain as an imputation on British chivalry and British benevolence. Too long have we indulged in the practice of distant philanthropy—like those who, when taking speculative flights to heaven, "leave dull earth behind them,"—wasting on remote and thankless portions of the globe those fine sensibilities and feelings with which the national character has been ever associated, and which had been much better employed in relieving the intolerable drudgery of our fellow-creatures at home. We are disposed, however, to extend free and hearty forgiveness for the past, and cannot better express our feelings than by quoting the words of a spontaneous address from the wives and daughters of the colliers at Barnsley, presented by Lord Ashley to the House of Commons on Wednesday evening last, but which, owing to the rules of the house, was reluctantly refused insertion in its minutes, that—"the honble. members of the legislature would find their best reward in the substantial satisfaction arising in their own enlarged minds from the consciousness of having performed an action which time will not obliterate, and the blessings of which will be felt by succeeding generations."

THE Income-tax Bill has now passed through all the forms which the constitution requires to make it the law of the land. The arguments which might have been directed against its principle while it was pending are now over-borne. It has now to be judged by its results. The whole of the arguments that have been used in support of it may be, nay, have been, resolved into the one crushing plea—necessity. A sense of this necessity has been constantly present in the minds even of those who were asserting themselves the most actively against it. Looking at the present state of affairs, and the condition of the public finances, it was impossible to escape the conviction that something was required—some measure, the operation of which should be immediate, while with respect to its results, there should be the smallest amount of risk or doubt. The most brilliant arguments against the measure have been overshadowed by the stern presence of this giant necessity, impossible to deny, equally impossible to evade. A certain amount of injustice in principle, of annoying and inquisitorial provisions in practice, was admitted by many of its supporters, and coupled with it was something intended to operate as a compensation. This, we need hardly say, was the revised Tariff; also on the eve of becoming the law of the land. These two measures then are to work together, and by their combined results must their whole policy be judged. All that we considered objectionable, unjust and oppressive, in the Income Tax, we have fairly and openly opposed. In that opposition we were supported by nearly all the most profound thinkers and ablest political writers of the age. In Parliament or out of it, it would be difficult to find any unqualified advocacy of the Tax. That opposition has been unavailing, and from argument we turn, to leave it to those stern tests of human policy—time and experience. The tariff was intended to reduce the cost of the main articles of subsistence, so that what was taken by the state in the shape of a tax should be saved to each individual in his domestic expenditure. If this result should fail to be brought about, if every man finds his income diminished on one hand, and his expenditure as great as before, then will every evil that has been foretold of the present scheme of financial policy, fall on the country with a severe and dreadful pressure. The burden will have been laid on, accompanied with no additional ability to bear the load. The failure of the condition under which much was conceded, much given up, and many murmurings suppressed, will give birth to a feeling that a wrong has been committed; and, in that state of public feeling, how will the more galling and vexatious part of the machinery of this tax be put into operation? A spirit of resistance will be roused, the strength, the extent, the activity, and effect of which no one, at this moment, can either calculate or foresee. The bill is passed, has become the law; argument against it cannot be carried into action to oppose it; time, and that but short, will tell us the results of its working, and though we hope the best, it is with a hope mingled with fear.

THE adage is a trite one—"Whilst the corn grows the steed starves;" but if anything were wanting to proclaim the forcibility of its truth, it is only necessary to direct attention to the heart-rending condition of the poor in the distressed districts of the country, where thousands are starving to death whilst our legislators are employed in settling fractional amounts of duty on various descriptions of food, which, for the poor, alas! exist only in the garner and larder of the imagination. We are far from wishing it to be understood that we charge either the Government or the members of either House of Parliament individually with entertaining a callous indifference to the sufferings of the working classes, but we are certainly of opinion that in their collective capacity they have shown a lamentable unwillingness to deal with a crying and most afflicting evil, and have incurred deep responsibility, and no small degree of odium, by leaving to voluntary charity and the provisions of a bad and unfeeling law the relief of a starving population, whose wretched condition should have stirred the hearts of all with the warmest and most sudden impulses of humanity. We are well aware of the objections that have been urged against dealing with the public money for objects of charity, and the abuses which such a concession might, on future occasions, lead to; but we confess we are no admirers of such cold philosophy, and would pander to the cupidity of ten impostors rather than that one genuine object of charity should perish at our threshold from want. The debate which took place in the House of Lords a few evenings ago, with regard to the distribution of a sum of money, lent to administer a slight relief to the pressing wants of a starving community, shows us, in a very striking and instructive light, what jealous and penurious guardians of the dairy farms to the very summit of its hills, and worth at least sixty thousand pounds of annual rental.

"On all sides I was informed that the condition of the operatives, whose wondrous creations of new national resources were before me, was rapidly deteriorating, and I became anxious to discover, not only what they had fallen to, but what they had fallen from."

The writer here relates the details of a visit to Hollymount, the factory of the Messrs. Whitehead, who are Methodists, and which he describes as an earthly paradise, compared with the other places he had visited. He then continues:—

"On the same evening I proceeded to Burnley, and the contrast was perfectly heart-rending. Groups of idlers stood in the midst of the street: their faces haggard with famine, and their eyes rolling with that fierce and uneasy expression which I have often noticed in maniacs. I went up to some of them, and entered into conversation. They were perfectly candid and communicative; for the men of this part of Lancashire retain much of the sturdy independence of the ancient foresters; they will go miles to do you service, but they will not stir one inch to do homage to wealth or station. Each man had his own tale of sorrow to tell; their stories were not they were complicated details of misery and suffering, gradual in their approach, and grinding in their result; borne, however, with an iron endurance such as the Saxon race alone displays, and with the sternness belonging to that noblest form of pride—the pride of independent labour. 'We want not charity but employment,' was their unanimous declaration, and proofs of their truth were abundant in the anecdotes told and verified of men having travelled miles to obtain a job, however heavy the labour, and however wretched the remuneration.

"I found them all Chartists, but, with this difference, that the block-printers and handloom weavers united to their Chartism a hatred of machinery, which was far from being shared by the factory operatives. The latter also deprecated anything like an appeal to physical force, while the former strenuously urged an immediate appeal to arms. There was no concealment of sentiment on either side. I heard more than twenty openly advocate the expediency of burning down the mills, in order to compel the factory hands to join in an insurrectionary movement. A mill had been burned down at Colne two nights previously; doubts were entertained whether this had been the result of design or accident, and in the streets of Burnley there were groups expressing their hopes that it would be traced to design and followed by imitation, while the heartiest curses were bestowed on the factory hands at Colne for having heartily exerted themselves to check the conflagration, and to supply water to the engines. Permit me to repeat that these sentiments were expressed openly and in the public streets. I stood amongst them, and was known to be a stranger; there was no appearance of speaking either with a design to be overheard, or an anxiety for concealment. Had I been one of the posts in the street, my presence could not have been viewed with more perfect indifference."

On reaching Colne, he says:—

"I visited eighty-three dwellings, selected at hazard; they were destitute of furniture, save old boxes for tables, and stools, or even large stones, for chairs; the beds were composed of straw and shavings, sometimes with torn pieces of carpet, or packing canvas for a covering, and sometimes without any kind of covering whatever. The food was oatmeal and water for breakfast; flour and water, with a little skimmed milk, for dinner; oatmeal and water again, for a third supply, with those who went through the form of eating three meals a day. From the excellent clergyman of the town I learned, that out of a population of 53,000, no less than 13,000 were receiving parish relief; that the poor-rates had risen from 3s. to 10s. in the pound; that the relief granted was deemed by the paupers so inadequate to their wants, that the relieving officer in one district was obliged to be protected by a military guard; and that the general ruin was fast absorbing the shopkeepers of Colne and the dairy farmers in the neighbourhood. I went into several of the shops; the same tale was told by all; they saw nothing before them but bankruptcy and ruin.

"It must be added, that chartism, and particularly that phase of it which threatened an appeal to physical force, appears to be advancing with fearful rapidity in this part of the country.

"Connected with this subject, I may remark on the rapidity with which political intelligence appears to be promulgated in this district. The mail, bringing the account of the debate on Mr. Ferrand's proposed grant, had arrived that morning; I had not seen a paper, but I received a very full account of the debate in a house at the outskirts of the town, which contained neither bed, chair, nor table, and I heard it mentioned in a score of places besides

"In Colne, in Bolton, and in Burnley, there was generally an absence of anger and violence in the recitals of suffering, but here teeth were set, hands were clenched, and curses of fearful bitterness pronounced with harrowing energy. 'We wait but for the word to begin,' was stated broadly and openly by every handloom weaver or block-printer I met in the place; and the tone in which this declaration was uttered, gave startling evidence of its sincerity. There was a reckless desperation about the aspect of misery in Padiham, which was unlike anything I ever saw in Lancashire; but I doubt if it be more dangerous than the steady and fixed resolution to obtain a redress of real or imaginary grievances which I found among the people in Colne and Marsden. The destitution in all these places is much alike; in all you may hear the same declaration, that 'things are worsening;' in all, too, you may find something like a determination to effect a change; but in Padiham and its neighbourhood, there are superadded aspirations for vengeance, and threats of retaliating wrongs on the heads of supposed oppressors. In Padiham I heard a man in the open streets go beyond even the violence of Burnley, and amidst the cheers of some scores, express an eager hope that 'Captain Swing should take command of the manufacturing districts.'

"I have now fulfilled the task which I had imposed upon myself, and have stated to you what I have seen and heard, without comment or observation. I have deemed it better to confine myself to a naked statement of facts—a statement indeed below the truth, but yet sufficiently alarming—and to authenticate the statement by giving you permission to publish my name.

"Believe me, faithfully yours,

"Rossendale Forest, June 20, 1842."

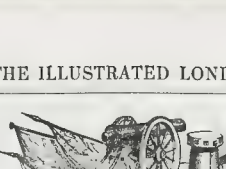
This is a melancholy picture to look upon, and furnishes matter for grave reflection, not only to our legislators, but to every humane and intelligent member of society, and every lover of peace and good order.

We trust, however, that the disease is not beyond a speedy and effectual remedy, and, under all the circumstances, it is a source of most unmixed satisfaction and congratulation that the people yield a ready and, we hope, an unaffected obedience to the laws.

The Coinage.—Pix Jury.—A Privy Council was held on Wednesday, at the office of the Comptroller-General of her Majesty's Exchequer, for the purpose of empannelling a jury of twenty-four members of the Goldsmiths' Company, to assay the gold and silver coins of the realm. The lords of the council present were, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Monteagle, the Duke of Buccleuch, Lord Wharncliffe, Lord Vesci and Fitzgerald, Lord Bexley, the Right Hon. Wm. Gladstone, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Sir Henry Hardinge. The origin of an inquiry of this nature bears date so far back as the eighteenth year of the reign of Edward the Third. Several ladies were present to witness the proceedings. The Lord Chancellor, in addressing the jury, explained that they were that day assembled agreeably to, and in accordance with, a very ancient custom, which was termed a trial of pix, or, in other words, to try the quality and weight of gold and silver lately coined at her Majesty's Mint. It would be their duty to ascertain whether the coinage corresponded with the standard required by law. The trial plates and a number of different coins were handed to the jury, who then retired to a room prepared for making the essay. Their lordships were invited to dine at Goldsmith's Hall in the evening, it being the usual custom of that wealthy company to give a splendid banquet upon occasions like the present, which only occur once in the course of several years. After the address of the Lord Chancellor, the jury retired to make the necessary assay of the coins which had been given to them, and the council adjourned.

A Narrow Escape.—The Sentinelle of Bayonne gives an account of an accident that happened in that city in the afternoon of the 13th inst., which might have been attended with the most awful consequences. A train of six artillery waggons, laden with 50 barrels of gunpowder, for the arsenal, in going down the Rue Maubec, which is very steep, had one of the wheels of each waggon locked to stop the rapidity of the descent. When they arrived at the gate of the gendarmerie barracks, the brigadier perceived smoke and sparks of fire issuing from one of the locked wheels, and gave the alarm. Abundance of water was immediately brought, and the fire was extinguished. On examining the wheel, it was found that the tire had been rendered red hot by the friction, and had set fire to the felloe.

Loss of an Emigrant Ship.—Letters were on Monday received in the city of the total loss of the emigrant ship Kent, Captain Gardner, on the night of the 8th of last month, in the Western Ocean, off the Seven Islands, during a heavy snow-storm. The vessel, it appears, belonged to Greenock, and was bound for Montreal, having 70 emigrants on board. The disaster, it is said, occurred between 11 and 12 o'clock, by the ship running on to a mass of sunken rocks a short distance from the coast. Owing to the severity of the storm which prevailed at the time, for a length of time it was expected that she would fall to pieces. Providentially, however, she held together until daybreak, when the whole of the emigrants were safely landed on the coast, though in a most deplorable condition, many of them having lost everything they possessed. The ship was of about 600 tons burden, and is, together with her cargo, reported to be insured.



NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

Chatham.—For the last few days the greatest activity has prevailed in this garrison, in consequence of an order having been received for an immediate embarkation of troops for India. This military movement is to fill up the vacancies that have occurred in the different regiments of the line stationed in the East. The detachments were inspected yesterday on parade, and the excellent appearance of the men elicited general approbation from the commandant, Sir Thomas Willshire. On Wednesday morning the detachments marched from this garrison for Gravesend, where they embarked at ten o'clock from the Ordnance-wharf, on board the ships Queen of England and Duncan, and consisted of the following corps, with their officers:—9th Regiment of Foot, 80 rank and file, under the command of Captain Robinson, with Ensign Siveright; 31st Regiment, 30 rank and file, under the command of Lieutenant Wilton, with Ensign Sparrow and Ensign Robertson; 50th Regiment, 40 rank and file, under the command of Lieut. Malony, Lieut. Grimes and Lieut. M'Kenzie, making a total of 8 officers and 150 men which proceeded by the ship Queen of England. The 3rd Regiment of Buffs, 61 rank and file, under the command of Ensign Woods; 10th regiment, 17 rank and file, under the command of the above officer; 13th Regiment, 91 rank and file; 29th Regiment, 8 rank and file, under the command of Ensign Head, with Ensign Barrows, Ensign Wade, and Ensign Bradford, of the 13th Regiment; 39th Regiment, 91 rank and file, under the command of Captain Strawbengen, with Ensign Newport, Ensign Gaynor, and Ensign Bray—total, 328 men and 9 officers; they proceeded by the ship Duncan. The two vessels are bound for Bengal. On Tuesday morning 150 rank and file of the East India Company's Infantry left the East India Company's depot at Brompton, for Gravesend, where they embarked on board the ship Harmony, to proceed forthwith for Bombay. The men repeatedly cheered as they marched through the streets of Chatham. On Tuesday a company of the 75th left Chatham for Harwich. On Tuesday morning the Chatham division of the Royal Marines was inspected in their barrack-square by Major-General the Hon. G. P. Lygon, Inspector-General of Cavalry, and who was attended by his aide-de-camp, Lord de Ros. The general having inspected the men on the Parade-ground in heavy marching order, they marched thence to Chatham-lines, where the men underwent a regular field-day. The review was attended by several field-officers from the garrison. The number of Marines on the ground was about 500; the principal part of them are newly raised, but a finer body of men it is impossible to bring together; and the able and precise manner in which the whole of this useful corps went through their military duty induced the Inspector-General to pass a very high encomium on the officers and non-commissioned officers of the division. An elegant déjeûner was afterwards given to the officers of the garrison in the splendid mess-room of the Royal Marines. Sir Frederick Smith, Sir Thomas Wilshire, and many other officers honoured the table. Major-General Lygon and his noble aide-de-camp were prevented from attending, being obliged to leave for London immediately.

The Scots Greys.—Exeter.—This fine body of men had a grand field-day, on Saturday last, in honour of the victory of Waterloo, in which the regiment bore so brilliant and distinguished a part. The event caused quite a stir among the holiday folks of that city, who have not had the opportunity of seeing a regiment of cavalry reviewed for several years past. There were numerous carriages on the ground, and among the spectators were many of the most influential gentlemen of the city and neighbourhood, accompanied by their ladies and families. The weather was particularly fine, and the ground selected was admirably adapted for the purpose. The soldier-like appearance of the men, and the skill and precision with which their various military evolutions were gone through, formed the theme of general admiration.

The 60th Rifles at Jamaica have lost four commanding officers within the brief period of 12 months, viz.:—Lieut.-Col. Molyneux, Lieut.-Col. Sligfield, Lieut.-Col. Ellis, and Lieut.-Col. Markham—the last three in the West Indies, the first in England. We don't believe any regiment in the service can equal such rapid mortality in its upper ranks as this.—Limerick Chronicle.

POSTSCRIPT.

Friday Evening.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent visited the Queen early on Thursday morning, and breakfasted with her Majesty and Prince Albert, and their illustrious visitors.

His Excellency Lieutenant-General Count Mensdorf, and the Counts Hugh, Alphonso, Alexander, and Arthur Mensdorf, left Buckingham Palace on Thursday morning for Woolwich Dockyard, and embarked there shortly before one o'clock in the Black Eagle steam-packet, en route for Brussels.

Royal Visit to Warwick.—It is expected that the Queen and Prince Albert will visit the Earl of Warwick, at his magnificent baronial residence, at the close of the season in town.—Birmingham Advertiser.

Sion House.—On Wednesday afternoon her Majesty the Queen Dowager honoured the Duke and Duchess of Northumberland with her company, at the Noble Duke's suburban residence. The Duke of Wellington, Sir Robert and Lady Peel, Earl and Countess of Powis, and Ladies Herbert, the Hon. R. H. and Lady Harriet Clive, Sir H. Hardinge, Earl and Countess of Brownlow, and a small but highly distinguished circle were invited to meet her Majesty.

Grand Fete at Queensberry Villa, Richmond.—Her Majesty, Prince Albert, the Queen Dowager, Dukes of Wellington, Norfolk, Sutherland, and five hundred of the leading nobility and gentry visited the Duke of Buccleuch's most gorgeous fete on Thursday evening, at Richmond. The scene is described as one of magical influence and oriental splendour. Her Majesty remained till midnight.

The Expedition to China.—Letters were received in town yesterday from Major-General Lord Saltoun, G.C.H. and C.B., commanding the reinforcements now on their voyage to China. The letters are dated Cape Town, March 17. On the 9th of February the squadron had experienced a heavy gale of wind, with thunder and lightning. During the gale the Belleisle, on board which the noble lord takes his passage, carried away several of her sails. At Cape Town his lordship and his staff, with the officers of the expedition, were most hospitably received by the Governor of the Cape, Major-General Sir G. T. Napier, K.C.B., and Lady Napier. The health of the troops was excellent at the date of the letters.

The Opera.—The new ballet, Alma, ou la Fille du Feu, produced last night, was eminently successful. It is one of the best brought forward for many years.

German Opera.—Madame Heinefetter has had some differences with the managers of the German operas at Covent Garden, and, it is said, has seceded from the company. Madame Schodel took Heinefetter's part of Valentine, in the Huguenots, for the first time last evening.

Illness of Miss Kelly, the Actress.—We regret to hear that severe rheumatic inflammation in the side has interrupted the performance of Miss Kelly's professional duties. As this actress takes the principal parts in several of the pieces, her theatre has been necessarily closed, and the certificate exhibited at the doors last evening stated that it would be impossible for her to appear on the stage before Monday next.

The British Association.—This association commenced its sittings in Manchester yesterday (Thursday) morning at 11 o'clock. The number of members attending is not so numerous as was expected.

On Tuesday last Professor Penny, of Glasgow, was elected to the office of chemical operator at the Apothecaries' Hall, vacant by the recent death of Henry Hennell, Esq.; but the salary being reduced to 200*l.* per annum, he declined the appointment. Mr. Warrington was then elected at the reduced salary.

The Deaf and Dumb Asylum, Kent-road.—The jubilee festival of this institution took place last evening, at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street. About 170 gentlemen sat down to dinner. The subscriptions amounted to nearly 800*l.*

Election of Sheriffs.—This being Midsummer-day, a Common Hall, according to custom, was held at the Guildhall, for the election of the various corporate officers for the ensuing year. Alderman Hooper, citizen and vintner, and Jeremiah Pilcher, citizen and haberdasher, were nominated for sheriffs: there being no opposition to these gentlemen, the Lord Mayor declared them to be duly elected.

Town Clerk for the City.—The contest terminated at half-past three o'clock yesterday, when the numbers were—Merewether, 106; Pritchard, 80; majority for Merewether, 26.

At the Court of Common Council held yesterday, the sum of 500*l.* was voted for the relief of the distressed manufacturers in England and Scotland.

Communication with France.—A new pier has just been commenced by the London and Brighton Railway Company, in the western-arm of Shoreham-harbour, for the accommodation of steam-vessels to and from France and the Channel Islands.

Iron Trade.—It is stated that Sir John Guest is about to erect and put into blast two new furnaces. This augurs improvement in the iron trade. Worcester Journal.

It is understood that Government has determined to allow the grinding of foreign corn in bond for the manufacture of biscuit to be sent abroad for government use.—Morning Post.

The boys of the Royal Military Asylum visited the Panorama in Leicester-square on Thursday, having been invited by Mr. Burford, for the purpose of viewing the Battle of Waterloo and Cabul. The band played the national anthem, and the boys appeared delighted with the pictures.

We regret to learn that that estimable man and late excellent judge, Sir Joseph Littledale, is labouring under severe bodily infirmities, and although no immediate danger is apprehended, his situation is such as to give the utmost pain to his friends.

Caution.—Information has been received at the Metropolitan Police-office, that a female is now waiting upon noblemen and gentlemen with the copy of a work, accompanied with a note, purporting to be from the author, imparting an intention to the person waited upon to subscribe, and enclosing a receipt for the books: the price charged is more than the selling price of the work.

Shipwrecks.—The Sir George Arthur, convict-ship, with 80 convicts on board for Bermuda Dock-yard, struck on the rocks at the west end of that island, and became a wreck. Eleven of the crew had mutinied; and the ship was actually worked by convicts to her destination! It is to be hoped their conduct will not be overlooked. The captain latterly became very intemperate, and incapable of doing duty, and was in a great measure the cause of the loss of the ship. He and the mate refused to come on shore with the others from the vessel, and during the night both disappeared, along with the long boat; it is feared they have met with a watery grave. The government stores, or the greater part of them, will be saved, and much of the hull and rigging. The ship was 48 days from England.

The British barque, Ann Liffey, was lost by going on an iceberg, in latitude, 43. 8, longitude, 49; but the crew saved. The British brig, Stephen (Hensall), was abandoned after running foul of an iceberg, and the crew taken on board the John Romilly, and saved. The barque, Isabella (Thomas), from Glasgow, was lost at Cape North, Cape Breton; the crew and passengers were saved, but the vessel became a total wreck, and the cargo much injured.

The Convicts Francis and Cooper.—The day fixed by the Sheriffs for the execution of the two culprits now under sentence of death in Newgate is next Monday week, the 4th of July. The fact was communicated to them by the chaplain of the prison, in presence of the Sheriffs and other authorities. Francis, who has been in a very dejected state since his conviction, appeared much surprised at the awful information, he having indulged in the belief that the sentence would not be carried into effect. On the intelligence being communicated to Cooper that the day was fixed upon when he was to die, he received the information, to all appearance, as a matter of course. He has become very humble, and conducts himself in a becoming manner.

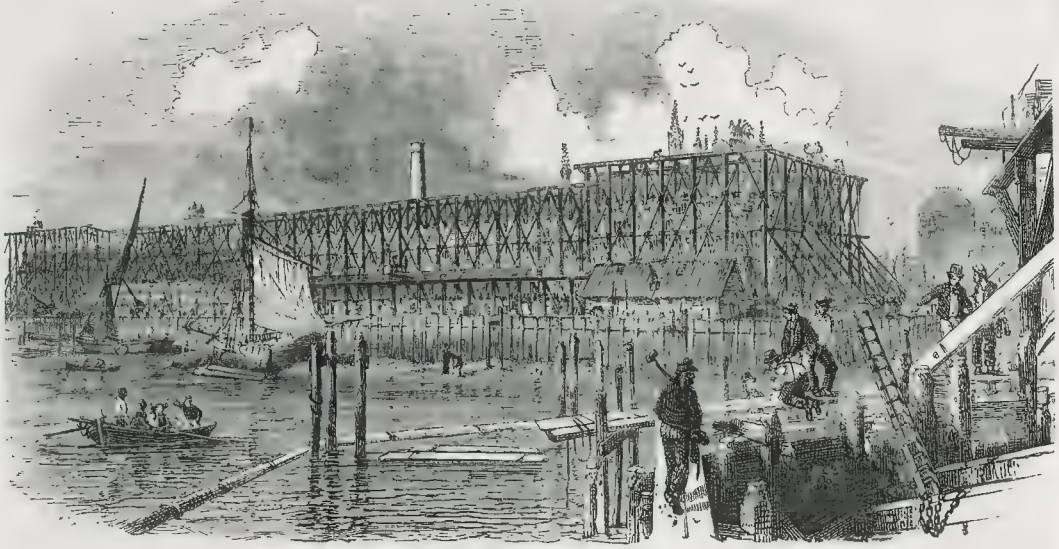
France.—The Paris papers of Wednesday have come to hand; but are still filled with violent electioneering matters. The Phare de Cherbourg announces the sailing of the steam-frigate Gomer, with the members of a commission appointed by government to study all matters connected with the establishment of steam-packets between France and the two Americas. The Gomer proposes to touch first at New York.

The important manufactory of woollen cloth of M. Mayana Dufayel, at Beauvais, was destroyed by fire on the 18th. It was impossible to save anything, and the damage is, at least, 250,000*f.*—Le Commerce, June 22.

Spain.—Private correspondence from St. Sebastian of the 18th instant announces that mysterious rumours of an approaching convulsion in that quarter were afloat, which appeared to be confirmed by the number of Carlist and Christino emigrants who were approaching the Spanish frontier. The Spanish authorities were making preparations to suppress any attempt at disturbance which might be made.

Germany.—The energetic protest presented by the Chamber of Commerce of Koningsberg to the King of Prussia, against the renewal of the convention relative to the surrender of deserters, had produced a strong sensation. The son of the Russian Minister, Nesselrode, had arrived at Berlin, to endeavour to induce the King to renew the convention, by proposing a commercial arrangement extremely beneficial to Prussia.

Turkey, &c.—Letters from Malta inform us that the Stromboli steamer had arrived from Constantinople, with important dispatches for the British Government, which were instantly forwarded by the Vesuvius steamer to Marseilles. The greatest secrecy was observed respecting the nature of these dispatches, but as letters from Constantinople of the 11th, received via Vienna, have been published, announcing the pacification of Syria, it is probable these government dispatches relate to the same subject. It is stated that the house of Niveaker, Black, & Co., has failed for 75,000*l.*



PRESENT STATE OF THE HOUSES.

THE NEW HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.

The above engraving represents the New Houses of Parliament, as the fabric at present appears from the coffer dam in the river on the west side of Westminster Bridge. Of the myriads who daily pass to and fro, on the "silent highway" of this vast metropolis, as the Thames is most aptly called, few can have left unmarked the lofty pile which is rapidly rising by its side. Even in its present state, a good idea may be formed of its future grandeur; it will, when completed, be worthy of the nation whose destinies are to be decided by the debates that will be carried on within its walls. We cannot but think that its locality is most fitly chosen; the stream that bears on its bosom the commerce of a world flows before it, while close beside it are the venerable Hall and Abbey rich with the recollections and associations of departed centuries. The very spirit of antiquity seems to hover over the walls and buttresses yet fresh from the hand of the artificer, shedding something of its venerable influence over that which dates but from yesterday. So is it with all the works and deeds of man; the present springs and takes its hue and character from the past, and both bear within them the seeds of the future. And with the future as it lies before us, how much will be linked with the edifice now springing into existence, under the eyes of the generation that saw its predecessor pass away like a dream! It may be long ere such recollections gather round the new Senate House, as hallowed the old Houses of Parliament, for in them the constitution of England was worked out through all the changes it has undergone since the first institution of parliament as a recognised body. Much of evil, much of error, of passion and prejudice, found voice within those old walls; great and grievous was the wrong inflicted by many of the deeds there acted. But much also issued from thence of which we may be proud and thankful; wisdom, and eloquence, and patriotism, have spoke and wrought within them in troubled and dangerous times. May men of equal powers be found to meet the evil days which the brightest and most hopeful spirit must acknowledge are rising before us. But let those to whose hands providence may commit the charge of this mighty empire, draw courage from the struggles of the past, and look back steadily to the recollections of the days of old, those imperishable associations which neither fire, nor storm, nor convulsion can sweep away.

The building is progressing with remarkable rapidity. Day by day people look up with wonder and admiration, as stone after stone is added to the pile, in its elaborate and finely chiseled proportions. The perfection to which the mechanical aid to human exertion is now brought, adds something peculiar to the operations; with all the dispatch which is made visible by the result, the eye of the observer can hardly detect the presence of a single workman; the whole of the stone is raised by cranes with much more facility than was possible heretofore in works of the same magnitude. It is gratifying to be able to state, that the untoward circumstances which for some time impeded the progress of the works have been removed; they appear even to have given an impetus to their present advancement. This rapidity is not an unimportant characteristic of the present age. If we trace the history of many of the most celebrated edifices, both in this and other countries, it is startling to hear of the number of years elapsing between their foundation and their completion. Nay, with regard to many of them, the period of completion never arrived; finis coronat opus cannot be inscribed on them as a motto. The design of one architect has often occupied the lives of several generations of builders. Sovereigns have passed from the throne, and pontiffs have been summoned from the chair, by him whose stern mandate neither king nor priest can resist, and have left unfinished the gorgeous piles they conceived as a legacy to their successors. A striking instance of this is found in that glorious specimen of gothic architecture, the Cathedral of Cologne. On one of the towers of that magnificent pile, the crane that was used four centuries ago still stands, a wretched deformity, which a superstitious tradition of the city forbids to be removed. There it is, in mid-air, a material witness to the suspension of labour that sprung from poverty or the change of faith; we believe it was, in this case, the former of the two, in all times a formidable obstacle in the path of enterprise and art. In some parts unfinished, in some parts in decay, few evidences of the infirmity of human purpose are so impressive as the Cathedral of Cologne. The one completed spire of the Cathedral of Strasburg, with its marvellous aerial elevation, only makes more glaring the imperfection of its fellow arrested at its very foundation, for both were intended by the architect to spring from the two square and massive towers which form the front of the sacred edifice. Many more instances might be mentioned, but the most striking of all may be found among ourselves, in the heart of our own great metropolis. The Cathedral of St. Paul remains unfinished up to this hour. The incompleteness, however, is in the interior, not the exterior, and therefore passes unregarded. But with respect to the New Houses of Parliament, this failure, as we must call it, will not occur; the error our forefathers committed we have avoided. "No man," says the Scripture, "buildeth a house without first sitting down and counting the cost thereof." This grand point appears in many cases to have been neglected, but we have carefully provided for it, and the result will prove the wisdom of so doing, and let us add, the power of doing it. The completion of the noble edifice, on which we have been dilating, may certainly be looked for at the period fixed, the year 1845. In the mean time its progress is a subject of national interest; as such, we have recorded one of its stages in the engraving which we this week present to our readers.

THE SAILING MATCH OFF GREENWICH.

THAMES YACHT CLUB.

The match was originally sailed on Friday fortnight, but could not be decided on that day on account of the total want of wind, and was again sailed last Friday. The Royal Sovereign steamer, as usual, conveyed the commodore (Mr. Harrison), the umpires, and the visitors to view the sailing. The yachts left their stations at Greenwich at half-past ten o'clock, in the following order, on the firing of the signal gun:—

	Tons.	Owners.
The Brilliant	8	Mr. H. Fowler.
The Rival	10	Mr. W. Sawyer.
The Sea Nymph	10	Mr. C. Wheeler.
The Lady Louisa	13	Mr. T. Smith.
The Mary	20	Mr. Keene.
The Phantom	20	Mr. F. Silby.
The Mystery	25	Lord A. Paget.

The wind was blowing tolerably fresh from the west, and the tide running down. The Mystery, the new boat, an iron one, had excited considerable expectation amongst aquatic sportsmen, and was decidedly the favourite. There were, however, many good judges who fancied the Phantom, and she therefore found plenty of backers at no great odds. The Mary, too, was not without her supporters. The match was for pieces of plate to the best boats of three classes, viz.—under 10 tons, and not over; under 14 tons, and not over; and above 14 tons. As the only boat in the second class was the Lady Louisa, to whom the match was a walk over, it may be said that only two prizes were contested by the rest of the yachts. It was not long before the Mystery gave proof of her superior speed, and it became very evident before the match reached the rounding point (Coal-house Point), that she would be first in the match. The Phantom was her sole competitor, and led the way off Woolwich, but as the wind freshened the Mystery came up with and passed her. The Phantom, however, before the match reached Erith, was again in advance, but again fell back; and off Gravesend was considerably in the rear. The buoy bearing the flag off Coal-house Point, two miles lower down, was rounded by the Mystery at 12 minutes past 2 o'clock; by the Phantom at 26 minutes past 2 o'clock; by the Mary at 21 minutes to 3 o'clock; and by the Nymph at 26 minutes to 3 o'clock. The remaining three boats were much later in coming round. The Mystery had thus a quarter of an hour in advance of the Phantom; and as the wind freshened in going home to Greenwich, it was expected she would arrive there very early. The Phantom, however, gained two minutes in the return, for the boats came to the winning-flag at Greenwich thus:—

The Mystery, 4 minutes to 5 o'clock.
The Phantom, 9 minutes past 5 o'clock.
The Mary, 23 minutes past 5 o'clock.
The Nymph, 27 minutes past 5 o'clock.
The Lady Louisa, 20 minutes to 7 o'clock.

The Mystery was received with cheers and the usual salute of guns, and declared the winner of the first prize. The Nymph was also received with the honours, and obtained the second prize; and the third prize became the property of the owner of the Lady Louisa. Commodore Harrison distributed the prizes, accompanied by an appropriate address, amidst the cheers of the numerous party assembled. This match has proved the great merit of the iron yacht as a fast sailer. There is little doubt of her always being a winner if the wind is fresh.

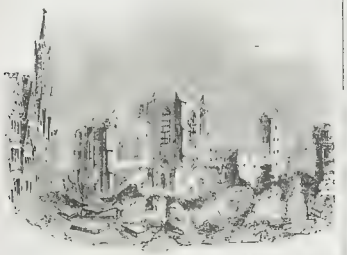
A proclamation, announcing the issue of a coin of a value unknown before, namely, half-farthings, was published on Friday. To merchants eighths of a penny have long been familiar in their dealing; but how shopkeepers may like this new money is problematical. Hitherto a large proportionate profit has been made out of fractions, which never have been given in favour of the buyer, and which will now be ended, and therefore by so much will it be beneficial to the poorer classes.

The first accounts of the accident from the falling in of the temporary theatre at Schleitz were erroneous in stating that the whole of the Grand Ducal family escaped unhurt. In a letter from thence, dated the 9th instant, it is stated that at the moment of the falling of the ceiling, the mother of the Grand Duke, in her 81st year, was leaning with her grandson, ten years old, over the front of the box, and both were caught by some of the falling timbers, and brought down into the pit. The young prince was taken up unhurt; and happily the injuries of his grandmother were but slight. Of the persons who were taken away wounded, forty-two have since died: the total number of deaths from this disaster is now said to be sixty-one. The architect has been obliged to fly and conceal himself, to escape the vengeance of the people.

DUEL WITH SABRES.—Two officers of the Belgian Lancers at Louvain, having a few days ago quarrelled over a game of dominos, went out to fight a duel with their sabres, when one of them was killed by a stroke from that of his adversary, which literally clove his skull.

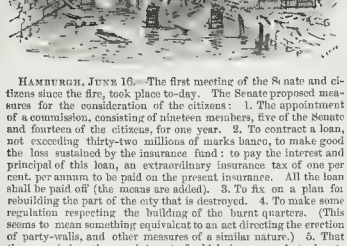
DESTRUCTION OF THE CITY OF HAMBURGH.

This sad and deplorable event, which rendered destitute so many thousands of our fellow-creatures, continues to excite the liveliest sympathy, not only among the mercantile communities of the civilised world, but amongst all classes of individuals from the sovereign on the throne to the lowliest shopkeeper. We rejoice to see that the most liberal subscriptions continue to pour into the calamity fund, from France, Austria, Prussia, Denmark, Germany, and though last, not least, from our own benevolent and kind-hearted community, the citizens of London. We have been favoured by our correspondent at Hamburgh, with a number of beautiful drawings, representing in various aspects this ancient seat of commerce, as it appeared after the awful devastation of the 5th of May. We have selected two of these admirable views descriptive of some of the principal buildings as they at present appear, which we here beg to present to the reader.



It is not our purpose in this place to enter into any historical details of the history of Hamburgh, or to add to the descriptions of its localities, which have been already fully given. The ruins at the extreme right of the above drawing represent the appearance of the celebrated Nicolai Church, one of the oldest and most splendid in the city, and which is said, in the midst of its conflagration, to have presented one of the most awfully magnificent sights ever witnessed. A few short hours before its final destruction, the Church of St. Nicolai was considered so secure that a great number of citizens, with their removeable property, took refuge within its portals. The next building is St. Petri's Church, with the ruins of the dwellings of the clergy between it and St. Nicolai. The district was inhabited by a class of the poorest people. The spire of St. Petri's was one of the finest in Europe, being 445 feet high. The other church in the centre is St. Gertruden Kirche, and the view to the extreme left, Lilien-strasse (street), with St. Jacob's Church.

The following drawing represents the Old and New Exchange to the right, with the Town-house adjoining. The building indistinctly seen at the extreme left, is the Borsen Halle or Lloyd's of Hamburgh. The loss of property was almost incalculable.



HAMBURGH, JUNE 16.—The first meeting of the Senate and citizens since the fire, took place to-day. The Senate proposed measures for the consideration of the citizens: 1. The appointment of a commission, consisting of nineteen members, five of the Senate and fourteen of the citizens, for one year. 2. To contract a loan, not exceeding thirty-two millions of marks banco, to make good the loss sustained by the insurance fund: to pay the interest and principal of this loan, an extraordinary insurance tax of one per cent. per annum to be paid on the present insurance. All the loan shall be paid off (the means are added). 3. To fix on a plan for rebuilding the part of the city that is destroyed. 4. To make some regulation respecting the building of the burnt quarters. (This seems to mean something equivalent to an act directing the erection of party-walls, and other measures of a similar nature.) 5. That the commission, the appointment of which is proposed, to depute two of its members to the existing 'Board of Relief,' and also to agree with the Senate on the principles according to which the funds shall be applied. The assembly of the citizens agreed to Art 1 in every point. Art. 2. They approve the loan, but do not approve of part of the means proposed for the re-payment. They fully approve of Art. 3, 4, and 5. Among the recent donations for the poor of Hamburgh, is one of 10,000 marks banco from the King of Sweden.

BLEACHING NEGROES.—In some of the French journals we find the following improbable tale given, as from the island of Cuba:—"A strange cheat has lately been practised here. A pretended American slave-trader arrived with a cargo of 600 negroes, all of whom he quickly disposed of; but in about three weeks afterwards the whole of these new slaves disappeared in one night, and were never seen again. It was afterwards recollected that, on the morning following their evasion, the American sailed for Jamaica with 600 European passengers. On making inquiries among the planters who had bought these negroes, it was learnt that most of them had become apparently subject to a disease, which caused various parts of their bodies to turn white. A chemist also deposed that he had furnished the American captain with a large quantity of nitrate of silver. Hence it is confidently inferred that the pretended negroes were no other than so many vagabonds of all countries collected in the American ports, who lent themselves to this new species of fraud. This is the more likely, as, from their all speaking either English, French, Spanish, or Portuguese, none were sent to work in the fields, but were employed in domestic services. Some few were appointed to be overseers or drivers, and were remarked for the severity with which they treated the negroes placed under them."—Galignani's Messenger.

ANTI-SLAVERY MEETING AT EXETER HALL.

GRAND MEETING AT EXETER HALL.

THE AFRICAN CIVILIZATION SOCIETY.—On Tuesday a meeting of this society was held in Exeter Hall: Lord Ashley in the chair. Amongst the gentlemen in the platform were the Earl of Chichester, the Earl of Harrowby, the Earl of Euston, Earl Fortescue, Lord John Russell, Sir Robert Grosvenor, Lord Charles Fitzroy, Lord Mahon, Lord Teignmouth, Lord Sandon, Sir Robert Inglis, the Bishop of Gloucester, the Bishop of Norwich, and amongst the ladies in the gallery we noticed the Duchess of Sutherland and Lady John Russell.

The Noble Chairman read letters from the Bishop of London, Sir Thomas Fowell Buxton, Dr. Lushington, the Marquis of Northampton, the Marquis of Downshire, the Earl of Normanby, the Lord Mayor, Mr. Clarkson, and other gentlemen, apologizing for their absence, and expressing their full sympathy in the objects of the meeting.

The Report of the Committee was read by the Rev. Mr. Dealtry and Sir Robert Inglis, upon which it appeared that the Niger expedition, though partially unsuccessful, has led to the conclusion of treaties with two of the native chiefs, but that, having ascended nearly 300 miles, the "river fever" obliged it to return, though not before arrangements had been made for the purchase of a tract of land at the confluence of the Niger with the Chadda, on which to carry on future agricultural and other civilising experiments. The expedition, the report said, had also considerably increased our knowledge of the navigation of the river, and enabled the officers on board to make a more perfect chart of its course; and it had led to a further acquaintance with the habits, dispositions, and varied dialects of the native population on its borders. Though the sacrifice of life was great, it bore no comparison with what is yearly sustained in enterprises of national aggrandisement or private gain. With regard to the abolition of slavery, the report set forth that this country had concluded treaties for its suppression with every Power in Europe having a maritime flag, except Belgium, Greece, and Hanover; and that there was no reason to doubt the accession of these Powers to similar engagements; that she had entered into treaties with every Power in America, excepting the United States, the Equator, New Grenada, and Peru, and with the three last Powers treaties were under negotiation. Conventions had been signed with several of the most influential chiefs on the coast of Africa, viz. the Chiefs of the Bonny, of the Cameroons, of the Timmanees, and more recently with the Chiefs of Eboe and of Egarra. And that orders had been issued to British Governors in the African settlements, and to the commanders of the British naval forces there, to take every opportunity of encouraging such other native chiefs for the same purpose. The influence of Great Britain had induced the Bey of Tunis not only to abolish the slave trade, but to emancipate his own personal slaves; and that it had persuaded the Pacha of Egypt to formally abolish the slave trade in the provinces under his government, although it might be feared that the practice was not entirely extinguished. The report concluded by recommending increased exertions in pursuing the objects of the society, to promote the cultivation of the soil, commercial intercourse, and the establishment of the Christian faith on the continent of Africa.

Lord J. Russell moved the adoption of the report, the sense of which formal motion was that the society pledged itself to persevere in their efforts, and that they would not allow the clouds which had darkened the dawn of this enterprise, to prevent them from pursuing the holy work they had commenced.

Archdeacon S. Wilberforce seconded the motion. It was impossible to look back to the expectations and hopes which animated them on their meeting two years back, without feeling that their exertions had met a signal check. (Hear, hear.) But there was nothing to make them despond; their principles were based on justice and charity, and they would lead them to ultimate success. (Cheers.) They had perhaps encouraged too sanguine hopes, but now they had learned to take a more subdued tone, and that of itself would go far in leading them to final triumph. They had been accused of entertaining fantastic views, of pretending to sickly benevolence; but the noble lord who sat that day in the chair was himself a proof of the sincerity of their professions, and of the practical results of their plans. He was the zealous advocate for the civilization of the African, and he was the chosen friend of humanity at home. (Cheers.)

Lord Sandon moved a resolution to the effect, that whilst sharing in the sorrow which some of the circumstances connected with the expedition were calculated to inspire, the meeting rejoiced in the conviction that the extinction of slavery had been promoted by it.

Earl Fortescue seconded the motion, which was carried unanimously.

The Bishop of Gloucester moved the third resolution, which Lord Mahon seconded, and which was passed unanimously.

The Bishop of Norwich moved a resolution, pledging the society not to relax in the prosecution of their project of the entire extinction of the slave trade.

The resolution having been seconded by Mr. Buxton, passed amidst cheers.

MONS. L'INSTANT, a native of Hayti, said it was a holy day when the people of England first came forward in that room to acknowledge the wrongs towards the African race, and to commence the grand work of atonement for them. (Cheers.) All his countrymen had their eyes on the proceedings in England for the abolition of slavery, and were most anxious for the success of that great cause.

Mr. Gore, as treasurer, announced the state of the society's funds. There was received, from June 1839 to June 1840, 4928*l.*, while the expenditure during the same period was 1100*l.*, leaving a balance that year of 3828*l.* From June 1840 to June 1841, there was received the sum of 5427*l.*, which, with the former balance, made 9255*l.*; and the expenditure during this period was 7393*l.*, leaving a balance in June 1841, of 1963*l.* From June 1841 to June 1842, there was received the sum of 1729*l.*, which, with the balance of the preceding year, made 3692*l.*; the expenditure this year was 2453*l.*, being a balance up to this time of 1238*l.*, which was only enough to meet the liabilities and engagements of the society. (Hear.)

Lord Teignmouth moved the thanks of the society to Prince Albert, the president of the institution, which was carried amidst loud cheering.

Thanks to the vice-presidents and to the noble chairman were then duly passed, and the meeting separated.

FEARFUL THUNDER-STORM IN IRELAND.—A terrific thunder-storm took place last week in the neighbourhood of Macroon and Mallow, county Cork. The thunder and lightning were accompanied by rain resembling a water-spout; the electric fluid in its onward course stunned and knocked down nearly twenty persons who were assembled in a field, one of whom has since died, several being severely injured; and scores of cottiers were rendered nearly houseless by the damage done to their little habitations. About five o'clock in the afternoon the fluid struck the house of John Branton, at Sixmile-bridge, and killed a fine boy about four years old, who was sitting at the moment between Branton's knees, leaving Branton speechless, tearing up the floor, and killing some sheep which this poor man had brought from his fields for protection. In the same neighbourhood a man was knocked down and left senseless, and two women who were scorched are lying without hope of recovery. The market-house roof of Sixmile-bridge was thrown down, and some cattle were killed in that vicinity. At Glin, thirty miles to the westward, the house of Captain Hamilton was burnt down, and a man was killed; several casualties are said to have occurred to cattle. At Newcastle a man was killed, and a house was burnt down also. Some of the largest trees in the demesnes of Mount Shannon and Adare, in Cratloe, were split into fragments. In the county of Kerry also the effects of the storm have been severely felt. A man was struck by the lightning whilst walking along the road in company with two other men, at Ploverhill, and so severely injured, that he shortly afterwards expired. In the town, in Foynes, the electric fluid entered the house of a poor woman named Gallivan, and glancing down her legs and feet, the parts became in an instant shrivelled and blistered in a shocking manner. The lightning then struck a boy who was with her, and scorched his shoulder extensively. The river overflowed its natural bounds, and the principal thoroughfares became flooded.

EXPORTATION OF MACHINERY.—Never at any time since the bobbin-lace machinery was first exported by John Cutts in 1810, were lace-machines taken out of the kingdom in greater quantities than during the last month; as, from the best information we can obtain, no less than thirty-four warp and bobbin-machines have been taken out of this district within that period, one person having taken, we are assured, no less than eight to Lille. So boldly has this trade been carried on, that machines were openly packed at a neighbouring village, and taken to a wharf in open day. By the practice of the English courts of justice, in excise and customs, and some other affairs, a carrier is held to be irresponsible for all goods he carries; this has been taken ample advantage of, as one of our carriers has had the machines brought to the wharf and packed there. Yet, by a decision of the Court of Exchequer, although these machines may be seen thus packed, and the parties should declare they were going to France or Germany, they may be taken by river or canal to London, and declared not waterborne, according to the statute, until they are put on board a vessel or boat on the Thames, with the intent to be shipped. Thus, if the Excise or Customs seize them on the canal or on a London wharf, they are too soon; and if they watch to see them on board, the ships soon under sail, and then they are too late, the packages being ordered as other goods. Such is the manner in which the manufacturing interest, or rather the productive interest, has been latterly protected.—Nottingham Journal.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

ARCHES COURT, JUNE 18.
(Before Sir Herbert Jenner Fust.)
BURDER V. THE REV. T. H. LAWLEY.

This case, in which articles have been exhibited against the perpetual curate of Wheatly, Oxon, has occupied the attention of the court several sessions, and was concluded late this morning, the Rev. Mr. Lawley having altogether taken up nearly 17 hours in defending himself from the charges of brawling and chiding in his church during the performance of divine service. The defendant, throughout his address, stigmatised the conduct of the bishop of the diocese as persecuting, and spoke ill of the ordinary and the witnesses arrayed against him, and was frequently admonished to desist by the court.

Dr. Phillimore replied. The result of this trial was looked for with deep interest by the clergy of Oxford. If a lenient sentence was only passed, the interests of the church would be injured, and dissent increased in the parish of Wheatly. Suspension for two years ought to be passed, and the rev gentleman should be called upon to certify as to his good conduct and desistance during such suspension.

The Court said there was no precedent for a certificate of conduct during suspension in a case of brawling, though in cases of immoral conduct it had been required. He (the learned judge) must take time to consider the case.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER, JUNE 18.
YOUNG V. JODRELL.

The plaintiff was one of the parties connected with the duel in which Mr. Murfin was shot at Wimbledon, and was, it will be remembered, sentenced to imprisonment in Guildford jail on that account. The action was to recover the sum of 401. for money lent in June last year. The claim was supported by the testimony of one witness, who admitted that on some occasions the plaintiff had been in the habit of introducing him to parties under different names, and at times as the marquis of Waterford. In the course of cross-examination it was also elicited that the parties had been very much mixed up in drinking and card playing, and the witness said that the origin of his acquaintance with the plaintiff was an introduction at Derby races.

On the part of the defendant, the petition of the plaintiff to the Insolvent Debtors' Court, together with the schedule of his debts, were produced, from which it was manifest, that at the period when it was alleged that the defendant had borrowed the money of the plaintiff at Epsom, the latter must have been in prison. The schedule exhibited a bill of debts amounting to 3084l., whilst the assets were set down at 66l. only, and that sum, too, was stated to be owing by a bankrupt.

The jury stopped the case, observing that they could not, with these facts before them, believe that the plaintiff could at the period in question have had it in his power to lend such a sum as was alleged.

The counsel for the plaintiff, upon this intimation, elected to be nonsuited. —Plaintiff nonsuited accordingly.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS, TUESDAY, JUNE 21.
(Before Mr. Justice Erskine and a Special Jury.)
CURLING V. JEFFRY AND ANOTHER.

This action was brought to recover compensation for the injuries which had been sustained by the plaintiff, who is an attorney, in consequence of his having been thrown from the Yeovil mail, owing to the negligence of the defendants' servants. The defendants put into court the sum of 20l., the only question of fact for the consideration of the jury was, whether under the circumstances that sum was a sufficient set off for the pain of body and anxiety of mind which the plaintiff had suffered. The defendants made, it seemed, some inquiries, which induced them to think that not much damage had been done, and the parties disagreeing upon terms the present action was the result.

Mr. Justice Erskine summed up, and

The jury, after an absence of about twenty minutes, returned into court, and found for the plaintiff, with 20l. damages above the sum paid into court.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 23.
(Sittings at Nisi Prius. Lord Chief Justice Tindal and a Special Jury.)
MORTIMER V. CRADOCK.

Mr. Sergeant Bompas and Mr. W. H. Watson conducted the case on the part of the plaintiffs, and the defendant was represented by Mr. Sergeant Channell, Mr. Humfrey, and Mr. Hoggins.

This was an action of trover, brought by Messrs. Mortimer and Hunt, the fashionable jewellers, to recover the value of a large number of diamonds, which had disappeared from their shop in the early part of October, 1840, and which, as they had alleged, had improperly come into the possession of the defendant, a coffee-house keeper in King-street, Coventgarden. It appeared that a valuable diamond pin, consisting of 54 brilliants and one large centre diamond, had, some time before Messrs. Mortimer and Hunt became its purchasers, been sold, through the agency of Messrs. Blogg and Hanks, to a gentleman of fortune, a Dutchman named Flea, who on his departure for the Continent left the necklace in the hands of a friend, with instructions to dispose of it. In May, 1840, the plaintiffs bought the necklace of Flea, and took it into their possession till the beginning of October, when it was sent to a lady of rank, one of their customers, for inspection and approval. The lady, however, after keeping it a day or two, declined to purchase it, and the necklace was accordingly returned and taken into the plaintiffs' stock. A few days afterwards it was missed, and nothing more was seen of the necklace in its entire state, or of the stones of which it was composed, till what Messrs. Mortimer and Hunt believed to be the centre stone of the lost necklace was offered to them for sale. Inquiries were instituted, and it was ascertained that between the period when the necklace was missed and the beginning of December the defendant had sold three several small parcels of diamonds, including the centre diamond in question, to different diamond-merchants, obtaining for the first lot the sum of 30l., for the second, the large diamond, 90l., and for the third the sum of 70l. The defendant, it appeared, had stated to Mr. Hennell, to whom he sold the first parcel of diamonds for 30l., that he had purchased them, in conjunction with some other persons, at Debenham's auction rooms, in King-street, Covent-garden, but he afterwards told Mr. Hennell's officer, who went to his house and informed him that he had sold some diamonds which had been stolen, that he had received them from a Mr. Wilson, to sell them on commission, and that he had transmitted to him on the Continent the money which had been paid for them.

Lord Chief Justice Tindal summed up the evidence, and

The jury, having retired, remained in deliberation for almost an hour and a half, when they returned into court, and found a verdict for the plaintiffs, with 500l. damages.

THURSDAY, JUNE 23.
(Sittings in London, before the Lord Chief Justice.)
MACREADY V. HARMER.

This was an action for libel, the plaintiff being Mr. Macready, the late lessee of Drury Lane Theatre, and the defendant the proprietor of the Weekly Dispatch. The libels complained of appeared as articles of criticism, and contained (as was alleged) an attack upon the moral character of the plaintiff.

Mr. Platt addressed the jury on behalf of the plaintiff, and remarked, that it was for the well-being and respectability of the stage that a fair, unprejudiced, and independent criticism should appear in the press. As long as that was done, no ground of complaint could exist; but when the power vested in an engine was perverted from its legitimate object to vilify private character, it became one of the greatest evils that could exist. (The learned gentleman then proceeded to read and animadvert upon the libels. He would not, he said, go into the case, from beginning to end, that, under the guise of a critique, it was anything but a personal attack upon the private character of the plaintiff; stating that he had introduced a most impure system for the sake of his theatre? If for they entertained that opinion, it would be their duty to award such damages as the case called for. If there was a word of truth in the articles the defendant would have put it on the record.

Sir Thomas Wilde contended that the defendant had adopted a fair, impartial, and independent course; that the notice which was given of the theatres was for the benefit of the manager, in bringing the theatre before the public, and proceeded to contend that the articles in question were not libellous. The learned sergeant concluded his address, which occupied three hours, by contending that the articles were nothing more than a criticism upon the public performances of a public man; that this was the first attempt which had ever been made to coerce the press—he trusted it would be the last.

The Lord Chief Justice [illegible]

The jury found for the [illegible]

BAIL COURT, TUESDAY, JUNE 21
(Before Mr. Justice Wightman and a Common Jury.)
THE QUEEN V. SMYTH.

The Attorney-General, Mr. D. Pollock, and Mr. Alexander, conducted the case for the prosecution, and Mr. Platt and Mr. Bodkin that of the defendant.

This was an indictment against the Rev. Grice Blakeney Smyth, for an indecent assault on a policeman. We consider the verdict of the jury fully justifies us in withdrawing from the public the details of a case of this description.

The Duke of Beaufort, Lord W. Somerset, Lord Chichester, the Hon. Mr. Callaghan (brother of Lord Lismore), Sir Winston Barron, Captain Ogle, and other gentlemen, gave the defendant a very high character in every respect, and it may not be unimportant to state that the case was taken out of its turn by the express consent of the defendant.

The jury retired for a short time, and then returned the following special verdict:

The jury unhesitatingly fully acquit the defendant, and beg to express that they retired only to discuss the evidence of the policeman, to whom they impute no blame, and whom they consider to have acted under a misconception.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

OLD COURT, JUNE 20.
(Before Baron Gurney.)

Thomas Share, 23, was indicted for cutting and wounding John Share, with intent to murder him, or to do him some grievous bodily harm. The prosecutor did not answer, and his recognizances were ordered to be estreated. It appeared that the prosecutor and his brother, the prosecutor, were at a public house at Hanwell, on the 22d of May, when a quarrel took place between them, and the prosecutor knocked the prisoner down, and jumped upon him. Shortly afterwards the latter stabbed his brother, and inflicted a somewhat severe wound upon him with a knife. The jury found the prisoner guilty, but at the same time strongly recommended him to mercy on account of the provocation he had received. Baron Gurney asked whether the jury found the prisoner guilty of the whole charge? The foreman replied that they did.

Baron Gurney ordered judgment of death to be recorded, and told the prisoner that his life was now at the mercy of the crown. The prisoner was then removed, and shortly afterwards the jury intimated that they did not intend to find the prisoner guilty of intending to murder the prosecutor, but merely to do him some bodily harm. The former verdict was accordingly recalled, and Baron Gurney said he should take time to consider what punishment ought to be inflicted upon the prisoner.

Nicholas Foster was indicted for cutting and wounding Ellen Foster, with intent to murder her or to do her some grievous bodily harm. The prosecutrix did not appear to prosecute against the prisoner. It appeared in evidence that the parties lodged in Bates's-rents, Aldgate, and on the night of the 13th inst., they both went home drunk, and soon afterwards a quarrel took place between them, and the prosecutrix was heard to say, "Don't murder me—I will be good." In a few minutes, upon some of the other lodgers going up into the room, they found the prosecutrix with a wound upon her throat, which it appeared had been caused by the prisoner. When the constable went into the room, the prosecutrix said that the prisoner had cut her throat, and he replied, "Ah, Nelly, are you going to shave me at last?" The jury found the prisoner guilty of wounding the prosecutrix, with intent to do her some grievous bodily harm. Baron Gurney ordered the prisoner to be transported for fifteen years. The Recorder sat in the evening, but none of the cases disposed of were of any public interest.

FRIDAY, JUNE 21.—Frederick Feldman, aged 30, a medical student, was indicted for feloniously striking and wounding the Baron William Osten, with intent to do him some grievous bodily harm. When the prisoner was placed at the bar he appeared in a very weak state, and looked extremely ill.

By direction of the learned judge he was accommodated with a chair. The prosecutor was accompanied by a number of noblemen and gentlemen, amongst whom we observed the Earl of Scarborough, Lord Charles Manners, Count Kielmansegge, Baron Knesebeck, General Brotherton, Colonel Bell, Count Bathiany, Major Graham, &c. Mr. Clarkson conducted the prosecution, Mr. C. Phillips and Mr. Ballantine defended the prisoner. The circumstances of the assault were given in this paper when the case was before the police magistrate. The prosecutor having detailed the facts, Mr. Baron Gurney said, that before any further questions were put, which might compel the jury to convict the prisoner of the felony, he would allude to a suggestion which had been made by the learned counsel at the conclusion of his speech, as to the possibility of the assailing in a particular manner. He presumed the learned counsel had no objection to such a result being come to. Mr. Clarkson said, he was entirely in the hands of the court. The baron, he apprehended, had no vindictive feeling; his only object was to bring the prisoner to justice. Mr. Phillips was very much obliged to his lordship for the suggestion; he certainly could not struggle against the assault, and would be content that such a course should be adopted; but he perhaps might be allowed to say that the prisoner had acted under the impression that his father had been traduced. Mr. Baron Gurney said, that although undoubtedly a serious assault had been committed, and a very dangerous weapon used, still it was not like a sword or any cutting instrument; the jury would probably, therefore, under the circumstances, feel themselves justified in finding the prisoner guilty of an assault only. The jury accordingly returned a verdict of guilty of an assault. Mr. Baron Gurney, addressing the prisoner, said, his conduct had been most shocking going into the house of an elderly gentleman with a knife in the most formidable character, and assaulting him in a most ferocious manner. If his death had ensued, he (the prisoner) would undoubtedly have been tried for his life. He (the learned judge) could not but feel that severe punishment. He must do for the sake of the public, and to teach persons in his situation to curb their tempers. Had he been convicted of the felony, he would undoubtedly have been transported. Under all the circumstances, the sentence was, that he be subject to the imprisonment in the House of Correction for twelve calendar months. The prisoner was then led from the bar.

Samuel Ogg, John Rutherford, Richard Ingram, Hugh Piper, and James Haughton, who had been convicted of feloniously breaking and entering a vessel called the Ann Hall, were placed at the bar to receive judgment. Mr. Baron Gurney sentenced Ogg and Rutherford to be imprisoned for six months; Ingram, Piper, and Haughton, who had been convicted of stealing, for two months. The sentence upon the other prisoners was respited till the next session.

Thomas Shore, who was on the previous day convicted of feloniously striking and wounding with intent to do him some bodily harm, was then placed at the bar, and sentenced to twelve months' hard labour in the House of Correction.

OLD COURT, JUNE 22
(Before the Recorder.)

The Court was occupied for a considerable time in disposing of two indictments for felony and misdemeanour against four persons, named Benjamin West, William Allen, Robert Hobbs, and William Harper. The prosecution was instituted by a person named Phillips, and Mr. Clarkson and it was alleged that the defendants had made an illegal distress upon a brother in Eagle-street, Holborn, and that some of them had feloniously misappropriated part of the property so taken.—The case of felony broke down, and the charge of misdemeanour was abandoned by Mr. Prendergast, the Learned Counsel, who, with Mr. Ballantine, conducted the prosecution. The Court, and jury expressed their opinion, at the same time, that the defendants had acted very unjustifiably and improperly.—This was the last case for trial, and the Court then adjourned until Monday, July 4.

NEW COURT.
(Before the Common Sergeant, Alderman Kelly, &c.)

Ebenezer Williams, a young man of respectable appearance and address, was indicted for stealing two glass wine decanters, the property of John Curtis.—Mr. Horry appeared for the defence.—Mr. Curtis stated that he lives at Poplar and has a daughter of the name of Louisa, whom the prisoner wooed for some time, and banns were published for them to be wedded. Prisoner had absconded; and, in consequence of information supplied by his daughter, he found that, on the Wednesday following, he had robbed him of the articles now produced, which he could swear were his property. It appeared that the daughter, on whose evidence before the magistrates the prosecutor had been instituted, retracted what she had sworn to, and said she would contradict it at the Old Bailey.—Louisa Curtis examined by the Common Sergeant: I am the daughter of the last witness. The prisoner paid his addresses to me for some time, and we were about to marry, but something occurred to——Common Sergeant: We need not enter into those particulars. I believe the prisoner sent you a letter containing a duplicate?—Witness: Yes; he did.—Common Sergeant: Do what did it refer to? Witness: To these decanters.—Common Sergeant: And they belong to your father?—Witness: Yes.—Common Sergeant: Of course, you never authorized the prisoner to pledge them?—Witness: No; I did.—Common Sergeant: Do you mean to say you gave him liberty to take them out of your father's house? Witness: Indeed I did, my Lord.—Common Sergeant: Under the circumstances, I cannot look at the paper [a] memorandum, and tell me whether you did not sign it? Look at the signature, "Louisa Curtis."—Witness: I think it is my writing, but I would not swear it. Common Sergeant: Then I cannot receive it as evidence against the prisoner. "Until that moment, when I received the duplicate, I did not know they (the decanters) were out of the house. I never in my life gave the prisoner leave to take them." Did you not state that?—Witness: I might have said so, but I must have made a mistake.—It appeared that when the young lady went before the magistrate, she was under the impression that the prisoner was paying undue attention to a married lady; hence, in her ire, she stated that which she almost immediately regretted, and declared that she would tell the truth in Court. It also appeared that, in the first instance, no intent was the young woman of having a "lover's revenge," that she actually urged her father to prosecute the prisoner, and supplied him with money for that purpose from her own funds. It was a matter of surprise why the articles were pledged, as Miss Curtis, who is past her minority, had an independent property, and had often advanced the prisoner sums of money to enable him to get on his business as a rope-maker.—Mr. Horry was about to put some questions, in order to elucidate what appeared a mystery, but the Common Sergeant interposed, and asked the Learned Gentleman whether he wanted more than an acquittal.—The jury then, under the direction of the Court, returned a verdict of acquittal. The session having terminated, a great number of prisoners received judgment, and others were called up to have the sentences which were passed instanter revised.

POLICE.

BOW-STREET, MONDAY.—THE THIMBLE-RIG AT ASCOT.—Williams and Reynold, the two persons who were on Friday week charged with obtaining 50l. from a young West India merchant by fraud, viz., by inducing him to join in a game of thimble-rig at Ascot races, were brought up for final examination, when Mr. Humphreys, the solicitor, attended on the part of the prosecution, and Mr. Adolphus and Mr. Lucas as counsel for the prisoners. The evidence adduced on the former occasion having been read over, and no further evidence being offered, Mr. Adolphus contended that there was nothing in the case that would justify the court in committing the prisoners, or even holding them to bail—Mr. Jardine, after looking at several lawbooks, said the case was a very peculiar one, and expressed a doubt whether the prisoners would be convicted if he committed them for trial, and at length he ordered them to be discharged.—The city policeman who apprehended the prisoners, asked what he was to do with the six 5l. notes he had taken from Williams at the time of his apprehension, and which had been identified by the prosecutor as those he had paid to Williams.—Mr. Jardine said he should not make any order respecting them. Upon which the prisoner Williams said, in a most impudent tone, "I demand those notes as my property, and desire that they be given up to me immediately."—The policeman said he had not got the notes, but they were at the station-house, and would be delivered up to whichever party the superintendent thought was entitled to them; on hearing which, both the prosecutor and the prisoners waded their way to the station-house to enforce their respective claims to the notes, the validity of which will, in all probability, have to be decided by an action at law.

CLERKENWELL.—On Tuesday Robert Trotter and William Merryweather, of powerful appearance, were charged with the following daring outrage. It appeared from the evidence that on Sunday morning last, about twenty minutes to one o'clock, the prisoners, with a party of seven or eight men, who had been drinking, entered the eating-house of Mr. C. Stevens, liquorpond-street, St. Andrew's, Holborn, and called for some soup. A young man named Vause, who officiated as waiter, served two basins of soup to the box where some of the party were sitting, when he requested payment on delivery, according to the custom of the establishment, but they refused to pay. He informed Mr. Stevens, who remonstrated with them, and was about to take the soup away, when a cry was raised to "Douse the lights," on which Mr. Stevens was knocked down and maltreated in a cruel manner; whilst the mustard and pepper pots, together with plates, dishes, and basins, were flung in every direction, to the danger of every person in the place. The waiter, finding several of the party beating his master while he was down, went to his assistance, when the prisoner Trotter took hold of him (the waiter), lifted him up, and dashed him with great violence on the pavement, by which he was severely injured, and has ever since thrown up quantities of blood. He called out "Police!" "Murder!" which brought Lowe, G 84, to the spot; and the moment he made his appearance, Trotter commenced a brutal attack upon him, and struck him repeatedly about the head and body, and he was only rescued by the gang, when he (Lowe) was obliged to take out his staff in his own defence, with which he struck Trotter on the head.—Evidence confirmatory of the above facts having been given, Mr. Greenwood asked the prisoners what they had to say to so serious an outrage? They did not deny the charge, saying that they were drunk.—Mr. Greenwood told them that such a defence was an aggravation of their offence. He never heard of a more gross outrage; and it was necessary to make examples of persons capable of such unprovoked and violent conduct. He would commit both prisoners to take their trial upon the three distinct and separate assaults upon Mr. Stevens, his waiter, and Lowe, the policeman, but they were entitled to bail for their appearance. He would require the most responsible bail: two sureties each in the sum of 50l., and themselves in 100l. each, and in default bail would be taken inquiries should be made as to their substance, and to know who and what they (the prisoners) were, that fact not having been elicited in the course of the investigation. The prisoners were then locked up.

LAMBETH-STREET.—As Mr. Henry was about to leave the bench, Inspector May, belonging to the K division, accompanied by a gentleman holding a respectable situation in the West India Docks, and his lady, entered the court, and requested the attention of the magistrate for his advice and assistance under the following extraordinary circumstances:—The applicant stated that on Friday evening last, between eight and nine o'clock, himself, and his wife were walking, by the side of the ponds, and when passing Abbott's-fields, Lunehouse, he was induced from the fineness of the evening to sit down upon the grass to smoke a cigar. His wife, who was with him, also sat down at a distance of a few yards from him. They had not been long in this situation when they were surrounded by a number of boys and several low ruffians, who assailed them with the most abominable language, and they proceeded to violate the sanctity of the applicant's dwelling, and determined to use both him and his wife very harshly, entreated them to desist. Upon which one ruffian, greater than the rest, threw a hempen halter over his head, and the others followed his example. He then told them that he would give them all the money he had about him if they only desisted, and actually handed them all the silver and copper in his pocket. At length a policeman came up, to whom he gave the ruffian before alluded to in charge, who was the leader of his assailants into custody, but he resisted to take him, and merely told him (applicant) and his wife that the best thing they could do would be to get home as they could. The mob, thus encouraged, still continued their annoyance and violence, so that, before they had reached their home, both himself and his wife got seriously maltreated.—A female, who appeared to be a respectable, modest and respectable-looking female, corroborated the whole of her husband's statement, and added, that one of the ruffians who attacked them snatched away her bag from her arm, containing a pocket-handkerchief, a key, and some silver, and carried it off.—Mr. Henry granted a warrant against one or two of the parties whose names were given as having taken an active part in the outrage.

THAMES OFFICE. A tall well-dressed man, of plausible manners, apparently about thirty years of age, who gave the name of Henry Ryan, and the occupation of a gentleman, was placed at the bar charged with having on Wednesday last, at Limehouse, in the presence of a large crowd of persons, stolen a purse containing 2 sovereigns and a 5l. note, the property of Mr. Broderip, on a charge of stealing two sovereigns from Christopher Harvey, a seaman lately paid off from the Pluto.—The sailor stated that he had been lodging at Rasch's coffee-shop, in High-street, Shadwell, since he was paid off, and met the prisoner, who was also lodging there, on Friday night, and agreed to accompany him on the following evening, to a concert at the Royal Crown public-house, Ratcliffe-highway. They went there at the time appointed, in company with the prisoner's wife, and after sitting in various parts of the room they went to another room, and the prisoner sat alongside of him on his left hand, where his [illegible] his trousers pocket. The prisoner treated him with [illegible] and while he was in the act of [illegible] he felt the prisoner's hand in his trousers pocket, and on looking round he saw that [illegible] took his gold out to look at it. After remaining in the concert-room [illegible] the prisoner and his wife [illegible] to the prisoner's house, in Limehouse, where he put [illegible] the purpose of paying for it, and found that two sovereigns were missing. He knew no one but himself, the prisoner, and his wife, in the room, and charged the prisoner with the robbery, and caused him to be given in custody.—Henry Rasch, a seaman, said he was sitting directly opposite the prisoner and the last witness. The prisoner entered into conversation about Sierra Leone and other places, and, while a girl was dancing the Highland fling in the room, ordered some gin and water to be [illegible] Presently afterwards the prisoner said it was a fine dance, and witness distinctly saw him slip his right hand down into the prosecutor's [illegible] trousers pocket, and, on withdrawing it, he passed his hand to his wife's [illegible] pocket, and appeared to put something into it. The prisoner at the same time held out a glass of gin and water in his left hand, and asked witness to drink. Another pocket, in another person's possession, was found to contain 2l. 2s. 3d. in notes, a 50l. note, four sovereigns, a bill of exchange for 31l. 10s., dated Jan. 15, 1842, and another for 10l. 7s. 6d., both at six months' date. The prisoner gave his name and address Henry Ryan, watchmaker, 3, High-street, Shadwell, and he afterwards found he was living at a coffee-shop there, and had done so for two months. The prisoner, after being cautioned, said he had put his hand in the sailor's pocket for a certificate he had lost.—The prisoner, on being called upon for his defence, said he had been a watchmaker at Leatherhead, near Epsom, and parted with his business a little while ago to a person who had been his apprentice, on account of ill-health. He mentioned the names of several gentlemen in Surrey who were his patrons, and went on to state that he was a natural child, and went by the name of Woods in Surrey, but his real name was Ryan. He had known Mrs. Hancock, who kept the coffee-shop in Shadwell, for many years, and always lodged there when he was in town. A few days since he sold out 300l. in the funds for the purpose of going into another business, and had bought the contents of a Peckham-house.—Mr. Broderip said the case would go for trial, and the prisoner would have an opportunity of calling any witnesses he thought proper at the Central Criminal Court. It did seem to him somewhat extraordinary that the prisoner, who described himself as a watchmaker and a man of property, should be paying so much attention to a waiter in a concert-room. It had been sworn that the prisoner's hand was in the sailor's pocket where his money was deposited, and he should send the case to a jury. It was, however, necessary to make further inquiries about the prisoner, and he should remand him.

MANSION-HOUSE. TUESDAY, JUNE 21.—Application was made to the Lord Mayor, by Mr. Bagley, barrister, upon the part of Messrs Ferrott and Watts, extensive calenderers, for permission to employ non freemen. The application was opposed by three freemen, who claimed to do the work of the applicants, by virtue of the privileges.—Mr. Bagley said, he appeared for the applicants, who were compelled to come before the Lord Mayor for permission to employ a limited number of non-freemen in their business, not being able to procure freemen to perform the work required. The applicants were anxious to maintain all the just rights of freemen, but they did not consider it by any means to be endured that privileges should be made a pretext for a combination amongst workmen. The applicants were determined to resist such an attempt at imposition, and therefore requested that the Lord Mayor would give them a license to employ men who were non freemen, and who were willing to do the work for the wages uniformly paid by them for the labourers' work.—The Lord Mayor granted a license to the applicants, to be in force until Tuesday next, when the matter will be decided.

GUILDHALL.—TUESDAY, JUNE 21. NEFARIOUS FRAUDS.—Mr. Ford, a solicitor, applied with a client, for the purpose of soliciting the aid of the city in putting down a monstrous law and abuse of the process of the law. In the present case, the real facts were laid before a judge, who first stayed proceedings on the verdict, and then set it aside without payment of costs by the defendant. Notwithstanding this check, the plaintiff was pursuing other parties in the same iniquitous manner.—Sir Peter Laurie thought that as Mr. Ford's client had sought and obtained the interference of the superior courts, it was beyond the province of a magistrate to interfere, nor could he take his case up as one which called for the help of the city purse or the city law officers. If parties who were sued for false debts and who had not sought relief elsewhere, would come and make out a clear case of wide combination and wilful perjury, he should probably feel it his duty to make a representation of the matter to the Court of Aldermen, with a view to utterior proceedings.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.—Mr. Thomas Edward Johnson, a gentleman of fortune, occupying a suite of chambers at 131, Piccadilly, appeared yesterday before Mr. Maltby, to answer a summons obtained against him by Amelia Browning, a very good-looking young woman, for assaulting and otherwise ill-using her. The complainant, who appeared to be very indignant against the defendant, stated that she is housemaid to Mr. Cowling, of 131, Piccadilly, where the defendant occupied the whole of the second floor; and it was her duty to clean the rooms, make the beds, &c., for all the gentlemen residing in the house. On Monday morning, while engaged in dusting the defendant's dining-room, he, about half-past eight, came in from his bedroom, with nothing on but his dressing-gown and slippers, and after giving her a slap on the back, proceeded to take most improper liberties, and hustled her about the room for about 20 minutes, pulling her about and attempting to throw her upon the sofa. Being very strong, she resisted his attack. The defendant, who had two or three times, while the girl was making her statement, broken into laughter, for which he was checked by the magistrate, said there was not the slightest truth in any part of her statement; it was all a lie, from beginning to end. The fact was, that when he, at nine o'clock, entered his dining-room in his dressing-gown, without his cravat (to be sure), but otherwise completely dressed, he found the girl there, at work. As the room ought to have been cleaned before that hour, he told her so, and further desired her to leave the room. She put her arms akimbo, and resolutely refused; he then laid hold of her arm to put her out, but she resisted, and, being very strong, he was obliged to give up the attempt, and to ring for her master to turn her out.—The defendant's valet, having been sworn, said, that in consequence of hearing some high words in his master's room, he was proceeding towards it, when the bell was rung, and his master desired him to fetch Mr. Cowling to turn the girl out. She was abusing him very much.—Mr. Maltby said, that as there was conflicting evidence on both sides, he did not think the case fit to be summarily decided by a magistrate, but it was a very proper one to go before a jury; he should, therefore, call upon the defendant to enter into his own recognizance, in 100*l.*, to answer any charge that might be preferred against him at the Westminster sessions.

Lubandi Frondi, an Italian, was placed at the bar charged with assaulting Le Count Gemma, of No. 15, South Moulton street.—The complainant, who is likewise a native of Italy, stated that the prisoner was one of a gang of five or six Italians, who for two or three years past had subsisted in London by begging or extorting money from the generosity of their fellow-countrymen, who might be residing in or visiting the metropolis. He had frequently aided the prisoner with sums of money, and about five o'clock yesterday afternoon, as complainant was walking down Regent-street, he met with the prisoner, who commenced abusing him in a most violent manner, and at length seized him by the collar, and attempted to close with him, intending, no doubt, to stab him, but he being armed with a stick, and on a policeman coming up gave him into custody.—The prisoner denied having in any way assaulted the Count.—Mr. Maltby (to the complainant): Do you wish to press the charge against the prisoner?—Complainant: Oh, certainly I do; I am in danger; he may stab me. If the law does not protect me I must protect myself, and kill the man when he comes near me.—Weeks, the gaoler, said the prisoner was a very desperate character. About twelve months ago he was charged with annoying and endeavouring to extort money from Signor Rubini, of the Italian Opera House. The Signor stated that for upwards of twelve months he had never gone abroad but under the fear of assassination from the prisoner. He was ordered to pay a fine of 10*s.*, or be imprisoned for ten days. [With all respect to the worthy magistrate, we think the punishment, in this case, hardly commensurate with the offence.—ED. I. L. N.]

UNION HALL.—At this office Isaac Beamish, an engineer, was fully committed to take his trial for stabbing a young woman named Harriet Wilson and inflicting two severe wounds on her person. The defence was, that the prisoner was intoxicated and not master of his own actions.

UNION-HALL.—Frederick Bull, a clerk in the employment of the London and Brighton Railway Company, was brought before Mr. Cottingham, charged with absconding from Brighton with 300*l.*, the property of the company. Policeman Tidmarsh stated that he obtained a clue to the prisoner's place of concealment by finding a parcel, containing a gold watch and chain, addressed to him at the Ship Tavern, Charing-cross, which was to be left until called for. On the preceding night a female called for the parcel, and the witness, being present at the time, followed her, and received to a house of ill fame in St Martin's-court, where he succeeded in apprehending the prisoner. He only had a few sovereigns in his possession, and, in accounting for the money which he was charged with stealing, said that he had lost nearly the whole of it at the late Ascot-heath races. Mr. Cottingham, on hearing the above statement, said that as the alleged offence was committed in Brighton, he should send the prisoner immediately off to that town.—The prisoner was accordingly sent in custody before the beach at Brighton.

COURAGEOUS ENTERPRISE OF A MOTHER.—In a yard in Melbourne-place, North Shields, lately, a little boy let a tin can slip into a well; his brother, less than he and blind, took a clothes prop and sought to fetch it up, when unfortunately he fell in himself. His mother came, saw him rise the third time to the surface of the water, and urged by the peril of her child, had herself let down, head foremost, held by the heels and petticoats by her and less daring and courageous female neighbours; after a third effort to reach him, she caught his hand, and with his additional weight was drawn up, by her intrepid assistants; had they lost their hold, both mother and son must have been drowned.—Tyne Pilot.

DREADFUL EFFECTS OF LIGHTNING.—Sunday evening two fine boys about 10 and 11, sons of a man named Cahel, parish of Kilmichael, were killed by lightning. They were sitting by the fire with the remainder of the family, when they were struck with the flash and instantly killed. James Ryan was also killed about three miles distant; the shock passed through his head and burned the hat both in front and behind.—Clare Journal.

DREADFUL DEATH.—OVIEDO, June 10.—In the morning of the 8th, M. Bernardo Gonzales Alvera, solicitor of the Audiencia of our town, died suddenly. He was upwards of 70 years of age, but very strong, and displaying still considerable energy in the discharge of his official duties. At nine o'clock in the evening his body was placed in a coffin, which was immediately carried to the church of St. Sebastian, where his funeral was to take place on the following day. Yesterday morning, at five o'clock, when the sacristan opened the church he was not a little surprised to find the coffin lying on the ground, by the table on which it had been deposited. He ran to the spot, and found the lid broken in the direction of the head. The hands and face of the deceased were covered with scratches still bleeding, and his mouth and ears were full of blood. On enquiry it was ascertained that nobody had entered the church during the night, and that M. Gonzales Alvera was not dead when he was shut up in the coffin. Had a person been left to watch him, as is usually the case, he would perhaps be still alive. To-day the municipality of Oviedo, in accord with the clergy, decreed that hereafter no corpse should be admitted into the church or interred until it should have been visited by a physician to certify his death.

The soi-disant Duke of Normandy has been arrested at Neuilly, as having formerly committed some misdemeanours under the name of Claude Perrin. He denies strenuously the identity. He was quite paralysed, but was brought to the Prefecture of Police.

THE FASHIONS.

Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin, Paris, June.

Mon cher Monsieur,—At a time when Paris is daily losing some portion of its attractions -when you have dispossessed of les Italiens, and when not only some of our artistes, but even Rachel and Duprée have quitted our capital for London, "cette ville plein d'or," I almost hesitate writing to you. The palm of elegance through the departure of the Paris leaders of fashion, either for your shores or les eaux, becomes, for a time, ceded by the Chaussée d'Antin to St. James's. Nevertheless, I must not neglect to acquaint you, that for our jeunes dames who, at the various European watering-places, now disport like Nereides, and sacrifice their lovely tresses to the depilatory influence of the briny flood, our marchands de nouveautes have invented the prettiest caps that ever encircled the prettiest of faces. Of these the bergère de cour and la duchesse are the favourites. They are both composed of gauze and ribbon, and formed by alternate plaits and flutes of each, the sides of the latter descending mid-way down the neck like a pair of pendants à l'orientale. At soirées the sleeves are worn very much shorter; although, as we have not all the Cretan arm and shoulder, I must confess I do not admire this curtailing of the one fair proportion, resulting too often in the disclosing of proportions less fair. Muslins, the only endurable of our robes in the present warm season, are made with the corsage high en gerbe, and trimmed round the top with a lace frill. The sleeves are perfectly tight, and cuffs are worn to descend like ruffles upon the glove. But à propos of gloves, who can endure them with comfort in the heated atmosphere of an evening party. Let thanks then be given, for thanks are due, to one of the most distinguished of our gantiers to whom the votaries of fashion are indebted for the manches Diane de Poitiers, no less worthy our adoption from their comfort than from their chaste and elegant appearance. FELICIE.

THE CHURCH.

ORDINATIONS.—Ordained JUNE 19, 1842, by the Lord Bishop of Chichester, in the Cathedral, Chichester:—Deacons—F. W. Boyce, B.A., Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge; J. Morris, M.A., Brasenose College, Oxford; H. Wigan, B.A., St. John's college, Oxford; Alfred Suart, B.A., Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge; H. V. Mitchell, B.A., Lincoln College, Oxford; N. Gulin, B.A., Magdalene College, Cambridge. Priests—R. Almutt, B.A., Peterhouse, Cambridge; T. E. Dorville, B.A., Worcester College, Oxford; R. Morson, B.A., University College, Oxford; W. L. Powell, B.A., St. John's College, Cambridge; H. R. Dupré, Exeter College, Oxford; G. L. Wilson, B.A., Christ's College, Cambridge.

M. SALABERT'S MORNING CONCERT.—M. Salabert's grand morning concert took place on Monday morning in the Concert-room of the Italian Opera-house, and was attended by a numerous and fashionable audience. The great attraction was the presence of most of the vocalists, both male and female, who constitute what is termed the corps operatique, consisting of Persiani, Moltini, Lablache, F. Lablache, Mario, Ronconi, Guasco, Pacini, Standi,di, &c.

GRISI'S HUSBAND.—M. de Melcy, who, as our readers remember, suffered the judgment of separation sued for by his wife, Julia Grisi, to go by default, has just addressed a letter to the Gazette des Tribunaux, in which he declares that there was not one word of truth in all that was stated on her part to the tribunal, except the fact that he had refused to receive her back. He adds, that if Madame Grisi had not lost her memory, she must know why her husband refused to receive her; that the separation de facto took place as far back as the 15th of August, 1838, and was resolved on for wrongs that were not on the part of the husband, in terms settled and agreed upon by honourable mediators, which leave no grounds for any charge against him, M. de Melcy, and that since this period he has never seen her.

THEATRICALS IN THE UNITED STATES.—The principal item of interest in the theatrical world, is the engagement of Mdlle. Fanny Elsler, at the Park theatre. She commences at this theatre tomorrow evening in the ballet of La Somnambule. She has had a most brilliant time of it in Cuba this winter, where her attractions were as great as ever, and whence she sailed direct for this city. The Brahams are out west giving a series of brilliant concerts to crowded audiences on each occasion. They will be at the Falls and at the Springs this summer. Mrs. Sutton and Sig. Nagel, after a very successful tour in the south, are now at Louisville, giving concerts to brilliant audiences. They intend this summer to visit Niagara, Toronto, Kingston, Montreal, Quebec, &c. Mr. and Mrs. Sloman are in Montreal. Forrest has just closed an engagement with Thorne. Niblo opened a few nights since, and has had brilliant houses every night. His attractions for this summer are very great. Those old favourites, the Ravels, are with him. The Olympic closes a very successful season this evening. The new opera of the Maid of Saxony, words by George P. Morris, Esq., music by Charles Horn, has had pretty fair success, considering all things. We presume that it will be laid aside for the present, or during Fanny Elsler's engagement. We learn that Gen. Morris intends to go out to England to superintend in person the production of this opera at Covent-Garden.

Duprez, the celebrated tenor, has sung at several fashionable soirees since his arrival from Paris, and it is rumoured that he will make his debût on the English stage next season at Covent-garden Theatre, in a celebrated opera. He was one of the artistes engaged to sing at the royal soirée musicale on Tuesday evening, at Buckingham Palace.

MISS HELEN FAUCIT.—This accomplished actress and estimable young lady has lately been fulfilling an engagement at the Dublin Theatre. The Miss FAUCIT who has been performing at the English Opera is Mrs. W. BLAND, an elder sister of Miss H. FAUCIT, who, in compliance with a stage custom, still retains her maiden name.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

The King and Queen of the Belgians arrived at Woolwich, in the Widgeon, steam-packet, at ten o'clock on Monday night. On landing their Majesties were received by Viscount Sydney, Lord in Waiting on the Queen, and Lord George Lennox, Lord in Waiting on Prince Albert; and, attended by their suite, entered two of her Majesty's carriages and four, and took their departure for town.

Their Majesties arrived at Buckingham Palace at twenty-five minutes past eleven o'clock, and were received on their arrival by the Queen and Prince Albert, attended by the Lady and the Maids of Honour in Waiting, the three Great Officers of State (of the Queen's Household), the Groom of the Stoles of the Prince, and also the Gentleman of the Household in Waiting.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent was also at Buckingham Palace on the arrival of her illustrious relatives.

Miss Burdett Coutts gave a brilliant ball and supper on Monday evening, in Stratton-street, which was attended by the élite of the haut ton. Lord Claude Hamilton, who was erroneously designated as the successful suitor for the hand of the wealthy heiress, has gone on a continental tour.

On Friday, the infant daughter of Viscount and Viscountess Villiers was baptised at St. Peter's Church, Pimlico, in the presence of a select circle, comprising Sir R. and Lady Peel, Earl and Countess of Jersey, and Ladies Clementina and Adela Villiers; Colonel and Lady Alice Peel, Earl of March, Hon. F. Villiers, Lady Elizabeth de Rede Ginkle, Colonel and Mrs. H. Bontinck, Mr. R. Peel, &c. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. Mr. Jackson, and the infant took the names of Julia Sarah, after the sponsors, Lady Peel and the Countess of Jersey.

MARRIAGES IN HIGH LIFE.—Early in the ensuing week Lord Emlyn will be united to Miss Cavendish, who, as Maid of Honour to her Majesty, receives the royal dowry of one thousand pounds on her wedding day. This will be followed by the marriage of the Earl of Desart to the Lady Elizabeth Campbell, third daughter of the Earl and Countess of Cawdor. The Viscount Somerton, eldest son of the Earl of Normanton, is about to form a matrimonial alliance with the daughter of Lady Montgomery. Other marriages are on the tapis, in which the relatives of some of the above parties are concerned, but there appears so much mystery connected with one of them, that we forbear to publish the particulars that have reached us.

The Queen held a Court on Tuesday afternoon at Buckingham Palace. Aly Effendi, Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary from the Sublime Porte, had his first audience of the Queen to present his credentials.

The royal dinner party at Buckingham Palace, on Monday evening, included their Majesties the King and Queen of the Belgians, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, M. Van de Weyer (the Belgian Minister), Earl of Liverpool, Earl of Aberdeen, Lady Anna Maria Dawson, Madame La Comtesse de Merode, Baron Dieskau, and M. de Moerkerke.

The band of the Coldstream Guards attended during dinner.

In the evening the following performers had the honour of performing before her Majesty and her august visitors:—Mrs. Anderson, Mademoiselle Lutzér, M. Duprez, and M. Staudigl.

Prince Albert yesterday honoured Mr. M. A. Wyatt with a visit to see the statue of his Grace the Duke of Wellington.

Their Majesties the King and Queen of the Belgians are expected to remain a month on a visit to her Majesty and Prince Albert. The court will not remove to Windsor until Saturday or Monday next; and during the sojourn of the illustrious party at that regal residence the King of the Belgians will make occasional visits to Claremont Palace, returning to the Castle to dinner.

BUCKINGHAM PALACE.—The strictest precautions are now taken to guard against the intrusions of improper persons by the commissioners of police, and also by the authorities at the palace. At ten p. m., when the livery porters go off duty at the lodges, a night porter relieves them, and remains at his post until morning. A strong party of the A division of police is always on duty in the interior of the palace during the night, and patrol the corridors, commodes, &c., and one police constable in plain clothes exclusive of one in uniform is always in attendance during the day at the tradesmen's entrance, in Pimlico, to watch the egress and ingress of persons at the door.

Their Majesties the King and Queen of the Belgians, his Excellency Count Mensdorf, and his sons, visited her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, on Wednesday, at her residence, Clarence House, St. James's.

The Royal dinner party at Buckingham Palace, on Wednesday, included Their Majesties the King and Queen of the Belgians, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, M. Van de Weymer (the Belgian Minister), Lady Anna Maria Dawson, the Earl of Aberdeen, Viscount Melbourne, Lord George Lennox, Right Hon. Sir James and Lady Graham, Countess de Merode, Baron de Dieskau, M. de Moerkerke, and Sir George Couper, Bart. Her Majesty had afterwards an evening party.

LADY STANLEY'S ASSEMBLY. On Wednesday night her Ladyship had an assembly, after the Noble Lord's grand entertainment to their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge and Princess Augusta. Above four hundred distinguished persons were present. Their Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Gloucester, Duke and Duchess of Cambridge, and Princess Augusta, retired at twelve o'clock.

GRAND REVIEW OF THE HOUSEHOLD TROOPS.—Thursday morning.—The ground selected was the flat space in the rear of the statue of Achilles, which was kept by a detachment of the 2nd Life Guards, assisted by a strong posse of police. A battalion of the Coldstream Guards occupied the centre of the line; on the right was posted the Grenadier Guards, and the Scotch Fusilier Guards on the left. The 1st Regiment of Life Guards kept the right, and the 2nd the left flank. On the ground we observed his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, the Counts Mensdorf, the Duke of Wellington, Lords Hill and Bloomfield, the Master-General of the Ordnance, Sir G. Murray, and several other distinguished officers. At ten o'clock, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by his Aides-de-Camp, arrived, and was received by the line presenting arms, the bands playing the National Anthem. The troops then broke into divisional columns, and marched past in slow and quick time; after which several field evolutions were gone through with admirable precision. The Infantry then commenced firing by files, platoon, sections, and subsequently each battalion fired a volley after the troops had again formed into a line. His Royal Highness expressed himself in terms of satisfaction to the several commanding officers, at the admirable state of discipline the different regiments were in. Her Majesty was expected; but, much to the disappointment of many, did not attend.

FINE ARTS.

THE MUNICH FRESCOES.—MIECYLAUS AND BOLESLAUS.

Fresco is that style of painting which is adapted to architectural decoration, in which the gratification to be derived from outline and colour is added to the beauty of form and combination, which are the province of the architect. As its name implies, it is suited to open galleries, colonnades, and other portions of buildings which are more or less exposed to the weather, and is also applied when used for internal ornament, as in halls and chambers. It was practised by the Greeks and Romans, those masters of the arts that added enjoyment to life, and has for ages been familiar to the Italians, but to our more northern climate it is comparatively unknown; indeed, we have some doubts if it is adapted to our atmosphere, if completely exposed to its operation. The sea breezes of Venice have utterly destroyed the beautiful frescoes of Giorgone, their mere skeletons are all that are left to speak of what they were. This would probably be the case in England, but there is no reason to suppose that when applied to interior decoration, fresco would be less durable than in other countries. We are glad to see that the subject is daily attracting more attention among us; we have often thought, when looking at the large surfaces left entirely blank in our public buildings, what excellent opportunities they afford for depicting the scenes which our history furnishes, in a manner that would bring the people constantly in contact with art in its grandest form. As this would ensue if the people were more freely admitted to these edifices than they are at present, we hope to see the day when this will be the case. The attention now given to the subject is not consequent on a revival of the art among us; it may be said to be almost its creation. There are many fine specimens of painted ceilings and staircases distributed over the surface of the country, but they are painted in oil, and do not come within our notice. We need scarcely go into any detailed description of the process of Fresco painting, as our present business is with its results. The advantages are these; in the first place a Fresco can be viewed from any point without reference to the light in which it stands, as the rays are absorbed by, instead of reflected from the surface. It is likewise better adapted to the grand style which is required for the accompaniment of architecture. To the allegorical and the imaginative it also opens a splendid field. Many of the Frescoes of Raffaelle and Guido have obtained a world-wide celebrity, not surpassed by the renown of their works on canvas. Who has not heard of the > "flying hours before Aurora,

> In Guido's famous Fresco, which alone
> Is worth a tour to Rome, although no more a > Remnant were there of the old world's sole throne."

It is a curious fact, that the value and effect of Fresco, are better appreciated by architects than painters. The former have studied its principles in conjunction with their own art; our painters have not yet turned their attention to it as a matter of practice, for hitherto there has seemed to be no field for its exercise.

The best school of Fresco painting, at present, is that of Germany, where the labours of Rauch and Cornelius have done much to raise the art to eminence. The Frescoes of Munich are now dividing attention with its celebrated gallery. The last named artist has been mentioned in conjunction with the contemplated adoption of this style of decoration for the new houses of parliament. Of Rauch we subjoin a brief biographical notice, as an introduction to the engraving we give of one of his productions, of which we shall have to speak presently. Rauch, who is considered the founder of the modern historical school of Germany, was born in 1777; till twenty years of age he supported himself by working as a stone-mason; in 1797 he went to Berlin and joined the academy, where he studied under Schelow and the brothers Miel. In the labours of these four artists the modern school of Germany may be said to have arisen. In 1804 Rauch went to France, where he became acquainted with Napoleon, who had an admiration for every kind of talent. At Paris he also met Humboldt, and this circumstance was afterwards the means of introducing him to the late King of Prussia. In 1805 he proceeded to Rome, where he studied with untiring zeal, the great models of antiquity; he remained there for six years, till 1811, occupying himself during a great part of that time in the study of the costume, manners, and customs of the middle ages of German history. In 1811 he exhibited his famous Mars and Venus his Phaedrus and Hippolyta, and produced what was considered the finest statue in Germany, a figure of a child twelve years old. In 1813, he designed the celebrated tomb at Charlottesburg, and in 1815 produced his grand statue of Alexander the Great. In 1827 he completed the colossal statue of Blucher at Berlin, and the statue of Albert Durer at Nuremburg, in addition to that of Maximilian of Bavaria. All these works were treated in a spirit at once actual and refined. He turned back to the middle ages for all they contained of the picturesque, and reconciled it to the severity of marble. He never dressed the personages of German history in the costumes of Greece and Rome. Still to carry out this principle it appears to us that the period must contain in itself the elements of the picturesque. This may be found in the middle ages, but the most energetic of artists must give up the present age in despair. Its dress is the very prose of costume. Nevertheless, it is in this spirit that the periods to be illustrated by fresco painting must be studied. As an example of the minuteness which Rauch carried into his art, we have chosen a design of a monument, details of which will bear the most careful examination.

LITERATURE.

Geology for Beginners, by G. F. Richardson, F.G.S. of the British Museum. London: Baillière & Co. 8vo. p.p. 530.

The author of this little publication perceiving, as he informs us, that the works already published on the subject are most of them too difficult for beginners, and knowing that what is called geology is no separate department of knowledge, but a combination of all the studies of nature under one general term, first instructs the reader in the associate sciences before he touches on geology; and, in separate treatises, teaches the elements of mineralogy, physical geology, fossil conchology, botany, and palæontology, before he enters on a description of the separate geological formations, and the structure of the earth itself. With the view to unite theory with practice, and to enable the beginner to ascertain his own progress, he adds a series of lessons at the end of each chapter, embodying its most important points of instruction in the shape of question and answer; a method admirably adapted, not only for private students, but for schools and classes of institutions. Thus it will be seen that the work fully bears out its title. While the strictly elementary part of the volume is thus fitted for the pupil, the introductory chapters afford interest to the general reader, and contain information, which even the more advanced in the science may be happy to acquire. The style is always simple, elegant, and impressive.

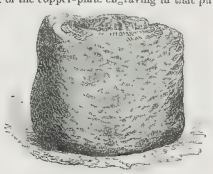
We have noted some imperfections, which have chiefly arisen from the comprehensive nature of the work, and the difficulty of comprising information so varied and extensive in the brief space of a single volume. They may easily be remedied in successive editions.

The wood engravings which illustrate the work, are more numerous than we remember ever to have seen in an elementary volume, and are most of them extremely splendid.

The vignette on the title-page is a fac-simile of the Memnonium, or Head of Rameses in the British Museum, and has been selected by the author from its showing a fact of considerable geological interest, the passage of one rock into the other. In the present instance the breast is green-stone, while the head is syenite, though the whole is one continuous mass.

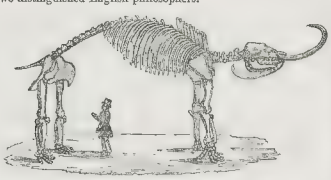
HEAD OF MEMNON.

The following engraving of a fossil fruit from the Isle of Portland, is copied, we believe, from Dr. Buckland's work, and is a faithful reflex of the copper-plate engraving in that publication.



MANTILLIA VIRIDIFORMIS.

The annexed illustration depicts the enormous skeleton now exhibiting in Piccadilly, and respecting which we learn that the opinion of the scientific world is divided, Professor Owen conceiving it to be the Mastodon giganteus, while Dr. Grant pronounces it the Tetracaulodon, or Animal with Four Tusks, a genus established some years since by Dr. Godman, an American savant. This disputed point will speedily be brought to issue by the publications of these two distinguished English philosophers.



THE TETRACAULODON.

Botany for Ladies; or a Popular Introduction to the Natural System of Plants. By Mrs. Loudon. Murray, Albemarle-street.

We are proud of the advances which art, and science, and literature are now making, and consider it an especial duty with us to applaud the efforts made to embellish labours of the pen with decorative gems from the artist's study. The publisher of "Botany for the Ladies" deserves a niche in the temple of praise, for the very enterprising, yet hazardous, experiments he has from time to time made, in bringing about proofs of a cordial and lasting union between art, science, and literature. Of such a character are very many of the works got up under the publishing auspices of Mr. Murray, and of such a character is that now upon our table.

Mrs. Loudon appears to have made the illustration of External Nature the delight of her literary life, and has already favoured the world with fair samples of her indefatigable labours. To the knowledge and benefit of ladies in particular do her intentions and her acquisitions direct their aim; yet, we believe, the harder sex might steal a lesson from her pages for their weal, and, with propriety, might glean from "Botany for the Ladies" a goodly budget of information regarding the natural system of plants, which might render, by its associative product, a visit to the garden, and the contemplation of flowers a source of elevating enjoyment.

Like many anxious inquirers thirsting for knowledge, Mrs. Loudon considered the barriers to intimacy with science insurmountable, from the great number of technical terms used in its elucidation, and from the deeply-ramified intricacies which have been tolerated by all, and invariably upheld by teachers of the science in their arrangement of plants under different heads. These obstacles, instead of allaying the ardour of enthusiasm, appear only to have incited to renewed and heartier exertions on her part in accomplishing her intentions. She says in the preface, "There was something in the Linnean system (the only one then taught) excessively repugnant to me. I never could remember the different classes and orders; and, after several attempts, the study was given up as one too difficult to master." This was the first essay; but perseverance at length prevailed, and the attempt was successful, as the work before us bears testimony.

The style chosen is a popular one, with much ingenuity in the classification of Tribes and Orders. We feel confident that our fair countrywomen will appreciate this "Botany for the Ladies;" and from the general features, illustrations, typography, and elegant exterior, we are certain that Mrs. Loudon's new work will meet its meed of worth in possessing a place on the lady's table, and a corner in the gentleman's library.

Bees: their Natural History and General Management. By Robert Huish. Sherwood, Gilbert, and Piper, Paternoster Row.

This is a useful work, and from the amount of research, and tasteful arrangement displayed, we doubt not, will meet with a popular reception. The studious devotee will find in it a laborious investigation regarding the opinions of ancient historians, and a philosophical survey of facts and common laws relative to the subject in hand. By the Apiarian, the advice and suggestions of the work will especially deserve attention; for in exploding the blindly established vagaries of olden error — exposing the fallacies of later authorities—examining the habits, character, and productions of the industrious insect—and laying down sound and practicable rules for the government and guidance of every keeper of bees—the book is fairly entitled to patronage from that portion of our community whose labours are directed to accumulation of the finest honey in greatest quantity, and in the prolific and healthy cultivation of the bee. Nor are the beneficial results of these labours restricted to the student and apiarian alone, for the work may well interest the general reader, and tend to spread abroad a knowledge of that department of natural history which its limits profess to embrace. The following extract, with appended examples of the illustrations, will give the reader an idea of the popular style in which the author conveys instruction:—

"The Queen, or Mother Bee, holds the first rank in the colony; she is the parent of all the young queens, drones, and working bees in fine of the whole family, who emigrate from an old hive to found a new establishment, and form for themselves a colony in another place.

"The make of this wonderful insect is wholly different from that of the other bees. Like the drones, she has no triangular cavities in her hinder legs, which are appropriated in the common bee, to the reception of the farina of plants. Her teeth are smaller than those of the common bee, but larger than those of the drone, and she has no brushy substance at the end of her feet, in regard to her body, she is longer and more taper than the drone. But the most decided characteristic of the queen bee, is the shortness of her wings, which extend only to the third ring of her body; whilst the wings of the working bees, and especially those of the drones, extend almost the whole length of the body. From this comparative shortness of her wings, the queen flies with greater difficulty than the working bee, and, indeed, during her life, it seldom happens that she has any occasion for them. The under part of her body is of a golden colour, and the upper part of a brighter brown than that of the common bee. In the interior of her body the eggs are distributed in two ovaria, each ovarium being an assemblage of an astonishing number of ducts, terminating in one common channel, and all of which are filled with eggs during the breeding season."

MY LAST TOUR AND FIRST WORK. By LADY VAVASOUR.

We find from its introduction, that this volume is published for the purpose of raising funds to establish a school of industry in the county of Wicklow; we therefore hope the sale will be sufficient to provide the fair authoress with the means for so charitable a purpose. There runs throughout the book a strong desire to improve the habits of the working classes of this country, and though the "travels" are abroad, yet the author seems to be ever thinking and speaking of "home."

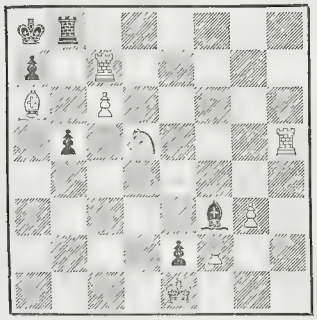
CHESS PROBLEM, No. 1.

White to move, and mate in three moves.

BLACK.

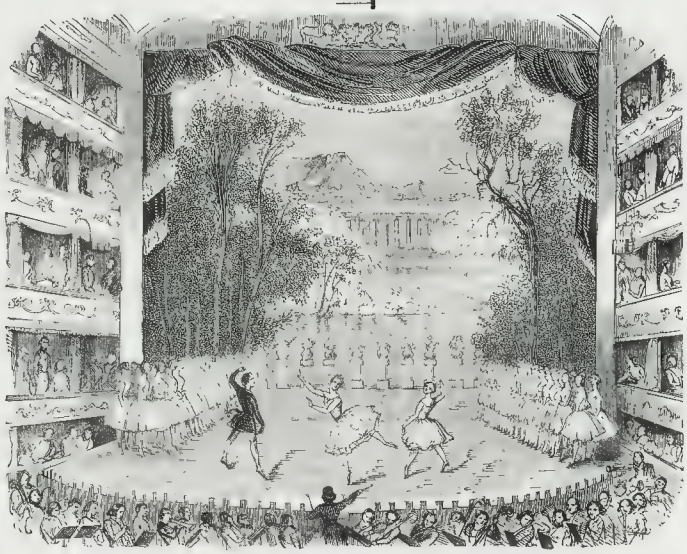


WHITE.

The solution will be given in our next.

We are glad to learn that an appeal, which we trust will be eminently successful, has been made to public sympathy in behalf of the suffering wives and children of our army in Cabul. The list of subscriptions is appropriately graced by having at its head the name of the Queen for 200*l*.; Sir Charles Forbes has given 100 guineas, the Hon. Mr. Elphinstone 50*l*., and a number of other charitable individuals have sent into the committee sums of less amount. The case is one of a very urgent nature, and we hope the general body of our countrymen, and countrywomen as well, will aid in the promotion of so pressing an object of benevolence.

THE DRAMA.



PERROT AND CERITO IN "THE BALLET OF L'ELEVE DE L'AMOUR."

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

The ballet of L'Elève de l'Amour may now be said to have had its run, and the lovers of operatic afterpieces are all on the qui vive for the new attraction by Deshayes. This will, like its predecessor, however, still derive its chief support from Cerito and Perrot, and we shall only have to take our popular favourites in the illustration of new graces and the interpretation, with the eloquence of motion, of a new creation of poetry and art. The ballet which is this night (Thursday) to follow Il Puritani on the Italian stage of Her Majesty's Theatre, has by its rehearsals excited most enthusiastic anticipations among the connoisseurs and dilettanti of the world of ton. It is intitled Alma; or, La Fille du Feu, and is cast in four tableaux, the production of M. Deshayes. The music, which is beautiful, is by Costa, and the scenery is painted by Grieve, in his most spirited manner of delineating the rural and the picturesque. We hope to record the success of the ballet in our department of latest news.

FRENCH PLAYS.

PORTRAIT OF BOUFFE.

Here, gentle reader, we present to you the unique Bouffé. Of course you know that he is the rage of London, and that with that earnest visage of his—so full of comic determination and burlesque power—no less than with that manageable body and those strong concentrations of his laughing fascination as any gentle gallery-worshipper who creeps up to admire his idol from a celestial sphere. His Turlututu only flashed upon the London world on Tuesday. Turlututu is an old man, indebted for the nickname to the frequent use he makes of it. The infirmities of his old age he solaces with a turlututu; his indigence he soothes with a turlututu; his defeat of the knavery of the mayor, who has wrongly possessed himself of his estates, is marked by the same jocund ejaculation; and a final turlututu celebrates the felicitous bestowal of the hand of an injured lass on her worshipper. Bouffé was loudly applauded, and his attractions had enrolled among his audience in the private boxes and stalls, their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge and the Princess Mary, the Duke of Portland, Duke and Duchess of Beaufort, Duke of Brunswick, Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch and party, Sir R. and Lady Williams Bulkeley, the Earl and Countess of Chesterfield, Earl and Countess Charleville, Earl and Countess of Sefton, Hon. C. C. Greville, Countess of Jersey, Lord John Scott, Earl and Countess of Cardigan, Earl and Countess of Essex, Mr. and Lady E. Vesey, Lady Alice Peel, Mr. and Lady Louisa Hughan, Earl and Countess Bruce, Lord and Lady Camoys, Dowager Lady Pembroke, Lady Georgiana Codrington, Sir John and Lady Pechell, Sir Wm. Massey Stanley, Sir John Walsh, the Baroness de Rothschild, Mdlle. D'Este, Lord Maidstone, Sir Godfrey Webster, Lord and Lady Brabazon. Lord Sandwich, Lord Wharncliffe, Lady Longford, Lad Flower, the Hanoverian Minister, Hon. Sidney Herbert, Lord and Lady Eliot, Lord and Lady Stanley, Lady Rendlesham, &c.

COVENT-GARDEN.—GERMAN OPERA.

"The Huguenots," so long the rage in Paris, has at length been produced by the German company in London with complete success.

The opera of "The Huguenots," though pronounced by some of the highest musical authorities of Europe to be the masterpiece of its eminent composer, has remained unknown to the English public, as a dramatic representation, until its present performance in London by the German operatic company. It was composed by Meyerbeer for the Theatre of the Académie Royale de Musique in Paris, where it was first performed on the 29th of February, 1836. The original text, which is the production of the celebrated dramatic writer, Scribe, forms an interesting and appropriate vehicle for Meyerbeer's exquisite music. The libretto adopted for the present occasion, though a different translation, corresponds in all essentials with the German version of the opera, prepared for representation at Vienna. It is here published, accompanied by an English translation, line for line, which is offered in that form in the hope that it will enable the audience to understand the whole of the dialogue, and to perceive more readily the beauties with which the dramatic skill of both author and composer has enriched the piece.

Though composing for a French story and a French text, yet Meyerbeer has preserved in the music of "The Huguenots," that German colouring which in a greater or less degree pervades all his works. A distinguished musical critic of Germany has pronounced the opera to be echt Deutsche Musik (pure German music): so it doubtless is; and therefore the German stage may justly be regarded as the sphere whence its most effective performance is to be confidently looked for.

The title of the piece naturally suggests the subject on which its story is founded, viz.—the barbarous massacre of the Protestants in Paris, on St. Bartholomew's Eve. That horrible event, which took place on the 24th of August, 1572, was the result of the intrigues of the artful Catherine de Medici, who hated the Huguenots, and was bent on their extermination. If the spirit of intrigue prompted her, from time to time, to seem to favour them, it was only for the purpose of rousing the jealousy of the opposite party, whose fury was therefore rendered irreconcileable. The sanguinary scheme of annihilating all the French Protestants at one fell stroke, was devised by Catharine, who forced her feeble son, Charles IX., to become her accomplice. For the execution of the plot it was contrived to assemble the principal leaders of the Huguenots in Paris. Under the pretext of uniting the two hostile parties, Jeanne d'Albret, the mother of Henry IV., was induced to consent to the marriage of her son with Margaret de Valois, the youngest sister of Charles IX. It was settled that Henry's personal observance of the rites and ceremonies of the Catholic Church should be dispensed with, and his union with Margaret de Valois was celebrated on the 18th of August, 1572. A few days afterwards, viz., on the 24th of the same month, the massacre of St. Bartholomew took place, and to save himself from the fate of his Protestant brethren, Henry was obliged publicly to declare his adherence to the Catholic faith.

Such is the historical frame-work into which the author, availing himself of dramatic license, has introduced incidents and characters of his own creation. In the opera the union of a young protestant nobleman, Raoul de Nangis, and a catholic lady, Valentine de St. Bris, to whom he is attached, is the means by which it is hoped the conciliation of the two parties will be effected. The drama abounds in points of high dramatic interest, together with situations which, by able contrivance in the grouping of characters have furnished the composer with opportunities for introducing concerted pieces and choruses unequalled in ingenuity of design and grandeur of effect. Mr. H. F. Chorley, the clever author of "Music and Manners in France and Germany," alluding to the choruses of "The Huguenots," makes the following remark:—"The manner in which the chorus is used throughout the full five acts of this musical tragedy, distinguishes it from most operas I have ever studied. The plot of the drama is absolutely unfolded, not by recitatives and airs, but by the most elaborate concerted pieces."

As might have been expected, Meyerbeer has not neglected to avail himself of the powerful effects arising out of the contrast of the music allotted to the characters belonging to the two adverse religious parties. A splendid example of this occurs in the opening scene of the third act, in which the protestant and catholic parties are assembled before the cabarets, and where the chorus of Huguenot soldiers is blended with the pious hymn of the female pilgrims.

The contrast, too, is ably managed in the very commencement of the opera, where the staid and sober Marcel is introduced among the gay carousing party assembled by the Count de Nevers.

For the prayer allotted to Marcel in this scene, Meyerbeer has appropriated the melody of Luther's hymn, "Ein fester Burg ist unser Gott;" and the same melody is occasionally interspersed through other parts of the opera.

The opera, as produced at Covent Garden, was full of the most magnificent effects, and its whole interpretation by the splendid musical corps engaged was completely triumphant. Staudigl, Helnefetter, Demoiselle Lutzer, were summoned before the curtain at its conclusion, and greeted with repeated cheers and a profusion of bouquets.

ENGLISH OPERA.

On Tuesday night Madame Sala took a benefit at this theatre, under the immediate patronage of his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge and several ladies patronesses. The entertainments consisted of Mr. William Collier's operatic romance called The Kiss, or Bertha's Bridal, a new interlude ("written expressly for the occasion by Mr. Frederick Sala," the son of the bénéficiaire), entitled My Maiden Aunts, a musical melange, together with two dramatic pieces which have lately become the property of the theatre. In the concert which followed this production, Madame Sala sang, with much taste and artistic judgment "Non v'e donna," (Balfe) and "The Morning Dream." Mr. Grattan Cooke and M. Kiallmarke performed solos on the oboe and pianoforte, and Mr. Barker was encored in a very tasteful ballad called "The Rose of Cashmere." On the whole, the performances "went off" extremely well; and as the house was almost crowded, we doubt not that the result was satisfactory to Madame Sala, as well as to her patrons.

THE LATE FRED. HENRY YATES, MANAGER OF THE ADELPHI THEATRE.

Yates, who has been 24 years before the London public—who has for 17 years catered for the public as the manager of the Adelphi—is no more! he expired on Tuesday afternoon.

The life of such an enterprising man as Yates might (as it doubtless will) occupy a volume, but the following particulars, however hastily gathered, will be found correct:—

On the 4th of February, 1797, Frederick H. Yates was born—his father was a tobacconist, and a native of Temple-bar. At the first school to which he was assigned he (subsequently) met John Reeve. From "Winchmore House," we think this was the name of the academy, he was sent to the Charter House, and from thence he emerged, under the patronage of Rowland Stephenson, the banker, to enter the Commissariat Department. Previous to his departure for his gastronomical and military duties, he met Mathews—the Mathews—

"The live kaleidoscope—the angle Co."

When the battle of Waterloo reduced Yates's military duty almost to a sinecure, he re-sought the heart-ful mimic, travelled with him through a portion of France, and, at length, flinging away all military hope, and availing himself of his friend's recommendation, started for Edinburgh, where he was kindly welcomed by Murray—played all sort of things, Octavian and Buskin, Othello and Somno, &c. At length he received, through the recommendation of his thorough friend Mathews, an offer from Covent Garden; he made his first appearance there in November, 1818, as Iago: he then essayed Falstaff. Cozening, a piece written to him and for him by Beazley, made his dramatic forte known in the part he played Dick Muttable, and assumed six other characters. He remained at Covent Garden for five seasons, playing a diversity of parts; employed his vacations in visiting Bath, Edinburgh, &c., and was at last engaged at Vauxhall Gardens, where he was announced to give an entertainment à la Mathews; unfortunately at rehearsal he fell through a trap and broke his leg, which at once put an end to his engagement. From this accident he speedily recovered, and went into the provinces with a "budget." He re-appeared at Covent-garden in September 1822, and continued at that theatre until 1825, when, in conjunction with Daniel Terry, he took the Adelphi Theatre. Wrench, John Reeve, T. P. Cooke, Wilkinson, Mrs. Fitzwilliam, Mrs. Hughes, besides the two managers and Mrs. Yates, Miss F. Brunton, niece of the Countess Craven, and daughter of John Brunton, for many years a member of the Covent-garden company, and afterwards manager of the Exeter, Plymouth, and Weymouth theatres, whom he had married at Bath in November, 1823.

To the Adelphi Mr. Yates brought all his energies—to it he devoted them: his industry was as exemplary as his talent was notorious. The Pilot brought crowded houses for nearly an entire season. It would be an endless task to attempt to enumerate the pieces which, though in themselves intrinsically good, owed much to his judicious management in their production. The Wreck Ashore, The Forgery, Victorine, Paris and London, Henriette, Heart of London, Flight to America, &c. attest his tact.

Terry became a bankrupt in fortune, and, alas! a bankrupt in intellect. His death left Yates in a state of great embarrassment. From this he was partially relieved by his first and firmest theatrical friend, Charles Mathews; that gentleman became his partner, and the Adelphi bills sported the two attractive names of "Mathews and Yates."

The irritability of the "great mimic" made management burdensome; and of the monetary department of a theatrical establishment the illustrious "At Home" knew as much as a Hottentot does of snow-balls; so Mathews went to America, and left Yates alone in his glory.

A constant succession of novelty—a determination to catch all the available talent—kept Yates afloat, and he managed, notwithstanding all drawbacks, to make the concern prosper.

In or about the year 1835 (we think) Mathews died. There existed a diversity of opinion as to the past management, and Mr. Charles Mathews (since husband of Madame Vestris), went in to direct the theatre, whilst Yates and his wife, on the invitation of Bunn, visited Drury.

The management of Mr. C. Mathews was peculiarly short, and equally disastrous. As a dernier ressort, he let the theatre to the two Bonds (noted gamblers), who carried it on with no legitimate profit to themselves.

The next season saw Yates again steering his vessel, weathering every storm, and always arriving safe in port. He commenced a new vacation system, passing his summer months in company with John Reeve, Buckstone, and others at the Surrey, from whence he derived large profits.

Mr. Gladstanes now came in as joint partner with Mr. Yates in the Adelphi, Mr. G. having, as it was understood, purchased Mr. C. Mathews's share. When Mr. Gladstanes took the Pavilion, Mr. Yates and his better half visited the east end of the metropolis; but they did not relish the audience, or the audience did not relish them, and the affair was left to Mr. Gladstanes alone.

[Perhaps before this (for the date is not at hand) Mr. Yates took the Colosseum in Regent's Park, in conjunction with Braham. It was a failure; but such was the confidence of the great vocalist in the undertaking, that he actually paid Yates out.

Little more need be said as to the management of the Adelphi. To anticipate all novelties projected at the national theatre was the grand principle of Mr. Yates's policy, and to produce effects astounding to those who know how limited was the space employed, his hobby. "Impossible" was a word he could not understand, and "cannot" one he refused to listen to.

Amid the myriads of performers engaged at the Adelphi during Mr. Yates's management may be named Power, T. P. Cooke, O. Smith, Buckstone, Butler, Sinclair, Rice, Wrench, Hackett, Downe, Wild, Reeve, Wilkinson, Keeley, Mrs. Fitzwilliam, Mrs. Honey, Miss Graddon, Mrs. Keeley, Mrs. Grattan, Mrs. Waylett, and Madame Celeste.

The last season of the Adelphi was ushered in by the novelty of "real water," and a successful season was concluded on the Saturday preceding last Passion week, when Mr. Yates delivered as usual a valedictory address.

Immediately after the close of the Adelphi, Mr. and Mrs. Yates, with Bedford, Wright, and others, started for Dublin. He suffered considerably during the voyage, but rallied on reaching shore. On the Saturday preceding Easter-eve, whilst rehearsing Lord Skindeep, in Douglas Jerrold's Bubbles of the Day, he felt suddenly ill, and putting his handkerchief to his mouth found he was spitting blood. With great presence of mind he avoided giving any alarm to Mrs. Yates, but said, "Bess, I shall go away now," he instantly repaired to Morrison's Hotel, which he only left to return and die in his own land. He has left a widow and a son to deplore his loss.

As an actor Mr. Yates exhibited wonderful versatility. Richard, Shylock, Flexible, Buskin, Leporello, Foukin, Lapoche, Moses, Mordecai, Gibby, Rob Roy, are a few amid the many parts played by him during his Covent-garden engagement. At the Adelphi it is well known he played whatever was wanted in the pieces produced—that is to say, he played not the best part in any piece, but the part he found it most difficult to get pourtrayed.

Yates had few personal advantages; his figure was unwieldy, his countenance ill-formed, but his eye was brilliant and intelligent, and his face peculiarly mobile. Few mimics possessed more completely than he did the power of facial-y as well as vocally representing the person imitated.

As a manager he was remarkable for enterprise, industry, and celerity, and to these qualities he owed much of his success. If he now and then failed (as in the case of the Bayaderes, &c.), he only rebounded from his fall to rise the higher. His energies never deserted him until sickness had stricken him down. He broke a blood-vessel whilst playing Robert Macaire, about five years since, and was confined for a considerable time—from that period he injured, or rather professed to abjure, any violent exertion; but his natural energy, not to say irritability, rendered it impossible for him to abide by the rules he might prescribe himself.

He had a natural tendency to burlesque all that was serious, and, after the first night or two, frequently gave way to it.

He invariably suffered severely whilst crossing the sea, and to his voyage to Dublin the suddenness of the present fatal attack may be attributed. He certainly displayed of late years little of any of the energy that marked his early career, he contented himself with copying, almost servilely, the Parisian artists—in fact, for the last season or two he generally visited France, accompanied by an artist, who literally sketched the scenery and took down the situations as arranged by the Gallic professors.

"The sword wears out the sheath." Of this fact Mr. Yates appeared unconscious until the fatal truth forced itself upon him. Whilst travelling from London to Dublin he was studying Lord Skindeep—few men worked harder and slept less.

His death has decidedly "diminished the stock of harmless amusement;" and the loss sustained by the establishment of which he was the principal director can only be appreciated by those who suffer from his loss.

Taking into consideration all he achieved, he may be fairly regarded as one of the most extraordinary men that the stage of the nineteenth century has boasted. In addition to his performances in every line of the drama, it must be remembered that he was—after Mathews—the most successful of the many who aspired to entertain an audience by their unaided exertions. Had he, in fact, "been true to himself," he must have held a high rank in the profession; as it was, his best efforts—made as they were—exhibited where they were, are scarcely remembered.

The death of Frederick Yates will occasion an entire change in the management of the Adelphi, and produce, without doubt, a considerable revolution in the mode of conducting "minor theatres under the control of the Lord Chamberlain."

PROVINCIAL.

BRITISH ASSOCIATION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF SCIENCE.—The preparations for holding this, the 13th meeting of the association at Manchester, are now nearly completed; but, according to the programme last issued by the local council, although there is every prospect of this proving one of the most interesting of any of the meetings that have been held, there is some deficiency in the minor details, which have heretofore proved some of the most attractive objects of these annual assemblages. This is particularly remarked in the circumstance that but few of the manufacturing establishments of this large and wealthy town will be thrown open for the inspection of the members; although on the other hand, the list of scientific papers to be read at the different sections, particularly in the mechanical and geological departments, as already received by the secretaries, is very considerable. The president this year is the Right Honourable Lord Francis Egerton, M.P.; and the vice-presidents the Venerable John Dalton, D.C.L., F.R.S., the Hon. and Very Rev. W. Herbert, LL.D., F.L.S., Dean of Manchester; Dr. W. C. Henry, F.R.S., Sir Benj. Heywood, Bart., F.R.S., and the Rev. Professor Sedgwick. With regard to the several places of meeting, the local situation and convenience are equal to those of any previous meeting. The extensive and well-arranged building of the Mechanics' Institution, in Cooper-street, accommodates the sections D, E, and G; while section A is to be held at the Royal Institution, in Mosley-street; section B at the rooms of the Literary and Philosophical Society, in George-street; section C at the Athenæum, George-street; and section F at the Assembly Rooms, Mosley-street. These places are adjacent, and will severally accommodate the large congregations which are expected to assemble. From the facilities of approach, particularly by means of internal communication, a very large influx of members is anticipated. Amongst foreign visitors who have already arrived is Professor Beseli, the celebrated astronomer, from Konigsburg, together with several professors from the different Russian academies, who will for the first time have visited this annual assemblage. Although there is a lack of any general enthusiasm, as has been shown on some previous occasions, the reception of the members will this year be liberal and satisfactory; and it may be noticed that although a very large influx of visitors is expected, for the present and ensuing week, the price of accommodation at hotels and private houses has in no instance been raised.

OXFORD.—Amongst the other questions interesting to the public which form the staple of newspaper communications for the present week, we find

WEST INDIA STEAMERS.—The Company's steamer Medway, has arrived at Southampton. She left Havannah on the 1st, Nassau on the 3d, Bermuda on the 7th, Fayal on the 16th, and landed her mails at Falmouth, Wednesday. The steamer has on freight one million of dollars, and 132 scrons of cochineal, with upwards of 60 passengers.

DREADFUL EXPLOSION.—SEVEN PERSONS KILLED. An explosion in an ironstone mine, marked by an extent of calamity almost, if not quite, unprecedented in the neighbourhood, took place, we regret to state, in the shaft of a pit at the Cleveland Colliery, situate on the road to Willenhall, and between Wolverhampton and Portobello, early on Monday morning last. The men and boys belonging to the pit, amounting to the number of thirteen, assembled shortly before six o'clock, for the purpose of going to work. The engine was set to work, and the whole thirteen began descending in and hanging about a single skip. The mine, which had not been worked since Saturday, was not tried with a safety lamp, although a lamp belonging to the pit was, we understand, at hand. The party took lighted candles with them for the purpose of lighting themselves while at their labour; but they had not descended much more than fifty yards, when they came in contact with a body of foul air which had accumulated in the shaft. An explosion instantaneously followed, and seven of the unfortunate men and boys fell from the skip, dreadfully burned, to the bottom of the shaft; the remaining six, under the impulse of terror, retained a convulsive hold of various parts of the skip, and the engine being backed, they were as soon as possible drawn up the shaft; they were all much burned, and some of them almost in a state of insensibility from the dreadful injuries they had received. The burned and maimed men and boys were, with as much tenderness as possible, conveyed to their respective homes. The sight of them, as they lay upon the bank previous to their removal, was most distressing. It was about half-past seven o'clock before the last body could be brought up. The following is a list of the sufferers who are dead:—James Love, aged 46, and his son, aged 14; Walter Marshall, a boy about 15 years of age; William Smith, aged 27 years, leaving a wife and one child; Edward Dawson, aged 16; William Dunn, aged 17; and William Jones, aged 11. It will be seen from the above account, that the primary cause of this distressing occurrence was neglecting the use of the safety lamp. This is traceable to the unfortunate yet customary carelessness which distinguishes our mining population, and blame, so far as we have yet heard, does not appear to attach to any one having the management or superintendance of the pit.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

AFFGHANISTAN.—JUST OPENED, ROYAL PANORAMA, Leicester-square, a comprehensive and interesting VIEW of CABUL, including every object of interest in the city, the Bala Hissar, Mosques and Palace; the River Cabul; together with a distant view of the Himalaya Mountains, and the Pass of Khurd Cabul, where the British army was so treacherously destroyed. THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, a Pictorial Family Newspaper, containing Essays on Public Affairs; Literature; Fine Arts; Music; Sporting Intelligence; Science; and a complete record of all the events of the week, at home, abroad, or in the colonies, the whole illustrated in a high style of art by wood-engravers of the first eminence, printed in a form convenient for binding, and comprising SIXTEEN PAGES, and FORTY-EIGHT COLUMNS OF LETTER-PRESS, in a typography consistent with the beauty and neatness of the pictorial embellishments.

The Proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS have no longer to usher before the world a mere prospectus of its purpose and design. The project which they at first conceived in a spirit of sanguine ambition, has within a period of six short weeks been crowned with the most triumphant and unprecedented success;—with the rapidity of Tropical vegetation their seed has grown to fruit, and the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS is now the ONLY FAMILY NEWSPAPER, proper so characterised, which, exceeding all its contemporaries in the amount of public patronage awarded to it, can proclaim a CIRCULATION OF TWENTY THOUSAND COPIES, and claim to take rank in point of respectability as the first, and in point of numbers as the second of all the weekly journals of the empire which pretend to the achieval of a far spread sale.

This fact, which the returns of the Stamp-office, no less than the general ubiquity of the paper, will place beyond dispute, is a source of mingled gratitude and pride; of gratitude, for the stimulating encouragement of public support,—of pride, because no expedients of impostion—no devices of quackery have been resorted to, but a stand has been made upon the simple merits of a system which its proprietors have only now to study to improve into as much perfection as a newspaper can attain. To the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, the community are indebted for the first combination of all the varieties of public intelligence with the fertile and unhandled resources of the fine arts—the development of a new and beautiful means of extending and confirming the interest of society over all the topics within the circle of its life and action—the giving brighter pictures and more vivid and palpable character of the rich—to give every salient point and feature in the great panorama of public life.

And in the cementing of this new and happy union, the editor of this pictorial newspaper has sought no adventitious aids to attain his purpose of success. He has not pandered to the prejudices of the high, nor the passions of the lower orders of society, he has wooed the countenance of no party in the state or among the people, but taking the high ground of neutrality, has contented himself with the advocacy of constant, morality, and truth. To raise the standard of public virtue—to palliate the distresses of the poor—to aid the benevolence of the rich—to give a healthy moral tone to the working of the social system—to uphold the great principles of humanity—to promote science—encourage belles lettres and beaux arts—foster genius, and help oppression—in a word, to enlist all the noble influences which impel the progress of civilization and tend to dignify the character alike of nations as of men;—this should be the enlarged purpose of the honest public journalist, and to take its humble part in the promotion of such purpose is the cherished and avowed ambition of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

TO ADVERTISERS.—The "ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS" will be found to be a most invaluable medium for Advertisers. It has, with only one exception, the largest circulation of any Newspaper in the Kingdom, and the class of persons by whom it is patronised are of the highest rank. The beauty of its Pictorial Embellishments will ensure its being carefully preserved for binding, thus giving it a permanence over other newspapers, which are, after a hasty perusal, thrown aside and forgotten.

An additional attraction will be given to the Advertisements in this Paper, by Illustrations being introduced of the objects advertised.

COSMETICS.—Too much caution cannot be used by Ladies in the adoption of those aids to beauty, many of them being very injurious in their ultimate effects. Rowland's Kalydor, an innocent and efficacious compound, is therefore to render an acceptable service to the fair sex. GODFREY'S EXTRACT OF ELDER FLOWERS has acquired great celebrity as well for its efficacy as for delicacy in its application. It communicates a refreshing coolness and softness to the skin, and completely removes tan, pimples, and cutaneous eruptions, giving to the complexion a clear and healthful appearance not to be otherwise obtained.

DARR'S LIFE PILLS. The following letter just received from the respected Proprietor of the "Devonport Independent" Newspaper, clearly demonstrates the general utility of this much prized medicine. Similar letters are constantly received from all parts of the United Kingdom. Some of these testimonials are printed and may be had gratis of all agents.

Independent Newspaper Office,
Devonport, April 16, 1842.

Gentlemen,—You will doubtless be glad to hear of the popularity of DARR'S LIFE PILLS in this neighbourhood, and of the constant and daily increasing demand for them. We hear of their great efficacy from all classes, and from persons of all ages; from Officers in the Naval and Military service, Artisans, Gentlemen in the Government Establishments, Agriculturists, Miners, Labourers, Domestic Servants, &c. The best proof of their success is that we have issued from our Establishment here 1752 boxes, various sizes, during the past quarter; and every post brings fresh orders from the neighbouring towns and villages. We are obliged to keep several gross on hand to meet the extraordinary demand. Many persons have expressed their gratitude after recovery, but for the reason they feel a delicacy in having their cases and names published. Should this letter be deemed useful it is at your service for the public good.

I am, Gentlemen, your obedient servant,
W. BYERS.

CAUTION. Purchasers will please to observe that none are genuine without the words "DARR'S LIFE PILLS" are engraved on the Government Stamp (which is pasted round the sides of each box) in WHITE LETTERS ON A RED GROUND.

ANGLING.

THE GRAYLING.

To the Editor of the Illustrated London News.

The grayling may be angled for much in the same way as trout, with the exception of minnow, which, notwithstanding the authority of Walton, is not found to be good. Although very abundant in some streams, it is a very local fish, and is not to be found in either Scotland or Ireland. When trout are out of season in October and November, the grayling is in its prime, and the young of that year will be then from six to seven inches in length. It is a more elegant formed fish than the trout, has a smaller head and mouth, is broader across the shoulders, and tapers off more equally to the tail, which is more forked. His back fin is very large and beautiful. He sometimes grows to about three pounds in weight, though one of a pound and a half is considered a large fish to be caught with the fly. He likes a smaller and rather more gaudy fly than the trout; is a very sporting fish when hooked, and requires treating very gently, as his mouth is very tender, and if he is used roughly will most assuredly break away. The best counties for grayling are those of Derby, Stafford, Nottingham, and York. They do not dwell, like the trout, in rapid, shallow currents, nor like the chub, in deep pools or lasher—like a combination of both both stream and pool: a pool for rest, and a rapid stream above, gradually declining, shallow below. He rises with great quickness to seize his prey, and descends as quickly, after making a summerset. He congregates more than the trout, and is not so easily frightened away.

Cotton gives very good directions or ground-bait fishing for grayling; and I think I cannot do better than quote one of them. He says—"The third way of angling by hand, and by much the best of all others, is with a line full as long, or a yard and a half longer, than your rod, with no more than one hair (I should recommend very fine gut) next the hook, and for two or three lengths above it, and no more than one small pellet of shot for your plumb; your hook little, your worms of the smallest brandling, very well scoured, and only one upon your hook at a time, which is to be thus baited—the point of your hook is to be put in at the very tag of his tail, and run up his body quite all over the arming, and still stripped on an inch, at least, upon the hair, the head and remaining part hanging downwards; and with this bait you are evermore to angle in the streams, always in a clear rather than a troubled water, and always up the river, still casting your line out before you, with a light one-handed rod, like an artificial fly: where it will be taken, sometimes at the top or within a very little of the superficies of the water, and almost always before that light plumb can sink it to the bottom, both by reason of the stream and also that you must always keep your worm in motion by drawing it still back towards you, as if you were angling with a fly; and believe me, whoever will try it shall find this the best way of all others to angle with a worm, in a bright water especially."

There is no method more killing for a large grayling than supplying a grasshopper to the point of a leaded hook, the head and shank of which are covered with green and yellow silk, to imitate the body of the animal. This mode of fishing is called sinking and drawing; we have seen it practised with as much success as maggot-fishing, and the fish taken were all of the largest size—the method being most successful in deep holes, where the bottom was not visible, which is the most natural haunts of such fish. I find I shall not have room this week to describe the chub, so shall leave it till next week.

A DISCIPLE OF IZAAC WALTON.

ANOTHER MADAME LAFARGE.—At the assizes of the Rhone, on the 6th instant, the wife of a workman named Pre was tried for attempting to murder him by cutting his throat with a razor. The victim of her fury escaped, bleeding profusely, before she could consummate her crime by repeating the attack, and with skilful attention recovered in less than a month. The motive assigned for this crime in the act of accusation was jealousy, but the evidence left no doubt that the wound was self-inflicted, and had long been labouring under monomonia. On the day of the attack, after some words with her husband, she had requested him to kiss her, and, on his refusing to do so, she seized a razor and drew it across his throat. In her defence she declared she had acted under a momentary impulse, for which she could not account; and it was proved that she was at the time under an impression that she and her four children had been drinking something which would cause death, and that she had attempted to murder her husband in order that the whole family might go out of the world together.

BALLOON ASCENT.—A meteorological society in Paris sent up a balloon on Saturday filled with gas produced by water thrown on burning coal. This was to avoid the expense of employing sulphuric acid. The balloon, very large, went off from M. Selligue's in the Batignolles. M. Duplus Delcour, an old aeronaut, ascended in it. He had not ascended far, however, when he was almost stifled by the gas, as it escaped by the aperture below. The balloon soon descended of itself, and M. Delcour began to recover, till by the heating of the balloon the gas enveloped M. Delcour, and again left him insensible. Being bled, however, he recovered. It was the oxide of carbon in the gas which rendered it so deleterious.

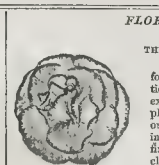
PRUSSIAN SMOKERS.—A Berlin letter states that the police ordonnance, interdicting smoking in the streets or public promenades in that capital, produced, on the 8th instant, a scene of great disorder. As the good people of Berlin are great smokers, many have been arrested and punished for violating this injunction; and on the day above mentioned some people, who were smoking near Hamburgh Gate, were also taken into custody. Upon this the populace assembled and rescued them. A reinforcement of the guard was sent for, and these were assailed with stones and other missiles, which was continued until a stronger military force was called in, and cleared the streets. [This very salutary regulation is worthy of more general adoption; and without wishing in the slightest degree to abet the cause of despotism, we should be glad to see it introduced into England -at least into London. The box seats of our omnibuses and the decks of our steam-boats are positively unendurable from the pestiferous clouds of smoke emitted from those vile rolls of cabbage-leaf, yclept cigars.—ED. I. L. N.]

M. MAINZER, the celebrated popular instructor in singing, has been invited by Father Mathew to visit Ireland, in order to contribute his aid towards the moral reformation in which that great philanthropist has already made such wonderful progress. Father Mathew wisely considers that in order, effectually and permanently to wean the people from a pernicious indulgence, innocent and salutary pastimes must be offered them in exchange for it; and experience has abundantly proved that such, in an eminent degree, is the character of vocal music.

A FATAL PERIOD.—Within the period of 100 hours, observes Galignani's Messenger, three of the greatest calamities of this or any century have occurred: viz. the fire at Hamburgh, on the 5th of May; the earthquake at St. Domingo, on the 7th; and the fatal accident on the Versailles railroad, on the 8th.

A fourth volume of the Collection of Poems, written by the King of Bavaria, has just been published at Munich. It is composed of fugitive pieces, chiefly written in Italy, and inspired by the scenery, or works of art, so beautiful and abundant in that country.

FLORICULTURE.



THE PICOTTEE.

A few weeks since we gave directions for propagating and rearing the Carnation; and the remarks then made are exactly applicable to the culture of the plant we have chosen to treat upon in our present journal—the Picottee being, in fact, but one of the varieties of the first-mentioned flower. There are three classes of Carnations: the Flakes, which are striped in broad bands, with seldom more than two colours, the ground colour white, and the second tint generally of any shade between a deep purple and the palest pink. Bizarres are shaped with three colours, and their main beauty consists in the proportions of the different tints one to the other, and the manner in which these are blended together. The Picottee, the last of the tribe, is a much hardier plant, and is either bordered with a narrow margin or dotted with small spots, the brilliancy of which materially affect the value of the flower. Picottees with a yellow ground do not preserve their character well in this country, and to obtain seed from them is very difficult, if not an impossible task. But as a choice plant becomes prized, in the same proportion to the difficulty of obtaining it, and as cross impregnation is the only means of accomplishing this, it is continually resorted to, notwithstanding its difficulty and the small chance it presents of success.

Observations.—Beds intended for tender annuals and greenhouse plants should be filled up as soon as possible. Tulips may be got up when ripe. Pinks may be propagated. The late rains have been very beneficial in clearing the air of blight; but care should always be taken to protect tender flowers from the heavy showers.

ICEBERGS IN THE ATLANTIC.—Lieutenant Parsons, R.N., superintendent of the mails on board the British and North American Royal Steam-ships, reports, that in the passage out in the Acadia, Captain Alexander Ryrie, on the 16th May, in latitude 46, longitude 47, there were seen about 100 icebergs, some of them of large size, and one from 400 to 500 feet high, bearing so strong a resemblance to St. Paul's, that it was at once christened after that celebrated cathedral. The dome was perfect, and it required no extraordinary stretch of imagination to supply the turrets, pinnacles, and other parts of the building. But this is not the most extraordinary part of the affair; on the homeward passage of the Acadia to Liverpool, on the 6th inst., the same object was seen, and the immediate exclamation on board was, "There is our old friend, St. Paul's." In the interim between the two views, the iceberg had drifted about 70 miles.

The village of Wasserbillig, situated at the conflux of the Sure and the Moselle, in the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg, was destroyed by fire, the church included, on the night of the 11th inst. Only five houses remain standing.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE. The supply of English wheat during the week has been tolerably fair for the season, and the greater part has been cleared off. A large supply of foreign wheat has come to hand within the last few days, and the trade is at present exceedingly dull, buyers confining their purchases to immediate wants.

REPRINT.

A GLANCE AT THE SESSION.

The first session of the Peel Parliament is fast drawing to a close, and we learn that a few more weeks of a merely technical existence, will bring its labours to an end. It may not, in the meanwhile, be amiss to see what those labours have hitherto achieved, and how far the country is likely to be advantaged by the exercise of its legislative powers under the immediate direction of ministers in place. It is with regret, then, that we find our retrospection rather the reverse of cheering, and are forced to admit that a fair examination of the political acts of the session presents but few rays of hope for the future, and but too little reason to glory in the past. We admit all the difficulties of legislating amid the dilemmas which have been so long gathering upon the path of statesmanship, obscuring its vision, obstructing its healthy advances, and demanding the most stern decision—the most vigorous intellect—the most farseeing mental power, as well as the soundest policy and most exalted principle, to cope with them, to grapple and destroy.

But while all these difficulties were full before us, and although we did not expect to see them encountered and mastered by any of our present race of statesmen—no matter of what creed or party—we yet did look with hope, to see the practical experience of our legislators applying some healing remedies to the public distress; we did place some reliance upon the high-sounding promises of the last elections; and we did believe that Sir Robert Peel, with the great and almost unparalleled power of his position, would have enforced measures of conciliation, and sought, while replenishing the coffers of the national treasury, to have studied the constitution of the national mind. The case, however, has, we fear, been otherwise; the minister has made "necessity" his great absorbing and paramount plea for every measure of oppression that he has propounded; and his obedient and well-drilled majorities have made laws for the million that have in them all the elements of tyranny, and but too few of the remedies for want.

It cannot be denied that, by building up the Income Tax in the void of an empty exchequer, a new inquisition is established upon our soil. Some politicians admit its principle as a panacea for dreadful and dire emergencies, but all men fear its operation, and dread its working as a law. Pressing unequally, as it cannot fail to do, as long as toiling industry is to pay its contributions as heavily as realized wealth—goading with most irritating influences—with secrets elicited—trade confidence thrown open and blown abroad—exposures distressingly given, and credit, perhaps, too often destroyed—it seems directly in contradiction to the whole commercial spirit of England; it invades the domesticity of the empire, and is an intrusion into every home, but little compatible with the principles of social liberty, of which it is the character of the nation to be so boastfully proud. It was, in a word, a daring tax to pass—as in these times of trouble it may also be difficult, and even dangerous, to collect.

But, we believe, with all its oppressing disadvantages, even the Income-tax would have been peacefully, though reluctantly, borne, and the Minister might have won forgiveness for its tyranny, had popular concessions been made in other measures to the crying grievances of poverty and public want. The Poor-laws afforded a fine opportunity of presenting to the people a boon of humanity, which they would have accepted with gratitude and hailed with joy.

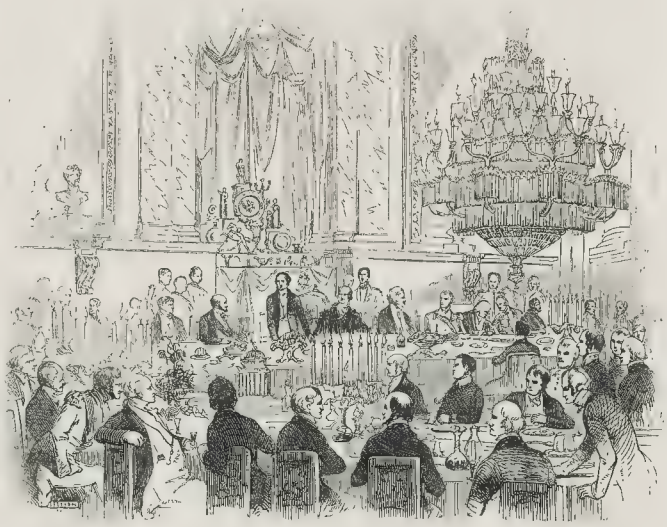
The grinding commission which was expiring might have been crushed at a blow; the Bastille system might have been palsied in its cruel action by clauses of sympathy and indulgence, that would have wooed the affections of the people; and the manhood of the country might have been vindicated in some noble and civilizing enactment that would have wiped a stain from the scutcheon of our constitution, and shed lustre and honour upon Victoria's reign. But all this opportunity was more than avoided—it was sneered at and defied. Ministers took a tone of indomitable strength of purpose to continue, with only trivial modifications, the most obnoxious and unpopular of the English laws, and that at a time when they were almost finding a fellow to it in the dangerous imposition of their new and desperate impost. This the people most bitterly feel—it is the saddest and uneasiest of their disappointments.

On the other hand, we are willing to admit that some concessions have been made to them in the modification of the Corn-law, and the extensive alteration of the Tariff. For both these measures we give the session its meed of praise. With regard to corn, it is possible that no minister under the last elections could have maintained his position if he had attempted any more important changes than that which Sir Robert Peel was successful in achieving; and upon the question of the Tariff, we do sincerely believe, that the reductions effected are both numerous and important, and calculated to lighten the depression of our domestic life. We must not shut our eyes to positive benefits, merely because we are too painfully sensible of positive wrongs.

The measures of Lord Ashley, with regard to mines, collieries, and factories, which have been carried by the commonsense humanity of all parties alike, are boons of legislation, too, for which, although not taking their origin immediately with the Government, we have every reason to be grateful to the State. They are at once civilizing and just—they will elevate thousands in the moral and social scale of being—and they stay, in many of the most popular districts of England, the rapid degeneracy of the human race.

But in these few topics we find all the good that Parliament has achieved for us during the present session, and the rest of the retrospection is full of hopeless and miserable gloom. The Income-tax levied—the Poor-laws stringently reinforced—no great measure devised to relieve the far-spread wretchedness of the lower classes—no relief application to the desperate present want—no lowering of the complaints of poverty—no raising of the spirits of trade. It is further a melancholy reflection that, while the aspect of public affairs is so appallingly frightful, legislation should be not only inactive, and half paralyzed by the dangers in its teeth, but be sacrificing its own dignity, and wasting the nation's time in hopeless brawls and squabbles, arising out of acts of its own corruption, and which its own body were not too scrupulous to commit. The election rows that have been, and are still, in agitation in Parliament, are disgusting scenes, in which the personality is degrading, the disclosures humiliating, the aspersions angry and undignified, and the whole spirit obnoxious to gentlemanly feeling, and unworthy of what should be the deliberate wisdom of a senatorial assembly. With these displays, however, the whole session has been rife, and we look upon that portion of it which they have wasted, with blended indignation and disgust. It is one of the most painful points of contemplation in the progress of public affairs, and grates harshly against the sad condition of the suffering population. While the country is in extremis, with distress-endurance, the lawgivers are squabbling like growlers over a bone.

There are only six weeks to elapse before Parliament will be prorogued; but does not the justice of our observations upon the little that has been done, suggest also an imperative necessity for conceiving and executing in the brief time that remains some enlarged scheme of public good—something to meet the exigencies of the country, to give life and hope to drooping commerce, and, above all, when the doors of St. Stephen's shall close upon the labours of our lawgivers, to carry relief into the hovels of our starving poor. No Minister can afford to be insensible to the voice of popular distress, and weimplore Sir Robert Peel and his powerful Conservative majorities to let it urge them into the carrying of some practical measure of humanity, as the closing act of grace of a session which has been in nearly all the other stages of its existence only too barren of lustre and of good.



BANQUET AT GOLDSMITHS' HALL.

THE GRAND BANQUET TO THE MINISTRY AT GOLDSMITHS' HALL.

On Wednesday the Goldsmiths' Company gave a grand banquet to the Ministry, and by the kindness of Mr. Lane, we are enabled to picture to our readers the regal magnificence of the [illegible] golden [illegible] of the massive [illegible] sparkling [illegible] the Duke of Buccleuch, the Earl of Mountcashel, the splendours of the brilliant illuminations, and the tasteful elegances of the entertainment. The company comprised the following distinguished personages:—

Mr. Prime Warden Buttemar, Mr. Warden Hayne, Mr. Warden Hallifax, and Mr. Warden Ashlin, Sir R. Peel, Sir J. Gra-

Earl of Haddington, the Earl of Lincoln, the Earl of Shaftesbury, the Earl of Ripon, Earl Jermyn, the Marquis of Abercorn, the Marquis of Downshire, Lord Wharncliffe, Lord Ernest Bruce, the Bishop of Llandaff, the Vice-Chancellor, Lord Abinger, Lord Colville, Lord Bexley, Lord Prudhoe, Lord Fitzgerald, Lord Villiers, Lord Sandon, Sir R. Stopford, Sir R. Inglis, Sir G. Seymour, Sir E. Knatchbull, Sir H. Hardinge, Sir B. Vere, Sir H. Holford, Sir T. Fremantle, Sir G. Murray, Sir G. Cockburn, Sir G. Clerk, Sir J. R. Reid, Sir F. Pollock, Sir H. Wheatley, Sir W. Follett, Sir M. A. Shee, Sir Peter Laurie, the Governor and Deputy-Governor of the Bank, the Chairman of the East India Company, the Governor of the Russia Company, Mr. G. Palmer, M.P., Mr. Masterman, M.P., Mr. Lyall, M.P., Mr. Estcourt, M.P., and Mr. Baring.

The usual loyal toasts (it is hardly necessary to say) were proposed and responded to with great enthusiasm.

The Prime Warden then proposed the toast, "Sir Robert Peel and her Majesty's Ministers."

Sir Robert Peel, in returning his acknowledgments, said, he had to express his regret that he should have been prevented from manifesting the punctuality which he desired to display respecting the invitations of the Goldsmiths' Company; but he knew the excuse which he had to urge would be readily received by an assemblage like the present, viz., the performance of public duty (cheers)—duty, the performance of which rather indisposed him to "much speaking." ("Hear, hear," and a laugh.) He could not, however, avoid declaring that he knew of no company entitled to more of public respect, than that of which he had the honour now to be the guest. When he considered the antiquity of their institution, the noble use they made of their wealth, their generous exertions in the cause of education, above all, of religious education, and their princely endowments, (cheers)—he felt the highest regard and esteem for this association, the favour of whose constant support he cordially appreciated (cheers); and in carrying those measures which the Government believed were required for the national welfare, the greatest support they could receive was the confidence of those respectable and enlightened classes of whom this company might be considered the most appropriate representatives. (Cheers.)

The Bishop of Llandaff returned thanks on behalf of the Church, which (his lordship said) strongly felt the public advantage derived from the munificent support religious education received from this company.

The Earl of Haddington returned thanks for the Navy, and Sir H. Hardinge for the Army; the Duke of Buccleuch for the House of Peers, and Sir J. Graham for the House of Commons; and Mr. Recorder Law (the Attorney and Solicitor-General having previously left) for the Judges and the Bar.

Sir R. Peel gave, "The Prime Warden and the Company," which was received with great warmth.

The company (who, in consequence of Sir Robert Peel's late arrival, did not sit down until near half-past eight o'clock) separated shortly before midnight, the general feeling being that a more splendid entertainment could not possibly be given.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.—The French journals of Sunday speak of a check as having been received by the French division at Mitiana, in the interior of Algeria. The reports of the Governor-General are, however, as triumphant as lenathy. The Bey of Tunis is in alarm at the Turkish expedition said to be directed against Tripoli, and fears it may pay him a visit. The French Government, too, displays some anxiety on the score, and some vessels of Admiral Hugon's squadron are, it is said, to sail to Tunis. The possession of Algeria by the French has immensely increased its commercial intercourse and navigation with the other Barbary states; and whilst formerly the English flag was almost seen at Tunis, the French now predominates there, as, perhaps, in a dozen other ports, making quite a commercial revolution on the north coast of Africa. Had Syria fallen under French domination, the progress of this influence would, in a few years, have been alarming.

All other topics or news in the Paris journals of Monday are flung into the shade by an ordonnance, which appears in the Moniteur, augmenting the duties on foreign thread and linen. It raises to full twenty-five per cent., and in some instances to thirty per cent. The report expresses a wish not to include Belgium in the measure, but as the negotiations for concessions in favour of French wine, salt, and silks, were not concluded, the exception in favour of Belgium was suspended.

The Ministerial candidates in the towns of Normandy, and of the Department of the North, trembled for their elections, till the ordonnance augmenting the duty on thread appeared. It has appeared, and the Presse of Tuesday admits that it is an augmentation from ten to thirty per cent, the prices of thread having fallen one-fourth since the old tariff was promulgated. All agree that the new duty is prohibitive, and as the smuggler demands but twenty per cent. premium, he can set to work. But the market is stocked for at least eight months, and there is no knowing what eight months may produce.

The despatches from Algiers are voluminous. All the Generals announce the readiness of different tribes to submit; but the Chef de Bataillon Bisson, who commands at Miliana, gives a very different account. He marched on the 7th of June with 500 men for Mauld Douar, the chief place of a tribe. For three leagues round he left not a house nor a village that was not burned, carrying away the population captive, loading its valuables on mules, and carrying away 10,000 sheep and 6,000 head of cattle.

All these details, more fit for the Gazette des Tribunaux or the Newgate Calendar, are given at length in the official despatch. The French commander was marching home with his booty, when those whose homes had been pillaged and destroyed, assembled to the number of 2000, and flung themselves on the French. The latter defended themselves with their bayonets; the Arabs tried to disarm them. Never were foes so inveterate, says the despatch. The struggle lasted half an hour. At length the Arabs, having lost two hundred of their number, gave breathing time to the French, who instantly took advantage of it to retreat. But the Arabs followed, and harassed them for two hours, forcing them to abandon the cattle, though the prisoners and the valuables, collected on mules, were brought to their camp by the marauders. The French lost five or six of their officers, and as many non-commissioned officers killed, besides a number of wounded.

SPAIN.—We have received by express the Madrid mail and papers of the 19th, but their contents are of no importance, as the following intelligence has been received by the French Government, and is thus given in the Messager:—"The President of the Council laid before the Cortes, on the 20th, the programme of the Cabinet. It will maintain the December pronunciamento. The Ministry had issued orders for the suppression of the factions in Catalonia. It protests against any idea of a bankruptcy. There was no proposition or vote.

Private letters state that the review on the 19th, in honour of the anniversary of the Constitution of 1837, passed off somewhat coldly. The prolongation of the Ministerial crisis is said to have much impaired the Cabinet's popularity, and very few "Vivas" were heard on the occasion. The British embassy was illuminated, but no such demonstration was exhibited at the hotel of the French legation.

The Deputies of the Coalition assembled on the night of the 19th, but their proceedings did not transpire.

The Madrid mail and papers of the 21st, which have reached us by express, contain little news of importance.

In the Senate the Minister of the Interior read the decree nominating Senor Gomez Becerra President of that assembly, upon which Senor Londero resigned the fauteuil and pronounced the customary allocution. The other business was confined to matters of local importance, and presented no feature of interest.

In the Chamber of Deputies Senor Fuentesandres questioned the Government as to whether it was in possession of such documents as would enable it to declare that it had proof that a conspiracy existed at Burgos. The Minister of War replied, that he would give an answer as soon as he had obtained the necessary information on that subject. The remainder of the sitting was of no general interest.

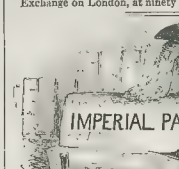
A report is in circulation that the Ministry intends to replace General Van Halen, in order to conciliate the Catalonian Deputies, and it is likewise rumoured that that functionary has been requested to resign.

Several journals have announced that they intend to oppose the Government, and our private letters also mention that the new Cabinet is likely to experience considerable embarrassment from the opposition which will be raised against it by the partisans of the Gonzales administration; a course of proceeding which is expected to cause further disunion in the ranks of the coalition.

Several bills which were brought forward by the late ministry are to be withdrawn, especially those relating to the Ayuntamentos and to the provincial deputations.

At the Madrid Bolsa on the 21st ult., twenty-five bargains were done in the Five per Cents, for a sum of 11,400,000 reals, at 22¾ for cash, and at 23¼ and 30 at sixty and thirty days' date. No other stock quoted.

Exchange on London, at ninety days, 37¾.



HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

Lord DENMAN moved the second reading of the Affirmation Bill, giving the same effect to affirmations as to oaths in the case of any person who stated that he had a conscientious objection to swearing.

The discussion, in which the Earl of Wicklow, the Lord Bishop of London, Lord Campbell, the Earl of Galloway, Lord Abinger, and Lord Brougham, took part, ended in the motion being withdrawn, and the whole subject being referred to a select committee on the motion of the Bishop of London.

The Slave Trade Suppression (Hayti) Bill, the Slave Trade Abolition (Argentine Confederation) Bill, and the Slave Trade Treaties Bill, respectively passed through committee, and the reports were ordered to be received on Wednesday.

The Drainage (Ireland) Bill, and the Railways and Conveyance of Troops Bill were brought up from the Commons, and severally read a first time.

Their lordships then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

Mr. ROEBUCK, as chairman of the election proceedings committee, appeared at the bar, and reported that John Walter, Esq., had refused the summons of that committee to appear and give evidence before it

It was ordered, on the motion of Mr. ROEBUCK, that Mr. Walter attend at the bar to-morrow (Tuesday)

A conversation arose on the statements of Mr COCHRANE and Major BERESFORD, that they had been excluded from the committee-room in which the election proceedings committee held its sittings. The two hon. members regarded this as a breach of the privileges of the house, and appealed to the Speaker.

The Speaker was silent, and Mr. ROEBUCK moved that the documents which he had presented should be printed for the use of members only.—Agreed to.

In answer to a question from Lord Mahon, Sir R. PEEL said, that on Friday, the 14th of July, it was his intention to bring in a bill renewing the Controverted Elections Act.

On the order of the day for the adjourned debate on the Poor law Amendment Bill being read,

Mr. LAWSON declared his intention to support the amendment of the hon. member for Finsbury

The house divided—

For the amendment	37
Against it	156
Majority	—119

Mr. WAKLEY moved the postponement of the first clause until the house should have first decided on the other details of the bill.

For Mr. Wakley's motion	74
Against it	206
Majority	—138

Mr. B. WOOD conceded that there was no necessity for the continuance of the Poor-law Assistant Commission. After some observations, the hon. gentleman moved that, in the lines 19 and 20, the words "assistant commissioners" be left out.

A debate and division ensued:—

For Mr. Wood's motion	45
Against it	228
Majority	—183

The CHAIRMAN reported progress and the house resumed

The report of the Customs Bill was brought up and read, and the bill, with the insertion of an amendment by Mr. Gladstone, the object of which was to reduce the duties on nutmegs, &c., from one shilling to threepence, was ordered to be engrossed.

The report of the British Possessions Abroad Bill was brought up and read.

The New South Wales Bill passed through committee

The Stock in Trade Bill was read a second time.

The District Courts Bill was also read a second time.

The Municipal Corporations Act (Ireland) Amendment Bill was brought up from the Commons, and read a first time.

The Duke of RICHMOND moved, on the suggestion of the Bishop of London, the appointment of a select committee to enquire into the effect of the administration of oaths in judicial proceedings.

The Tithe Commutation Act was read a second time, on the motion of Lord WYNFORD.

The Bill for the Perpetuation of Testimony was read a third time and passed, on the motion of Lord COTTENHAM

On the motion of Lord WHARNCLIFFE, the Argentine Treaty Bill, the Hayti Treaty Bill, and the Slave Trade Suppression Treaty Bill, were read a third time and passed.

A motion by the Earl of MOUNTCASHEL, for the production of certain correspondence relating to the officers of medical charities in Ireland, gave rise to a lengthened debate, at the conclusion of which the noble earl offered to withdraw his motion, but the privilege of doing so was denied to him, and the motion was rejected

The LORD CHANCELLOR laid on the table a bill to prevent inconvenience to counties from the Carnarvon Bridges Bill coming into operation in the middle of a session. The bill was read a first time, and the noble and learned lord gave notice, that on Thursday he would move the suspension of the standing order, to expedite its progress.

Their lordships then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

Captain FITZROY gave notice that on Monday, the 4th of July, he should move for leave to bring in a bill for the better regulation and examination of persons wishing to be appointed to the command of merchant vessels

Mr. STUART WORTLEY brought up a report from the Southampton election committee of inquiry, to the effect that Mr John Benett Lucc had not attended the committee to give evidence, in pursuance of its summons.

It was ordered, on the motion of Mr. WORTLEY, that Mr. John Benett Lucc attend the house on Thursday next

In reply to Mr. HUME, Mr. GLADSTONE said that the coinage of half farthings was intended for the use of the colonies, in some of which inconvenience had been experienced from the want of such a coinage.

In pursuance of the order of the day, John Walter, Esq., was called in, and appeared at the bar.

After Mr. Walter had made his statement, on the call of the SPEAKER, Mr ROEBUCK moved that John Walter, Esq., do attend the committee on elections at eleven o'clock to-morrow (Wednesday).

A debate ensued, and on the division the numbers were—

For the motion	223
Majority	—146

After much further discussion, the question that the resolution to which the house had come be communicated to Mr Walter at the bar of the house was then put and carried, and the Sergeant at Arms was directed to require Mr. Walter's attendance at the bar of the house.

Mr. Walter having come to the bar, the resolution of the house was communicated to him by the SPEAKER, when he bowed and withdrew.

Mr. ROEBUCK then communicated to the house that Mr. Cochrane had refused to attend his committee, and gave notice that he should move to-morrow that Mr. Cochrane be directed to attend before the committee on the following day, to give evidence.

Colonel SIBTHORP gave notice that he should move, when the hon. and learned member for Bath's motion should be brought before the house, that the committee should be discharged.

Mr. ROEBUCK gave notice that he should move to-morrow that it be an instruction to the committee that no member of the house, except the members of the committee, should be allowed to be present at its proceedings.

The order of the day for the third reading of the Customs Duties Bill was then read.

Mr. JERVIS, after several observations, moved the insertion of a clause providing in all cases where coals should have been shipped to foreign ports, and on which coals duty should have been paid on exportation, that a drawback equal to the amount of such duty should be allowed on all coals as should be re-shipped for consumption on board British steam vessels.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER opposed the clause.

After a debate, the house divided—

For the amendment	42
Against it	80
Majority	—38

Mr DUNCOMBE made his promised motion to remove the protective duty on the importation of onion seed. The house divided—

For the original motion	93
For the amendment	63
Majority	—30

Under the head of miscellaneous articles, Mr. T. DUNCOMBE moved to reduce the duty on corks squared for rounding from 16s. a cwt. to 4s

Mr. GLADSTONE opposed the motion, and the house divided—

For the original motion	110
For the amendment	74
Majority	—36

On the question that the bill do pass, Lord J. RUSSELL said that the bill was a great improvement on the commercial system of the country; but it did not go far enough. "Whilst, then," said the noble lord, "I cordially assent to the passing of this bill, I deeply lament that a great opportunity has been lost, and great powers have been thrown away; and that, whilst you have been establishing sound principles as to many articles of commerce, the greatest and most important article have been left out of the tariff, and are still subject to a duty of 30 or 40 per cent., and in some cases even to prohibition

Sir R. PEEL replied in detail to the observations of the noble lord, and concluded in these words:—"I am not without hope, by parity of examination or individual censure, the acquiescence with which the tariff has on all sides been received, and I will but it unless with the earnest hope that, doing as little injury as we can, a change can be effected by it, may promote the commerce of the country, and give a new and a wide opening for its industry. This is my earnest hope, and, if such is the result, there can have been no labour on the part of her Majesty's Government which will not then be most abundantly repaid." The conclusion of the right hon. baronet's speech was followed by great cheers.

After some further discussion upon the details of the bill, it was read a third time and passed, amidst loud cheering.

On the motion for the third reading of the British Possessions Abroad Bill, Mr. LABOUCHERE brought up the clause, of which he had given notice, to allow the free importation of flour from the United States to Canada

Mr. GLADSTONE opposed the clause, which was negatived on a division, the numbers being—

For the clause	83
Against it	160
Majority against the clause	—77

Mr. M GIBSON moved that the clause which subjected sugar refined in this country in bond and exported to the colonies to an ad valorem duty of 10 per cent be struck out.

Mr. GLADSTONE opposed the motion, and the house divided—

For the clause	135
Against it	36
Majority	—99

The bill then passed.

The Stock in Trade Bill, and the District Courts and Prisons Bill, passed through Committee

A select committee to inquire into the allegations as to the management of the poor in the Keighley Union, contained in the report of Sir John Walsham and Mr. Mott was agreed to on the motion of Sir C. NAPIER.

The house then adjourned

HOUSE OF LORDS.—WEDNESDAY.

The house did not sit.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER announced the house that he had received a communication from DANIEL HENRY FARREL, Esq., that it was not his intention to defend his seat for Ashboe, on the petition presented against his return.

In reply to Dr BOWRING, Sir R. PEEL said that the five powers were unanimous in their representations to the Turkish Government in favour of a mild administration of the affairs of that Government in Syria, and that their representations to the Egyptian Viceroy all of the force which was consistent with the independence of the Turkish Government—the main and primary object of the treaty of London.

The Justices Jurisdiction Bill, sent from the Lords, was read a first and second time, the standing order having been suspended, on the motion of Sir J. Graham.

In the course of the discussion upon this bill, Mr. T. Duncombe interjected some observations on the subject of the board of guardians of the city of Norwich having been compelled to issue money orders of the amount of ten shillings each, in consequence of the scarcity of silver coin; to which the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER replied that he had not heard anything of the matter.

Mr. ROEBUCK made a long speech in support of his motion, that the election compromise committee should not be open even to members of Parliament.

Major BERESFORD said that their private inquiry, and their exclusion of the reporters, was worthy only of those times when the chair was occupied by a Lee.

Colonel SIBTHORP said that he should take the sense of the house on the motion of which he had given notice, that the order for appointing the committee on election proceedings be forthwith discharged.

Lord J. RUSSELL could not consent to exclude members of Parliament from the committee-room.

Sir R. PEEL would not vote for the motion of his hon. and gallant friend (the member for Lincoln), because he did not think it would have been creditable to the house to refuse inquiry into the allegations which had been made, and, if there were objections to the present mode of inquiry, they ought to have been urged before. With respect to the presence of members not upon the committee, he thought it best to leave that to their individual delicacy and discretion.

After some discussion, in which every speaker scouted the Star Chamber proceeding of Major Beresford's hon. member for Bath, the latter withdrew.

The house then divided on the amendment of the hon member for Lincoln—

For the amendment	55
Against it	177
Majority against the amendment	—122

Mr. ROEBUCK moved that the hon. member for Bridport, Mr. R. COCHRANE, do attend before the select committee on election proceedings, at eleven o'clock on Monday next, and give evidence.

Mr. COCHRANE powerfully appealed to the house on the injustice of the whole proceeding, and mentioned several circumstances to show his monstrous injustice in respect to himself

Sir R. PEEL thought that much consideration was required before the house, contrary to its usual practice, should compel a member to appear to give evidence before a committee. The right hon. baronet would wish to hear the opinion of the Speaker upon this question.

The SPEAKER cited several cases in which the house had directed that members should be examined before committees if they so thought fit; but had sought in vain for precedents of a peremptory order to a member to submit to be so examined.

Sir R. PEEL suggested the appointment of a committee to search for precedents.

Lord JOHN RUSSELL, after several remarks from other members, all tending to show the anomalous and difficult position in which the house actually stood, suggested that the debate should be adjourned till to-morrow (Thursday) or Friday.

After some further discussion, the debate was adjourned until Monday.

On the motion of Sir R. PEEL, the following members were then nominated a committee to search for precedents affecting the question, and to report them to the house:—Lord J. Russell, Mr. Goulburn, Sir G. Grey, Sir G Clerk, Sir R. H. Inglis, Mr. C. Wood, Sir J. C. D. Acland, Mr. Bernal, and Mr. Greene.

On the motion of Mr. MACKINNON, the order of the day for the motion to issue a new writ for South-ampton was postponed for a fortnight

The discussion on the second reading of the Sudbury Disfranchisement Bill had merely commenced, when the house was counted out

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY

The royal assent was given by commission to several bills.

The Customs Duties Bill was brought up from the House of Commons and read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time on Tuesday next.

The Duke of WELLINGTON stated that the present Government intended to act up to the spirit of the understanding of the late Administration in respect to advances of money for carrying on public works in Canada.

In reply to a question from Lord Kinnaird, the Duke of WELLINGTON said that the money which had been collected in virtue of the Queen's letter had been placed in the hands of the manufacturers' relief committee.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

Sir R. PEEL, after presenting at the bar papers, by command of her Majesty, thus alluded to the conduct of the French Government respecting the slave-trade treaty.—"These are treaties with Texas, respecting which some questions were put to me a few nights ago These treaties were suggested and concluded with the republic of Texas by the late Government, and, acting upon the general principle that is always followed on occasions of this nature, her Majesty's Government, seeing that the agents engaged in the negociations of these treaties had in no degree exceeded their powers or instructions, have felt it to be their duty to rec mmend their ratification

Mr. GLADSTONE said that, in consequence of additional information recently communicated to Government, the duty upon English cement stone in the new tariff would undergo reconsideration

Sir R. PEEL (in answer to Mr. Wallace) said it was not the intention of Government to alter the standard of value in this country.

Lord MAHON called the attention of the House to a petition relating to the drama; and then moved for copies of any communications which have been addressed upon the subject of the drama to the Secretary of State for the Home Department in the course of the present year.

Agreed to.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY

The Royal Assent was given to day, by commission, to the Justices Jurisdiction (No. 2) Bill, the Copyright Bill, the Public-houses Regulation Bill, the Municipal Corporations (Ireland) Amendment Bill, and the North American Colonial Association Regulation Bill.

The Duke of LEINSTER and Earl of MOUNTCASHELL presented petitions from the Medical Association of Ireland, praying to be exempted from the supervision of the Poor Law Commissioners

Lord Radnor moved for certain returns relative to the importation of corn.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL moved, and Lord JOHN RUSSELL concurred, that the Bribery Bill should be referred to a select committee.

The house resolved itself into a committee of supply.

Mr. WALLACE brought forward his resolutions relative to the depression of trade, and the distress which prevailed among the labouring classes. The honourable member gave, at great length, details —unfortunately too well known—of the wretched state of destitution in our manufacturing districts; and the almost utter hopelessness, at present, of any amelioration.

Sir J. GRAHAM opposed the resolutions; and

Mr. ATTWOOD spoke of "the cautious" of the ministers; and said "there was a deeper and a greater evil, a danger that the distress of the country should meet with nothing but apathy from the Government."

Lord J. RUSSELL thought the resolutions would be useless, if passed.

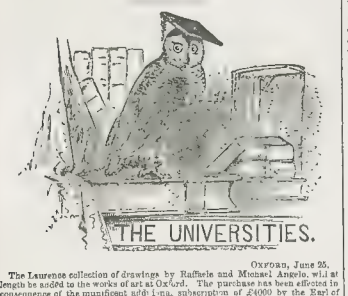
Sir R. PEEL greatly regretted the distress, and said it was not in the power of Parliament to remedy it

The debate was adjourned to Monday.

Several bills were forwarded a stage.

The Mines and Collieries Bill was read a third time, after several unsuccessful divisions, in order to obtain an adjournment of the question

A bill to amend the 1st and 4th Victoria, c. 91, for regulating lunatic manufactories in Ireland, was read a first and second time and passed through committee —Adjourned.



OXFORD, June 25.

The Laurence collection of drawings by Raffaele and Michael Angelo, which at length be added to the works of art at Oxford. The purchase has been effected in consequence of the munificent subscription of £4000 by the Earl of Eldon, and by a reduction of £3000 by Messrs. Woodburn from the original price.

The Rev. James A. Dunnage, of Brasennose College, has been appointed assistant chaplain to the Tower of London.

The Masters and Fellows of University College have presented the REV. P. G. Cheshire, of their society, to the valuable rectory of Eldon, in the county of Hantingdon.

The Rev. Alexander H. Bridges, of Oriel College, has been presented to the vicarage of St Mark, Horsham, in the county of Sussex.

The Rev. J. C. Pring, of New College, has been appointed chaplain to the union at Headington, near this city.

PROVINCIAL.

EXTENSIVE FIRES IN THE PROVINCES.

During the past week fires of a most destructive description have occurred at Lambourn, Chilton, Maldon, Bridgewater, and several other parts of the provinces, attended with vast destruction of property:—

The fire at Lambourn, in Wiltshire, took place at about one o'clock in the morning of Tuesday week, and in the course of two or three hours between twelve and fourteen houses were burned to the ground. It commenced on the premises belonging to Mr. Taylor, an extensive plumber and glazier, in High-street, supposed to have been occasioned through a smelting furnace, which adjoined the building at the back. After great exertion on the part of the inhabitants, the fire was by six o'clock entirely subdued.

On Saturday night, shortly before twelve o'clock, an extensive fire occurred at Heybridge Hall, the seat of a gentleman named Butler, about two miles from Maldon. Although it was most immediately discovered, and the alarm given, the ravages were truly terrible, for within an hour a spacious granary, upwards of 250 feet in length, was completely consumed, as well as its contents, consisting of corn, and an immense quantity of farming implements of considerable value.

On Thursday morning week a large potter, belonging to Messrs Broade and Co., at Bridgewater, upwards of one hundred and fifty feet in height, was totally destroyed by fire.

On the same day a similar disastrous calamity occurred in the village of Landon, near Cowbridge.

That at Clifton, near Abingdon, took place at two o'clock on Sunday morning, on the estate belonging to Mr. Thaxted, and caused the total destruction of the whole homestead.

Other fires happened in the course of the week, at Delstone, near Exeter; at Horncastle; and at Melton Mowbray, near Stamford. The extent of damage is stated to be several thousand pounds.

BRIGHTON.—The anniversary of her Majesty's coronation was celebrated here with the usual demonstrations of loyalty. In the morning a merry peal was rung on the bells in the venerable tower of St. Nicholas, a royal salute was fired at the battery at one o'clock, and a fête took place at the Gardens, which were splendidly lighted up in the evening by Mr. Cheesman, in the Vauxhall style. From 1500 to 2000 persons were present.

COWES, ISLE OF WIGHT, TUESDAY.—Her Majesty the Queen Dowager is not likely to pass the autumn on this island, as there is not a house to be had capable of accommodating the members of the royal household. However, Highcliffe, Lord Stuart de Rothsay's seat, near Christchurch, is being treated for with every prospect of success, and will perhaps eventually be the residence of her Majesty for six months. The movements of the Royal Yacht Squadron have, considering the early period of the season, the commodore's flag having been hoisted only a fortnight, not been devoid of interest; and altogether, from the addition of several noblemen and gentlemen to the club, a more than ordinary good summer is anticipated. The commodore, the Earl of Yarborough, is expected on Thursday, his lordship's yawl, Kestrel, being fitted out for his reception. The noble earl intends to sail shortly for Gibraltar and the Mediterranean, on a cruise for six months.

PRESENTATION OF AN ADDRESS TO THE HON. EDWARD EVERETT, THE AMERICAN MINISTER.—A numerous and respectable meeting of the merchants and manufacturers of Manchester and its vicinity took place on Saturday the 20th instant, in the Boroughreeve's-room, at the Town-hall, for the purpose of presenting to the Hon. E. Everett, the American Minister, an address on the occasion of his visit to Manchester. The address was signed by 380 firms and individuals. Among those present we observed Mark Philips, Esq., M.P., G. W. Wood, Esq., M.P., Sir Thomas Potter, Robert Gardner, Esq., Henry Ashforth, Esq., John Brooks, Esq., and many of the leading merchants of the neighbourhood. The room was much crowded. Robert Hyde Greg, Esq., was unanimously called to the chair, and was deputed by the meeting to introduce the distinguished visitor, who shortly afterwards entered the room amidst loud cheers, accompanied by Alexander Henry, Esq., of Woodlands, at whose house he has been sojourning during the meeting of the Association. The Chairman having read the address, which was exceedingly neat and appropriate, his Excellency made a suitable and elegant reply, during which the hon. gentleman was loudly cheered, and those passages in which he alluded to the hope of increased commercial intercourse between the two countries were so warmly responded to by the meeting, that Mr. Everett must have felt how deeply the people of Manchester sympathise with the wish for the removal of all fiscal regulations which interfere with the trade between England and America

LYMINGTON, HANTS.—The long established mail between this town and Southampton will be taken off the road on the 10th of next month. The country post-bags will after that period be conveyed with the London mail-bags. This will give the inhabitants of this town the advantage of two hours longer to answer their Western correspondence. Their cross-post letters will also reach this town two hours earlier in the morning than they do at present

COMMERCE OF LIVERPOOL. The usual yearly comparative statement of the rates and duties received in the years ending on the 24th of June, 1841 and 1842, has been published. The total income of the trust was, in 1842, £198,782; in 1841, £155,261; increase in 1842, £2296. The duties on tonnage were, in 1842, £33,291; in 1841, £31,755; increase in 1842, £1536. The duties on goods were, in 1842, £83,871; in 1841, £33,750; increase in 1842, £121. The number of vessels which entered the docks in 1842 was 16,458; in 1841, 16,108; increase, 350. The tonnage entered, in 1842, to 2,452,319; in 1841, 2,425,461; decrease, 142. The result is, that during a year of very great depression in trade and commerce, the port of Liverpool has not only maintained its trade, but slightly increased it, as shown by the dock revenue returns.—Liverpool Albion.

SHOCKING DEPRAVITY.—On Friday week John Wilson, a weaver, at Darvel, set fire to his own dwelling-house, and, but for the activity of the neighbours, there would have been a loss of life and property. It appears that Wilson, who is a man about 70 years of age, had had a quarrel with his son, a lad about 13 years of age, who took refuge in a garret of his father's house, and the unnatural parent, to obtain his revenge upon his offspring, actually set fire to the thatch of the house in order to drive the lad from his hiding-place. The perpetrator of the malicious deed was taken into custody on Saturday, and brought to Kilmarnock; and, after undergoing an examination before the Procurator Fiscal here, was transmitted on Tuesday to Ayr Gaol.—Kilmarnock Paper.

MELANCHOLY ACCIDENT AT THETFORD.—THREE LIVES LOST.—On the 15th instant an inquest was held before Henry Rogers, Esq., coroner for the borough of Thetford, on the body of James Arbon, aged nine years, who, while bathing, went out of his depth, and was drowned. Verdict, "Accidental death." On the same day a party of tradesmen went on a fishing excursion to a lake about four miles from Thetford, called Foulmire Pit. Mr. Goodbody, of the King's Arms Inn, and Mr. E. Craske, junior, baker, with Mr. Hancock, were in a boat, when it swamped; the two former were drowned, and the latter gained the shore in a state of complete exhaustion, from which, however, he had recovered. Every effort was made, but the bodies could not be found until midnight, when all attempts at resuscitation would have been use.ess.

CAPTURE OF A BURGLAR.—On Sunday night last Mr. Joseph Bailey, of Manningham, near Bradford, had a most desperate conflict with a burglar whom he detected in the act of seizing his watch, which hung at the head of his bed. Mr. Bailey was awakened by the noise, and without saying a word, or making the slightest exclamation, he sprung out of bed and seized the intruder by the collar. A desperate struggle ensued, both being powerful men, and pretty equally matched, until at length they came to the edge of the chamber steps, when they rolled to the bottom. Although severely bruised in the descent, Bailey never relaxed his hold of the robber; and the struggle was continued with equal determination on both sides in the lower floor for some minutes. At length they got out in the garden in front of the house, when Bailey broke the silence, and by his repeated cries alarmed two of his neighbours, who came out in their undress, and assisted him to secure the thief. The prisoner was searched, and upon his person were found no less than thirty-one skeleton keys, for opening cupboards, desks, &c., two brace-bits, one of which fitted a hole newly made in the back door, and a dark lantern. The drawers in every part of the house had been ransacked, and a number of articles were packed ready to be conveyed away. The watch was found on the chamber floor; and a pocket-book, containing £30 in cash, wrapped up in a waistcoat.

Dublin, June 27.

DREADFUL ACCIDENT TO THE MARQUIS AND MARCHIONESS OF WATERFORD.—The following hasty particulars, as they appear in the Mail of this evening, will be read with deep and universal sorrow:—"With unmixed feelings of grief we announce the following deplorable and truly melancholy accident. On Saturday evening, at eight o'clock, while the Marquis of Waterford was driving his young and lovely bride through the grounds of Curraghmore in a phaeton, the horses, high mettled and spirited, took head, and ran off a distance of nearly three miles, when the carriage was upset, both were thrown out, and, dreadful to relate, the Marchioness's skull was fractured, and the Marquis is grievously, if not fatally, injured. Of the life of the former, we regret to say, scarcely any hopes are entertained. Thus, in the full enjoyment of health and happiness, on the very threshold, as it were, of connubial and domestic bliss and felicity, she fell into a swoon, out of which she did not recover until two o'clock on Sunday morning.

We are happy to perceive by the following extract from the Morning Post of Thursday, that the above account is considerably exaggerated:—"The marchioness received two severe cuts, not dangerous, on the head. After having been bled, her ladyship, according to the latest advices, remained composed, and happily without fever, though of course very weak and languid. The marquis received some contusions, but none of them serious. His lordship has never left his lady's bed-side since the accident. The escape of Lord Waterford was quite extraordinary; he fell between the horses while they were most violently plunging, and that he escaped unscathed is no common degree, may be gathered from the fact that one of them is dead, and the other not expected to survive. Lady Stuart de Rothsay, the mother of the noble marchioness, has been sent for express from Highcliffe, and intends to set off for Curraghmore this morning."

PARTY PROCESSIONS IN IRELAND.—The Lord Lieutenant has caused a circular letter to be issued to the magistrates of the North, on the subject of the approaching anniversary of the Battle of the Boyne. Relying upon the good sense of the men of the north, whose experience has taught them wisdom, his Excellency has not issued any prohibitory mandate against processions or party demonstrations. He is abstaining from doing so, it is stated in official communication, "arises from a confident hope and expectation that a spirit of obedience to the laws may lead to a discontinuance of processions of every kind which can tend to excite party and religious animosity, and which have been so repeatedly attended with consequences of a disastrous character."

A PROTESTANT CLERGYMAN REFUSING TO PAY TITHES!—We have been informed that a Protestant clergyman was processed at the Ballymore Quarter Sessions, at the suit of the Attorney-General, for an arrear of tithe composition, and that his reverence took defence, and was so fortunate as to defeat the first law officer of the crown. Thus, it seems that even the ministers of the church by law established, are not enamoured of tithes, if they should be required to pay them out of their own pockets. —Sligo Champion.

DISTRESS IN IRELAND.—In a letter addressed to Sir Robert Peel by Dr. M'Hale, Roman Catholic Archbishop of Tuam, on the deplorable condition of the peasantry in the west of Ireland, he says, "Numbers in this very neighbourhood, go to bed without tasting a morsel of food during the entire day, and some pass the second, doomed to the same experience!

SPORTING INTELLIGENCE.

GRAND OARS WAGER FOR A PURSE OF SOVEREIGNS GIVEN BY THE DUKE AND DUCHESS OF BUCCLEUCH.

Amidst the various aquatic amusements which have been presented for the entertainment of the public there has been none this season more attractive than the regatta of Tuesday last. His Grace the Duke of Buccleuch added to his banquet a treat of no ordinary character as regarded aquatics, and with a desire to afford his distinguished visitors a grand display of science on the river, gave in honour of her Majesty's coronation, on this its anniversary, a purse of sovereigns to be contended for by watermen of established fame, and so arranged, as regarded distance, that the principal part of the race might be viewed from the lawn and mansion itself in Whitehall. The race was with sixteen pair of oars, three heats, the two first boats in the first heat, and the two first boats in the second heat, being entitled to row in the third and grand heat.

The distance was to start from buoys laid down facing the Duke's mansion, up round Feetham's-road, facing the Houses of Parliament, down round Dogleish's-road, and finish at the Duke's. The distance being round over twice. The start for the first heat was very good; blue took the lead, closely followed by stripes, yellow making all the way up a fair third. Blue rounded Feetham's-road half a length in advance, and stripes next, but in coming down against the tide the latter fouled the piles of the new Houses of Parliament, and threw themselves all in the rear, and yellow took the second place. Blue continued the lead, winning by four or five lengths. Yellow was second about the same distance in advance of stripes, who third.

The second heat was a sporting heat, and took the attention of sporting men to a much greater extent than the other.

Pink won the heat by six lengths; black second, white third.

Her Majesty arrived shortly after this heat; and the assembled thousands having been informed of this circumstance, every foot of land and craft from which a bird's eye view could be obtained was filled. The whole of the barges which had been moored off sewer's, Millbank, return down the Middlesex shore, round a boat moored off Hungerford, and back to Westminster-bridge. The heat was rowed without much change. Pink (the bearers of the champion of the Thames) took the lead, and kept it, and after a sharp race between yellow and blue, the former came in second, the latter third, white being fourth, and green fifth.

At half-past six, the combatants having refreshed, yellow, pink, white, and blue started for the grand heat, to row from Westminster-bridge down round the police brig off Strand-lane, up to Vauxhall-bridge, and back to Westminster. Yellow took the lead for a few yards, when pink came up, and, after a sharp conflict, passed them. Blue and white got scull and scull, but the leading boats drew gradually away; pink retained her lead throughout, and won by four or five lengths: yellow was second.

FULHAM REGATTA.

A very excellent rowing match took place on Tuesday, at Fulham, amongst the watermen pulling from Putney-bridge, many of whom distinguished themselves as first-rate scullers. The contest was for a purse of sovereigns, liberally subscribed by the nobility and gentry resident at Fulham and Putney. The contest was with nine pairs of sculls, in four heats; the two first boats of each heat being entitled to row for the grand heat.

The distance was from Putney-bridge up, round a boat moored off the Crab-tree, down round a boat moored off the Broom-houses, up through the centre arch of the bridge.

Phelps, whose colour was green, won the first prize.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY AQUATIC CLUB.—Last week the members of this club held their annual four-oared race for their silver oars and embroidered flag. Owing to the unpropitious state of the weather for such amusements, the competitors were not so numerous as on former occasions.

CRICKET. MARYLEBONE CLUB v. THE COUNTY OF SUSSEX.—The match between eight gentlemen and three players of the Maryleboue Club and four gentlemen and seven players selected from the several districts of the county of Sussex, was commenced at Lord's on Monday, and terminated on Tuesday afternoon in favour of the latter by a majority of 145 runs. This is the first defeat the Marylebone Club has sustained this season.

THE TURF.—The statement with reference to Lanercost having been poisoned, or drugged, previous to his race for the Ascot cup, remains in statu quo as far as regards Mr. Kirby. That gentleman has constituted himself with making an unsupported assertion. Some one, either at the instance of John Scott—or in the spirit that incites the question, and thus accounts for the defeat of Lanercost:—"If Mr. Kirby wants to know why he was beaten, I will tell him; the horse had run a very severe race at Chester, when the ground was hard, and having naturally bad feet, suffered accordingly. Mr. Scott had them pared down and bled; but the ground continuing hard, he had not sufficiently recovered, and consequently was not well to run, and as neither the owner nor trainer had tried him, both remained in perfect ignorance as to his merits." This is evidently written by a person in possession of the facts of the case.—Morning Herald.

THE CAPERCAILZIE.—The "cock of the north," this noble fine plumaged rara avis, with the capercailzie hen, presented by the Marquis of Breadalbane to the Duke of Hamilton, and placed for dick Castle, has been finely preserved. Last year eggs were placed under moor game for hatching, and as there was no shooting in Arran, and all the game strictly preserved, it is probable that some young capercailzies may be seen in the forests or in the mountains. This season proper care has been bestowed to get more eggs hatched, of game gradually becoming abundant in Arran. The moor-fowl and black game are this season remarkably plentiful.—Kilmarnock Journal.

THE CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. I.

ST. MARTIN'S-IN-THE-FIELDS.

As the commencement of a series of sketches of the Churches of the Metropolis, we cannot select one more worthy of the exertions of the artist, or the gratification of the reader, than the one of which a view is given at the head of the present article—St. Martin's-in-the-Fields. We need not speculate on the years that have elapsed since that portion of its name which was given it as a distinction became a complete misnomer. We are not particularly disposed "to babble of green fields," to sigh over the growth and spread of that mighty city which, if it usurps something on nature, yet speaks of the irrepressible energies of man. There is a balance of good in all things; and it may be questioned whether the conversion of country to town has not created more human happiness than would have existed had it remained country still. Bricks and mortar form but a dingy combination; chimneys are less picturesque than waving branches; and hard flagstones are less pleasant to the tread than a green turf enamelled with daisies; and, as a whole, our common street and domestic architecture is about the ugliest and most repulsive on the face of the earth. Yet, in spite of all regrets, utility predominates, and use and necessity banish the beautiful. It is a matter in which society obeys its own impulses, as careless of the regrets of poetry, as if they were but the echoes of the pipings of Arcadia; and society is right.

But, faint as our rural sympathies may be, we do lament that the spread of the great city has been so utterly remorseless and unsparing, that it has left the "sunny spots of greenery" so very few and far between. Some cases we would fain have had left amid the hard and arid expanse of pavement and dwelling, and in those spots we would have placed our CHURCHES. The sanctity of worship seems to require something at least of seclusion; we know nothing that jars more disagreeably with our better feelings than the position of most of the metropolitan churches. Surrounded on all sides by the abodes of men, and hemmed in by their paths, the echoes of feet passing in the ceaseless pursuit of gain, or even of crime, are never silent around their walls. The world, in all its gorgeous pride, or squalid misery, cannot be kept even a pace from their threshold; it seems as if Mammon had grudged that even the space they occupy should have been rescued from its grasp, and dedicated to Heaven.

St. Martin's-in-the-Fields is no exception to these remarks. It stands in the highway of traffic, and, as we look at it, we frequently wish that some portion of the "fields" it once stood in, had been preserved, and that, like so many of the churches scattered over the face of our fair isle, it stood embosomed in stately trees. Its noble portico is worthy of a Grecian grove.

There is nothing very remarkable in its history, except that both that and its predecessor have been peculiar objects of royal munificence. It is dedicated to an Hungarian saint, for what reason has never been discovered, for the origin of the old church, that stood on the same site, is lost in oblivion. That it must have dated far back, is evident from the fact, that there are authentic records of a dispute, in 1222, between the Abbot of Westminster and the Bishop of London, as to which of them had jurisdiction over it: how long it had then been a religious edifice is not known; but we think it likely that it was then first built, and was claimed by both dignitaries, for it stands on debateable ground, beween London and Westminster.

It is supposed then to have been a chapel for the monks of Westminster, when they visited their "Convent Garden," which then extended to it. The pious brethren would stare, if they could visit that "Convent Garden" now! Pleasant and profitable, doubtless, were the walks in the "garden," and the meditations in the "chapel;" but the time came which deprived the monks of Westminster both of one and the other. They fell to Henry VIII., who, with more than his usual consideration in such matters, built a small church on the site of the chapel at his own expense.

As population increased, the small church grew smaller in proportion to it, and in 1607 it was enlarged, by the addition of a spacious chancel, built at the expense of Prince Henry and some of the Nobility.

Time passed on, and this too fell to decay; till, after many expensive repairs, it was taken down, and the first stone of the present structure laid, in 1721. And an elegant building it is, though the praise must be chiefly confined to the portico, the proportions of which are said to have been taken by the architect (Gibbs) from the remains of an ancient temple at Nismes in France. It was completed and consecrated in 1726, when George I. gave a hundred guineas to the workmen, in addition to £27,441 10s. 4d., which he contributed to the building, and a further sum of £1500 for the organ. This is a liberality so creditable to the character of a King not said to have been remarkable for that virtue, that we have thought it unjust to diminish the credit of it, even by the odd fourpence. The whole cost was £69,821, of which more than £30,000 was granted by Parliament, and the rest made up by voluntary subscriptions.

The portico, as above stated, has been often and justly admired. The effect is injured by the steps being imperfect, the north side of the porch being on higher ground than the southern; but this being unavoidable is rather a misfortune than a fault. Six fine Corinthian columns support a pediment which contains the royal arms in bas relief. Pilasters of the same order extend round the building. The roof is concealed by a handsome balustrade in good keeping with the rest of the building. It is admired by every one possessed of any taste, and has now the advantage of standing in contrast with the National Gallery, a building which no one with any taste can admire at all.

The interior of St. Martin's is not so superior in its arrangement as to leave all other churches behind it, as may be said with regard to its exterior front. The body of the church is the usual quadrangle, the galleries and side aisles divided off by pillars; there is no approach to a nave, and the square form is only broken by the recess in which the altar is placed. The ceiling is richly carved, and the chief beauty of the interior may be said to be the lightness with which the roof springs from the pillars. The fittings up are good and substantial, having that general appearance which speaks the weekly presence of wealth, indicating that the inhabitants are proud of their church, and have no Braintree-like aversion to church-rates, or that they are not wanted to an edifice so royally founded.

The living is in the patronage of the Bishop of London, and is held by the Rev. Sir Henry Dukeinfield.

POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No. III.

MR. R. COBDEN, M.P.

Mr. Cobden is one of those men of the age to whom enterprise and industry have brought wealth, the Reform Bill gave the chance of becoming a senator, and whom the election of last year converted into one. He is a man of some talents, and extreme opinions; but whatever power he possesses he is enabled to make use of, by a better command of temper, and a higher bearing as a member of the House, than is exhibited by his special opponent, Mr. Ferrand.

We have taken Mr. Cobden this week, not so much from the actual position he occupies in the estimation of the public, as that he is a very fair specimen of the class of men who are considered by many as representing the opinions of the manufacturing interest, though this is not entirely the case. He is also the contrast as well as the opponent of Mr. Ferrand. One follows in the wake of the sentimental school of politicians, who paint the condition of the rural population as a modern revival of the age of gold, and babble of their enjoyment of the green fields and fresh air, as if these gave all things necessary to life; forgetting that breezes are not bread, and that the lot of the farm-labourer is not one of idleness and sunshine. Mr. Cobden has no sympathy with such dreams as these, and probably regards cotton-spinning as the natural destiny of the human race, and calico-producing as the whole duty of man. Mr. Ferrand hates with a most bitter hatred the Anti-Corn-law League, the men belonging to it, and the publications issuing from it; they and it are alike abominations to him. In the Anti-Corn-law League Mr. Cobden sees the hope and safety of the nation, and disseminates its principles with all the energy of an enthusiast, and the policy of a leader.

There are other points of difference between them no less decisive, if not quite so salient; "they could not stall together for the whole world."

We do not contrast the opinions of these men, from any great importance we attach to either of the individuals holding them; but, with some modifications, they are those of two classes, the very Capulets and Montagues of politics, who, if they meet, can "scarce escape a brawl."

The men of land, and the influence land gives them, are not yet reconciled to the presence among them of that class of which Mr. Cobden is so undoubted a representative. In the instances of the men of manufacturing or trading wealth who were formerly in the House of Commons, some modification was undergone, which kept trade at one remove from the nobility of acres, by a baronetcy, or a retirement from business; but now men are found in the House, with the very dust of their factories and the air of the counting-house clinging to them; the consequence is, a continual jealousy between the two parties, which not unfrequently breaks through the etiquette of Parliament. Thus, when Mr. Cobden drew up the time-table of the House, and specified the hours at which honourable gentlemen might be found coming down in "white waistcoats" from their "dinner parties," to disturb, and not promote, the progress of legislation, there was, probably, something of the excluded man, as well as of the patriot, in his denunciation. The "dinners," from which the others came were, he well knew, to him inaccessible; for the social gulf between the two parties is even wider than that fixed by their respective politics; nor does wealth make it passable. The "blue spirits and grey," of the Legislature do not mingle;" they meet in Parliament only to differ; and if they are jostled together in private life, it is but to "pass by on the other side." We do not mean to imply that these conventionalities are much regarded by Mr. Cobden; a man of his cast of mind is probably indifferent to them; but a knowledge that the feeling does exist between the two classes may add a little bitterness to political differences, and, in the affair above mentioned, we thought it was slightly perceptible.

MR. R. COBDEN, M.P.

Mr. Cobden sits for the borough of Stockport, and as a debater occupies a very creditable position in the House. He is a close reasoner, very seldom going beside the question, or losing sight of the main points of his own or an opponent's argument. He has sufficient power of declamation to impart energy to his manner, but he is never led away by it, or falls into that style which invariably meets with the greatest contempt from the House—that of the loud-tongued, empty ranter. He is always well prepared to support his statements, and generally has with him a formidable array of documents, as may be seen by a glance at his hat, in our sketch—that article of dress being much in vogue, as an impromptu secretaire, with our legislators, who are not provided, as in the American Congress, with desks.

It is a creditable tribute to his abilities, that he generally commands the attention of the House; and if he has failed to convince the Premier of the expediency of the policy laid down by the Anti-Corn-law League, it is not because the right hon. baronet has failed to listen to him. In short, his style, matter, and manner of speaking, may be very well conceived by the reader, if he takes our description of Mr. Ferrand, and exactly reverses it.

Mr. Cobden has no inconsiderable degree of literary reputation; his "Letters of a Manchester Manufacturer," on Russia, Poland, and Turkey, being well known to those interested in the topics they treat on; he has also, we believe, contributed frequently to "Tait's Magazine." He is a free-trader in the fullest sense of the word, and advocates short Parliaments, extended suffrage, and the ballot. He is the proprietor of extensive cotton-printing works in Lancashire; he is also one of the directors of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce. He contested Stockport unsuccessfully in 1837, but the last election gave him his seat; and his exertions since have added to his reputation. This is not always the case; for many men have failed in the House of Commons, from whose previous position and abilities the best success might have been predicted.

DISTRESS OF THE COUNTRY.

We recur to the consideration of this painful and alarming subject with mingled feelings of shame, disappointment, and regret. The accounts from all parts of the country continue to be of the same hopeless and dejecting character as when last we drew the attention of our readers to the starving and destitute condition of the labouring poor; and, although we read of the marching and countermarching of our troops, and the prompt and admirable arrangements everywhere made to preserve the peace, yet we look in vain for any grand or magnificent display of charity or fellow-feeling, whilst our "fashionable intelligence" teems with incidents of a less pardonable and less praiseworthy prodigality.

The poor begin to have their fireworks as well as the rich; but what a different spectacle is the roof of a blazing barn, which lights the midnight incendiary, driven to diabolical desperation, on his way, to the tourbillons and sky-rockets which nightly conclude the fêtes and galas on the banks of the Thames!

For the sake of peace, for the sake of humanity, we implore that something may be done ere the Parliament separate, to assuage the miseries of the starving poor. The hunger that is capable of breaking through stone walls cannot be expected to continue long restrained by those artificial barriers with which the law surrounds the property of the opulent; and if no cornucopia can be found to pour forth its abundant stores to appease the wrath of famine, there is, we fear, sad reason in the "signs of the times" to apprehend at least partial outbursts of popular fury.

We pretend not to apply any political cataplasm to this disease in our social state. No Corn-law or other nostrum have we in store, wherewith to divert the cravings of the hungry; but it pleases us much to find that the right honourable baronet at the head of her Majesty's Government seizes, with anxious avidity, every opportunity of informing himself, from disinterested witnesses, of the real condition of the country, and hesitates not to take counsel with men of intelligence and integrity, though it should be proved that they belonged to the Anti-Corn-law League. For some days past, we understand that a deputation, consisting of gentlemen from Lancashire, has been in town, endeavouring to impress on the Government, and the minds of individual members of Parliament, the necessity of making some immediate legislative effort to rescue the country from its present deplorable state. The Prime Minister, we are told, received these gentlemen with the utmost courtesy, and listened to their statements with the greatest attention. We annex a few of the facts contained in the relation submitted to the right honourable baronet, and we cannot think for a moment that such a narrative could fail in exciting the deepest sympathy, even in the heart of the profoundest courtier.

In Glasgow.—12,000 persons are on the relief fund, and wages are still falling.

In Dundee.—The number of unemployed is increasing every week; wages are falling. In 1836, Dundee consumed weekly 150 head of cattle, or 7800 in the year; in 1841, 98 weekly, or 5096 in the year; in 1842, 71 weekly, or 3692 in the year.

In Accrington (Lancashire.)—Out of a population of 9000 persons, not more than 100 are fully employed. Families are known to have subsisted for many days on boiled nettles, with a little meal sprinkled upon them.

In Marsden, near Burnley. Out of 5000 persons 2000 have become paupers and most of the remaining 3000 are on the very verge of pauperism. The poor's rate is 1s. in the pound per month. The farmers and all other rate-payers are fast hastening to ruin.

Bolton.—The poor's-rate in the township of Great Bolton, in 1837, was £3951; 1838-40, £8950; 1840-41, £12 750; 1841-42, £16 749; and for the next six months not less than £10 000 will be wanted. To prove the depreciation in the value of the property of Bolton, the fact need only be mentioned, that out of the rated rental of £86 000 a-year, only £36 000 is paying to the poor-rates, the remainder being either empty property, or the occupiers are unable to pay the rates.

In Stockport.—Many thousands are totally without any means of living, except from the hand of charity. The poor's-rate is rapidly increasing. Last year it was 6s. in the pound; this year 10s. at least will be paid. The Guardians are £20 0 in debt. A rate of 2s. now, does not yield more than a rate of 4d. produced four years ago, which proves the amount of unoccupied property, and the depreciation in the value of that which is occupied. No prudent man will take any property in the town for the purposes of trade, lest he should be ruined by the increasing burden of the rates. The evil thus progresses and accumulates, and the once flourishing town of Stockport is becoming a desolation.

In Wigan.—Many families remain in bed during the day, because hunger is less intolerable when the sufferer is in a recumbent position. Great numbers are out of employ, wages are falling, and the future appears darker than the past or the present.

In Prescott.—Out of 1100 householders in this town of 6000 inhabitants 900 were recently summoned in one day for non-payment of the poor's-rates, arising from inability to pay. A watch movement, a few years ago worth 90s., may now be bought for 4s 6d., although the material of which it is made has fallen little, if any, in value.

In Saddleworth.—From an accurate survey made in December, 1841, there were 55 farms without tenants; 26 mills were unoccupied: and most of the rest were working short time, and great numbers of the people were without employment. Since that period matters have been gradually growing worse.

In Sheffield. The poor's-rate in the township of Sheffield, in an average quarter of 1836 amounted to £162; the quarter ending June, 1839, £451; the quarter ending June, 1841, £1836; the quarter ending June, 1842, £4255. The whole town seems hastening to ruin; the number of the unemployed is constantly increasing.

In Leeds.—The township of Leeds contains 80 000 inhabitants, and there are 10,000 persons who have been supported from a relief fund, but which is now exhausted. The distress in the other townships is equally great. Hands are discharged every week in all departments of trade. The winter is looked forward to with painful apprehension by all well-disposed persons. The employers are sinking rapidly into decay in large numbers, and the means of employment are weekly reduced.

In Nottingham.—The poor's-rate for the year ending March, 1841, was £4065 16s. 7d.; March, 1842, £7277 14s. 6d; increase in one year, £3211 17s. 11d. Persons receiving parish relief in 1841, 4453; in 1842, 7933; increase in one year, 3480. In the Midland Counties, where the hosiery trade is carried on, more than one-third of the population are unemployed.

In Leicester.—One house in the glove trade paid £600 weekly two months ago; now they pay only £260, thus employing about 600 persons fewer than before. Other houses have also diminished the number of their workmen in about the same proportion. Bodies of men parade the town, begging, having a leader, a whose command they march or halt. A troop of horse has been lately introduced into the town to preserve the peace.

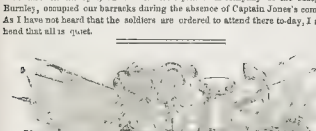
In Beaminster (Dorset).—Within three months, and within six miles of this place, not less than from twenty-five to thirty fires have occurred, chiefly the work of incendiaries, proving the poverty and discontent of the unfortunate labourers.

In Manchester.—Such is the depression of trade, and the poverty of the people, that grocers, butchers, drapers, and provision dealers have stated in a public meeting that their trade has fallen off one-third, whilst on what they do sell their profits have greatly diminished. Bread is bought by thousands of persons in quantities so small as a half-pennyworth or a pennyworth. The soup charity has kept many alive, and at four o'clock in the morning hundreds of poor starving creatures crowd round the door, waiting till six o'clock, when the distribution commences, that they may have an early supply. The sufferings of the people are so great, that private charity is unable materially to alleviate the distresses they endure.

Details such as the foregoing might be increased indefinitely.

The following account is from a correspondent at a village called Barnoldswick, where the people went out in crowds of 50 and 60, with sticks in their hands, and peremptorily demanded relief at the residences of the opulent, which caused great alarm. Our correspondent says —

Where these persons went the population is very small, and some of the more timid, it would appear, have applied to Government for assistance, and Captain Jones of the 61st, and his company, and a detachment of the 11th Hussars from our barracks were ordered to Barnoldswick on the 7th and 14th June, Tuesday being the day when the relieving officer pays the poor. Two of the magistrates were also on the spot, but no riot took place. A company of the 61st, from Burnley, occupied our barracks during the absence of Captain Jones's company. As I have not heard that the soldiers are ordered to attend there to-day, I apprehend that all is quiet.



NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

Naval Operation.—The Penelope frigate, of 46 guns, was taken into dock, at Chatham, last week, when several shipwrights were immediately placed on her, and commenced the operation of cutting the frigate in halves, for the purpose of converting her into a steamship. The fore part of the ship having been brought up to the mark allotted, left a space between the two parts of the ship exactly 62 feet, which will lengthen her to about 190 feet. She is to have in her two engines of 650 horse power, and to have engine room for 600 tons of fuel; complete stowage under hatches for 100 troops, with four months' stores and provisions, exclusive of a crew of about 450 men, and is to be armed with 20 guns of the heaviest calibre, besides carronades. The Penelope, when complete, will be the finest war-steamer in the service.

Woolwich, June 27.—The Geyser steam-frigate, Commander E. J. Carpenter, sailed yesterday for Deal, to make experiments with her large 68-pounder guns, at long ranges. The Black Eagle steam-vessel left Woolwich at the same time for Deal, with Admiral Sir G. Cockburn, G.C.B., First Naval Lord of the Admiralty; Admiral Sir William Gage, the Hon. Sidney Herbert, and Captain Sir William Symonds, the Surveyor of the Navy, on board, to witness the experiments. The Lightning steam-vessel, Lieutenant Commander George Snell, is expected to leave Woolwich for Deal in the course of the day, with Mehemet Ali's magnificent 130-pounder gun, to test its capabilities for long ranges on land.

Chatham.—The Tenedos frigate is ordered to be fitted out as a convict hulk for Bermuda, as soon as possible, so that she may arrive at her destination before the winter season sets in. The Cleopatra is expected to leave in a few days, and the Talbot will sail from Sheerness about Friday next for Portsmouth, where she will remain a week or ten days before proceeding for China. Mr. Johnson, surgeon of this yard, has been superannuated on a pension of 13s. per diem; and Dr. Warder, from Sheerness, is appointed in his place.

Portsmouth.—The Satellite, 18, Commander R. F. Gambier, has been taken out of the basin, and is now alongside her bulk, the Dryad. She is getting equipped very rapidly, and will be ready for sea in a few days.

The Pique, 36, Captain H. Forbes, has been taken into dock. She is picking up her hands very fast, and might ere this have been more than manned had every man who wished to join her been accepted.

There is now not the slightest difficulty in procuring volunteers for the navy, and all the best sailors prefer it to the merchant service. It is only when a captain, who, perfumed like a civet cat, has a horrible antipathy to smoking, and would deprive Jack of his chief luxury, and who employs the men in polishing shot and other frivolous and useless work, gets a command, that the blue jackets hang back, and there is any difficulty in getting a ship manned when so commanded. Happily there are but very few such officers in the service.

The Cleopatra, 26, Captain C. Wyvill, and the Talbot, 26, Captain Sir Thomas Thompson, are expected here from the eastward in the course of the week.

The Alban steam-vessel, Master Commander J. King, sailed on Monday afternoon for Gibraltar, with a detachment of sappers and miners.

Plymouth, June 28.—The Dasher steam vessel, Master Commander R. White, arrived here on Monday, from Weymouth. The ship Moffat is chartered at Deptford to take 300 male convicts to Australia, from the hulks at Portsmouth, and this dockyard. The Rev. H. B. Illingworth is appointed chaplain to the Madagascar, 44, Captain Foote, on the coast of Africa.

New Marine Barracks at Woolwich.—It was stated at the time Colonel T. A. Parke, C.B., was appointed commandant of the Woolwich division of Royal Marines, that he would strongly recommend to Government the propriety of having more extensive barracks erected for the accommodation of the troops placed under his command, which would remove the inconvenience attending the billeting of the surplus number above what the present quarters will conveniently hold on the inhabitants of the parishes of Woolwich, Plumstead, and Charlton. It was, consequently, at first contemplated to add temporary wings to the present buildings, as the ground was held on lease by Government, and had only about forty years to run. Recently negotiations were entered into for the purchase of the ground by the agents of Government, and this desirable object having been attained, it is now contemplated to erect spacious and commodious barracks for the officers and men belonging to the Woolwich division of Royal Marines. According to the progress of the present arrangements, the new barracks are to be built nearly in the middle of the present parade ground, leaving a space at the rear, which will be enclosed by a high dead wall, on the same line with the present west wall, which is surmounted with iron railing, and attached to the guard-mounting rooms for the officers and men. The front of the new barracks will be to the east, and command a most beautiful and extensive view of the windings of the river Thames below Woolwich; and as they will be erected on vacant ground, the present barracks are to remain, for the accommodation of the usual number of men belonging to the division. When the new barracks are completely finished, and fit to be occupied, the old barracks will be taken down, and the space on which they now stand form part of the new parade ground.

Naval Instruction.—A circular has been issued from the Royal Marine Office, announcing that, with a view to the adoption of an uniform system of gun exercise at the several divisions of the Royal Marines, identical in its details with that practised in the Royal Navy, the Admiralty have directed that the captain, two sergeants, one corporal, and two privates, from each division, be selected for embarkation on board the Excellent, for the purpose of instruction, and that, having gone through the necessary course, they be appointed to instruct their respective divisions. The several commandants are to be held responsible that their divisions are fully instructed in this very important part of their duty; and, finally, after the 1st of January, 1844 (by which period an opportunity will have been given for instruction), no officer, non-commissioned officer, or private, will be considered eligible for embarkation until he has passed through the necessary training.

Chatham, &c.—Detachments belonging to the following regiments, viz.—the 2nd, 17th, 22nd, 40th, 41st, and 94th, have received orders to embark this day for Bombay. Friday a general court-martial assembled in the barracks, for the trial of Ensign and Quartermaster Kirk, of the 18th Regiment; Colonel J. F. Love, R.H., 73rd Regiment, president. The court consisted of four majors, seven captains, one lieutenant, and one ensign. The trial is still going on. Dr. Weeden has been appointed surgeon at Chatham dockyard, vice Johnson, who retires; and Dr. Anderson, at Rochester, surgeon at Sheerness, vice Warden.

New Regiment.—The authorities contemplate raising a new regiment, to be designated the 100th Foot, and Winchester has been named as the place where it is to be organised. The arrangements for this addition to her Majesty's land forces are expected to be completed by the end of next month.

Major-General Sir Octavius Carey has returned to Cork and resumed the command of the troops serving in the southern district.

The service companies of the 67th Regiment are under orders to return home from Canada. Lieutenant H. J. V. Kemble (son of Mr. Charles Kemble) has been appointed Acting Paymaster to the depôt companies of the 67th, in succession to Ensign Westropp, recently promoted to a Lieutenancy in the 20th Regiment.

Major Harrold, of the 74th, has joined and assumed the command of the depôt companies of his regiment now at Cashel, and Major Crawley has left the depôt preparatory to embarking to join the service companies in Canada.

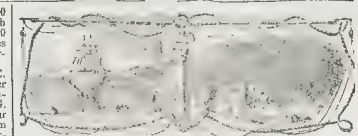
The head quarters of the 33rd depôt, under the command of Major Galloway, marched from Buttevant for Waterford on Monday.

The 56th Regiment from Canada, and the 69th and 76th Regiments from Nova Scotia, will be home in a few weeks; the former, the 56th, from Quebec, may be expected to arrive at Cove in the Resistance troop-ship, in the course of a few days.

The Albion troop-ship, which sailed from Cove on the 9th ult., having on board drafts for the 14th and 43rd Regiments, &c., for Canada, was spoken to on the 19th ult., lat. 48, long. 21, by the Kilbain, arrived at Liverpool.

The reserve companies of the 20th Regiment, under the command of Major Smith, embarked at Cove on Monday, per William IV., steamer, for the Isle of Wight.

New Regulations at Windsor Castle.—The Earl of Delawarr has most kindly acceded to a request contained in a memorial forwarded to his lordship from several of the tradesmen of Windsor to permit the state apartments to be open to the public on Saturdays, it having been considered, and especially by the several innkeepers, that the trade of Windsor suffered injury by their being closed on that day, when the town used to be generally pretty full of visitors, many of whom frequently staid the night, and remained over the following day. When the Court is sojourning at the Castle, the state apartments for the future will be closed on Tuesdays as on Fridays.



SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

The Burning of the Georgia.—Within the last two or three days further accounts have been received relating to the loss of the ship Georgia, belonging to London, which, it will be recollected, was destroyed by fire while on her homeward passage from Calcutta, and of the safety of her commander, Captain Mitchell, and five of the crew, who were reported to have perished with the unfortunate vessel. The ship Thomas Sparks, arrived at St. Katherine's Docks about three weeks since, having on board the remaining crew of the Georgia. The fire was confined beneath her decks till the second day after the Thomas Sparks coming up, when it broke forth and speedily consumed the vessel. Mrs. Mitchell, the wife of Captain Mitchell, together with two of the seamen's wives, supposing their husbands had been lost with the ship, as was reported, went into deep mourning, which they continued until Wednesday last, when the gratifying intelligence was brought to them of their safe preservation. They are at present residing at Shields. The vessel's loss is estimated at £8000.

We learn from the New York Commercial Advertiser of the 3rd of June, that the British brig Stephen, Hensall, from Newcastle, for Pictou, ran foul of an iceberg when 31 days out, and received so much damage that she was abandoned. The captain and crew took to the boats, were picked up by the John Romilly, from London, for St. John's, New Brunswick, and afterwards transferred to the American brig China, Small, and arrived at Pictou on the 28th May.

Rotterdam, June 23.—The mail-packet Ocean, Capt. T. C. Hast, has just arrived from London, having had an excellent run of only twenty hours. The Marquis of Tweeddale and several families of distinction were on board.

Antwerp, June 24.—The British steam-ship Soho landed about seventy passengers and six carriages from London yesterday; and the Rainbow, this morning, one hundred and twenty passengers and eight carriages. Her passage occupied sixteen hours and a half, notwithstanding very strong winds.

The General Steam Navigation Company's packet Ocean, Captain T. C. Hast, landed her passengers and her Majesty's mail from Rotterdam at the Brunswick Wharf, Blackwall, on Monday morning. The same Company's steam-ship Rainbow, Captain Fife, arrived shortly after from Antwerp.

The General Steam Navigation Company's new steam-ship Trident, left the Company's Wharf at Poplar, on Saturday evening, for Edinburgh, with upwards of one hundred passengers and a full cargo.

The great earthquake which produced such fearful havoc at St. Domingo on the 8th of May last, was felt on board the Levenside, Captain Campbell, which arrived here on Tuesday. The ship was then about 70 miles from the island. The sensation on the minds of the sailors was, that the ship had got aground on some unmarked rock, and the second mate got out the lead. The true cause, however, occurred to Captain Campbell, and an entry to that effect was made in the log. The shock lasted about two minutes. Although the ship was much agitated, no injury was done to her.—Greenock Advertiser.

On Monday forenoon another ship, the Alexander Baring, 505 tons register, Capt. Hall, was cleared out at the Custom House, for the newly-acquired British settlement, Hong-Kong.

Marriage in High Life.—We understand the nuptials of Lady Elizabeth de Rede Ginkle, only daughter of the late Earl of Athlone, and Captain the Hon. Frederick Villiers, son of the Earl of Jersey, are to be solemnized in the course of the week after next.

Bank of Australasia.—The total amount of the aggregate average liabilities of the Bank of Australasia in England and the colonies, from April 13th, 1841, to March 12th, 1841, was £510,004 15s. 8d., and the total assets, £1,271,641 6s. 2d.

There has been within the last week an extensive issue of new half-sovereigns, dated 1841. They are now to be had at all the banks, and, consequently, the necessity for silver will be in a great measure superseded.

 The readers of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS will find a rich pictorial treat in our next number, artists of the first distinction having been engaged to illustrate the Cambridge Installation.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 2, 1842.

THE committees appointed by the House of Commons to inquire into the compromises that have prevailed where petitions have been presented against election returns, and other malpractices which are said to have existed at the said elections, are attracting no small share of the public attention.

Mr. Roebuck, though by no means a Hercules, has certainly undertaken an Herculean labour in his attempt to purify the House of those corruptions which have cast a stain on its dignity, and a reproach upon its character. There may be much difference of opinion as to the means employed—there can be none with regard to the evil to be remedied. If the Augean stable must be cleansed—and truly it doth "smell to the heaven"—we must not be too nice as to what are sources of the purifying river that is to be turned through the mass. It may have its springs in private feeling, in personal pique, in individual jealousy; but, whatever its source, it is flowing in the right direction, and therefore we have no wish to see the current stayed.

The whole series of these transactions is rather complicated, and a little explanation of them may be needful. The principal committee is that over which Mr. Roebuck presides; it is perfectly secret in its inquiries, and takes cognizance of every kind of abuse practised at elections. Our readers will spare us the pain of going over the disgusting list of them. There are two other committees, but they are open, and confined more strictly to an inquiry into those political "crosses" called compromises; as far as they have yet gone, the appointment and proceedings of these committees have given rise to most undignified personal squabbles, renewed almost nightly, on the effect of which we have elsewhere taken occasion to remark.

But the House in each instance has followed up its first resolution to compel inquiry, and the reluctantes dracones—the unwilling members, who are themseves implicated—have received the "order" of the Speaker to attend and give evidence, though perchance it was to be against themselves.

Throughout the agitation of this question, we must say that Sir Robert Peel has shown considerable firmness, in following up the course he first adopted, though it may be questioned whether that course was not rather hastily resolved upon. At least such seems to be the opinion of many influential members of the Conservative party, of which the speeches of Sir R. Inglis may be taken as the expression.

The members who are, as it were, impeached by the inquiry complain loudly of the unusual mode of investigation; its secrecy is strongly denounced, and its whole proceedings are compared to those of the Inquisition and the Star Chamber, two tribunals never to be named to English ears without exciting a feeling of honest indignation.

But must not the objections of the culprit to the tribunal that sits upon his misdeeds, be taken with some allowance for his motives for protesting against it? Is he the best judge of what it ought to be? Is it certain that any mode of inquiry would be exactly pleasant or acceptable? These "are questions to be asked," and we confess we do not see any satisfactory answer to them. To extraordinary evils we must apply extraordinary remedies; and the degrading practices we would rather allude to than define are allowed by all parties to have attained a height almost appalling.

The ordinary powers of the law have hitherto failed to reach them, and it is almost of necessity that other means should be resorted to. If Parliament cautiously guards itself against making that extraordinary expedient a precedent, and confines it to the present occasion, or one indentical with it, we do not see the danger from it which some seem to apprehend. We have no fear that the practice of the House of Commons will ever be adopted by our courts of law, whether criminal or civil; there is a spirit abroad among the people that will utterly forbid the possibility of such a consequence. As we understand it, then, these inquiries are intended to procure the materials for further legislation, and there are numerous difficulties in the way of obtaining them in any other manner.

Without giving Mr. Roebuck credit, then, for motives of unmixed patriotism (no one who is aware of the intense personal enmity between him and Mr. Walter of the Times, an enmity that has risen to the "horse-whipping point," could give him credit for that), we regard his exertions as leaning to the public good, in, at least, tending to stamp such abuses with public reprobation, and, therefore, we are content to see the House of Commons pursue the course it has adopted. The shrinking of the sufferers ought not to be regarded any more than the aversion to the probe which may naturally be expected in a patient in whom the surgeon has discovered a festering and dangerous wound; the process may be painful, but the object in view is health and healing.

WHEN Shylock is summoned before the Duke's tribunal to pursue his suit against the Merchant, for the forfeit "pound of flesh," and is asked what reason he can adduce for his unexampled malignity, Shakspeare, who makes him reply,

> Knew all qualities with a learned spirit,
> Of human dealing,

> AN OATH, AN OATH, I have AN OATH in Heaven!
> Shall I lay perjury upon my soul?
> No, not for Venice!

Let it be granted that this was but the excuse of a man predetermined to obtain revenge, yet it contains a just tribute to the binding power of an oath, especially when we reflect what was the wealth of "Venice," and that the Jew was a character to whom the attainment of wealth was the great object of existence.

The bill lately introduced into the House of Lords by Lord Denman, for the purpose of relieving various sorts of religionists from the obligation of making oath in courts of law, and substituting an affirmation, has raised much discussion on the question, which, however, is not a new one. In reasoning upon it, we have no wish to go into the theological arguments that might be raised on the interpretations of the texts, "swear not at all," and "let thy yea be yea, and thy nay, nay." Were society what it ought to be, the injunction would require no enforcement, the divine word would want not the addition of human enactments. But legislation deals with men as they are, not as they should be; and the dreary fact that there are temptations to do wrong, to violate truth, and disregard the common word that passes between man and man, compels the law to meet the evils that might result from that indifference, by all the precautions that can be suggested.

Among these the most powerful has been found to be an oath; in proportion to the number who look on it with holy reverence, those who dare to disregard it are few. We do not see that the abolition of that obligation would tend to the attainment of the great object—truth.

The relaxation that has been granted hitherto, applies principally to the Society of Friends, a body remarkable for the high tone of moral feeling that prevails among them, and with whom we conscientiously believe that the "yea is yea" indeed. But it by no means follows that giving the same exemption to other and more ill-defined sects, would produce the same good results. The difference between the private statements of parties, and the reservations they make when put on their oaths in court (a difference known to every attorney or counsel), appears to us to decide the question in favour of the existing system.

Among our dramatic and musical notices, will be found a dispersion of portraits of eminent masters and performers, which will perhaps surprise some of our readers, and, we presume, amuse all. They are only a few of a series which we intend scattering at random, without text or comment, among our general musical and dramatic reports.

Our reason for this may require explanation to our country subscribers. The portraits in question, it will be seen at a glance, are all burlesque; they are copies, not from any published engravings, but from a number of busts and models cast by a French artist of the name of Dantan—an artist who has made high celebrity by his droll, but ever-faithful, reflections of public characters, and of the marked traits and characteristics of distinguished men. He has, fortunately, selected only persons of so much renown, that they are universally known, and require no illustration of the pen. What, for instance, could be said of Lablache, Liszt Costa, our subjects (as the surgeons say) in the present number, that would make them more familiar to our readers than their fame has made them before. It is true that we could occupy our space with memoirs, of which the materials would be hackneyed, although the manner might be original: but, as the likenesses are all comic, and intended in the drollest spirit of good-humoured illustration, a grave article of information would neither be seemly towards the composer or performer, nor consistent with the peculiar style of the portraiture—a style as famous and as much admired, both in Paris and London, as anything within the range of striking modern caricature.

Like the sketches of H. B, the portraits are unique, and will pop into interstices between our musical and dramatic papers, with an appropriateness of position which few will cavil with, and a distinctness of personal character which all will recognise at a glance. Of course, our remarks upon this subject apply to the comic portraits alone.

MYSTERIOUS MUNIFICENCE.

IT must have struck every one, tolerably observant of things as they go, that there are moral epidemics as well as physical ones. They have their day and disappear, to give place to other forms of the same folly.

To pass over that horrid sympathy with some atrocious instances of crime, which leads to an imitation of it, as a thing too serious to be spoken of slightly, we find many other forms of a feeling somewhat similar, which we can afford to laugh at, as containing in them something of the absurd. We have lately observed frequent indications of a practice which the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to pray may become universal and continuous; it would supersede the necessity of the Income-tax. How many paragraphs like the following have our readers lately remarked in the daily papers, headed "Advertisement"? Our specimen is from the Times of Tuesday last. "The Paymaster-General acknowledges the receipt of the following sums of money from anonymous correspondents, which have been placed to the credit of the public: on the 28th of May, 1842, £50, inclosed in a letter dated London; on the 27th of June, 1842, £500, inclosed in a letter dated Bath."

This announcement, added to others of the same kind which have preceded it, have, we must fairly confess, completely puzzled us. Who are these mysterious givers of alms to an exchequer avowedly empty? Five hundred pounds is a sum which is no joke to give, though we can imagine that the receiving it would be a very good one—one of the few good jokes, too, that we should think none the worse for repetition. We are as much at a loss to divine the motives for the act, as to discover the doers of it. It cannot be notoriety, for they court concealment; they "do good by stealth, and blush to find it fame," or would blush if fame should ever get their names into her trumpet.

Who, we repeat, are these voluntary taxers of their incomes at a heavier per centage than the law requires? The great bulk of the nation, we fear, will only give up their "sevenpences" on the same ground which made Falstaff refuse his reasons, viz., "on compulsion." How different is the feeling of these individuals of mysterious munificence who so cheerfully anticipate the tax-gatherer!

We are rejoiced to think that there is an El Dorado somewhere, and nooks and corners into which the distress of the country has not yet penetrated. The moiety of a "cool thousand" is handed over with apparently as much indifference as the fifty, and is just as coolly and courtly acknowledged. Is it only one way of disposing of so many light sovereigns, the trouble of changing which was too much for a millionaire to encounter in this sultry weather? If so, it is as ingenious a mode as that hit on by the Irish gentleman, who boasted that he always passed a bad shilling by putting it between two halfpence, and giving it to a beggar. But we fear we must leave the motives in the obscurity the parties have thrown around them.

The next difficulty is, who can they be? and here we are lost in a sea of conjecture; we can only state who we think they are not. It is not ourselves, to begin with; we are almost equally sure that it is not Joseph Hume; and we would venture to exempt Peter Borthwick and Horace Twiss from all suspicion of it. With these exceptions, our readers are at liberty to choose from the whole population of London and Bath.

One last hypothesis strikes us: there may exist retired functionaries of the Exchequer or War Office, reminiscent of some capriccio movements terminating in a diminuendo passage with regard to the public funds, which they performed "i' their hot youth, when George the Third was King," and their consciences being awakened at the eleventh hour, by the tales of public distress and embarrassment, they have resorted to restitution as their best means of atonement. We do not offer this as a fact; we "only suppose the supposition." Heaven forfend we should raise the veil, even were it in our power to do so, since their fits of abstraction have escaped detection by Mr. Hume and the auditors.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

POST-OFFICE NOTICE.—INDIAN MAILS.—The following notice is exhibited at the General Post office, St. Martin's-le-Grand, and the several branch offices :—"The next mails for Malta, Greece, the Ionian Islands, Egypt, and India, via Falmouth, will be despatched on Thursday next, the 30th instant. Many mistakes having occurred with letters addressed to India, Malta, the Ionian Islands, Greece, and Alexandria, it is requested that all letters intended to be sent by the route of Falmouth shall be marked viâ Falmouth. If not so marked, they will be retained to be sent by the overland India mail, which is conveyed under the new convention through France, and forwarded from Marseilles in British packets once a month, which will be made up here on the 4th of July. The letters intended to be sent to India, Malta, the Ionian Is ands, and Alexandria, viâ Marseilles, by the French steam-packets sailing from that port on the 1st, 11th, and 21st of the month in the ordinary French mail from London, should be addressed per French packet. Letters to Malta, Greece, the Ionian Islands, and Alexandria, 1s. 8d. ; newspapers, 2d."

ELECTION COMMITTEES.—The select committee appointed to inquire into the circumstances of the late and preceding elections in the borough of Belfast, Southampton, and other places, have frequently assembled in their respective committee-rooms, from time to time during the last week, and examined a number of witnesses, but of course nothing can be known of the results until the reports of these committees have been laid before the House.

A deputation waited on Sir Robert Peel on Saturday relative to the arrival and departure of the mails at and from Falmouth and Southampton. In proof of the great absurdity of the present system, one of the deputation took his letters, received on Saturday morning enclosing a bill of lading for treasure by the Lady Mary Wood, which treasure also reached London on Saturday, whereas the bulk of the letters through the Post-office were delivered on Monday morning only. We understand the representations of the deputation, and the great attention paid by Sir Robert Peel to the subject, give confidence that this abuse will be speedily remedied.

BURIAL IN TOWNS.—The select committee on the "Improvement of the Health of Towns" has just closed its labours, and the evidence given before it, with the report prepared by the chairman, will be very shortly in the hands of the public. After a brief review of the difficulties attending the prevention of interments in or near towns, it proceeds to a unanimous declaration of the members, that the present practice is injurious to public health, and offensive to public decency: and that an Act of Parliament for its discontinuance is absolutely essential. Dr. Copland declares "that the burial of the dead in large towns, by the exhalation of their gases into the air, and by their effect on the subsoil, and, consequently, of the water drunk by the survivors, exercises a most deadly influence on public health." Sir Benjamin Brodie and Dr. Chambers are also quoted, and a special reference is made to the indefatigable Mr. Walker, of Drury-lane, who has had a first and principal hand in getting this question agitated.

CLIMBING BOYS.—This Act (the 3rd and 4th Victoria, c. 85), which prohibits any young child climbing chimneys, came into operation yesterday. By the 3rd clause no child under the age of sixteen years is to be apprenticed to a chimney-sweeper. The indentures of chimney-sweepers are, by the 5th section, to cease after ten days. The construction of chimneys and flues is provided for, and the penalty for deviation to be paid by every master builder or other master workmen who build the same, is fixed at no less than £10, or more than £50.

SURREY SESSIONS.—The general quarter sessions for the county of Surrey, commenced on Tuesday, at the Court-house, Guildford, before G. T. Nicholson, Esq., chairman; Earl Lovelace; Sir J. Easthope, M.P. ; Colonel Challoner, and a number of other justices. The calendar contains the names of 32 prisoners for trial. John Smallpiece, Esq., the county treasurer, reported the state of the county finances, and said that the last rate, with other sums, had produced the sum of £17,925 1s. 7d., and he had since paid of that sum £8753 15s. 8d., leaving him at present a balance of £9171 5s. 11d. There were, however, outstanding accounts amounting to £11,0 6s 12s. 9d., which would leave him a deficit of £1865 6s. 10d., besides the current expenses of the quarter, and he should, therefore, require a rate for the usual amount, 2d. in the pound. The motion for a rate to that amount was then agreed to.

ARRIVAL OF THE COLUMBIA IN NINE DAYS.—The steam-ship Columbia, Captain Judkins, reached Liverpool on Tuesday, after the most rapid passage ever made from America to England. She is the bearer of New York papers of the 15th, Boston of the 16th, and Halifax of the 18th; from the latter port she made the run in nine days to Liverpool. The Britannia arrived out in Halifax in eleven days.

ARRIVAL OF THE GREAT WESTERN, BRISTOL, Wednesday, June 28th.—The Great Western, Captain Hosken, arrived in King's-Road, from New York, at eight o'clock this morning, having sailed from that port on the 16th instant, thus performing the voyage in twelve and a half days. She brings ninety-nine passengers. The news by this conveyance is of no great importance. It appears that the boundary and other important questions submitted to the commissioners are the part of the United States Government were in a fair train, and the next session would, in all probability, bring some decisive news on the subject.

Tuesday being the anniversary of her Majesty's coronation, it was observed throughout the metropolis with the usual demonstrations of loyalty. The Park and Tower guns were fired at one o'clock, and the bells of the different churches rang merry peals during the day.

LIGHT SOVEREIGNS.—At the City Court of Requests, last week, the proprietor of the Three Cranes Tavern, Queen-street, Cheapside, appeared before the Commissioners, to answer the summons of Mr. Gladwin, ironmonger, who stated that on Wednesday last a clerk in his employment went to the defendant's house, and cashed a cheque. Four sovereigns were tendered, and subsequently two were discovered to be deficient in weight to the extent of 3d. They were taken back, but the defendant refused to give the deficiency, upon which the sovereigns were left with him. The sovereigns were then produced, and on being weighed before the Commissioners, they were proved to be of full weight. The Court immediately dismissed the summons with costs, which amounted to 10s. 6d.

MAD DOGS.—Notices have been affixed to the Police Courts throughout the metropolis, cautioning persons having dogs to have them properly secured or muzzled; all dogs being found at large unmuzzled, the police have strict orders to destroy.

DEATH OF SIR JOSEPH LITTLEDALE.—This venerable ex-judge expired on Sunday last, at his residence, in Bedford-square, in his 73th year. He was the eldest son of Henry Littledale, Esq., of Eton House, Lancashire, by the daughter of —— Wilkinson, Esq.

DEATH OF SIR WILLIAM YOUNG, BART.—We regret to announce the demise of Sir William Young, Bart., M.P. for the county of Bucks, on Monday, at his seat, Wigheaden House, Bucks, in his 36th year

BALLOON ASCENT.—On Monday evening Mr. C. Green, the veteran aeronaut, ascended in his balloon, "The Albion," from the gardens of the Royal Standard Tavern Albert Saloon, at Hoxton. It was announced as Mr. Green's 200th ascent, the first this season, and the last preparatory to his intended voyage across the Atlantic, with the great Nassau balloon, on a visit to America. The announcement attracted a numerous company to the gardens; and a more delightful evening for such an exhibition could not have been desired. At precisely twenty minutes to seven o'clock, Mr. Green having stepped into the car, and the balloon being freed from restraint, ascended amidst the plaudits of the spectators, and having attained some altitude, bore away to the south-east. After a delightful voyage of thirty-five minutes, Mr. Green alighted with perfect safety in a ploughed field, about one mile S.S.W. of Dartford, in the parish of Crayford, Kent. The balloon was secured, and Mr. Green returned in a post-chaise shortly before twelve o'clock to the Albert Saloon, where he was loudly cheered. He crossed the river three times during his journey.

DEATH OF SIR EDWARD W. C. ASTLEY, R.N.—This gallant officer died at Boulogne-sur-Mer, on Monday last, in his 53rd year. He was first lieutenant of the Royal Sovereign yacht, when that vessel conveyed the Duke and Duchess of Kent to this country, three weeks before the birth of her present Majesty.

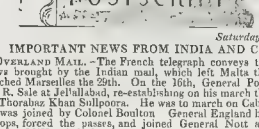
SUDDEN DEATH OF LIEUTENANT-COLONEL HENLEY.—This gallant officer expired suddenly on Saturday night, in the shop of Mr. Slack, in the Strand.

DREADFUL FIRE.—A most destructive fire occurred about three o'clock on Thursday morning, on the premises belonging to Mr. Ramsee), a painter, situated at No. 13, Bermondsey-wall. An alarm roused the family to a sense of their danger, and by the time they had made their escape the whole of the premises presented a most awful appearance. Before the engines arrived, so rapid had been the progress of the fire that it had extended to the immense range of premises belonging to Messrs. Cotton and Owst, hoop-benders, on whose premises were deposited many thousand loads of hoops, which soon ignited and blazed forth in an indescribable manner. The flames being shifted by the wind, simultaneously set light to the undermentioned buildings:—No. 12, Bermondsey-wall, belonging to Mr. Mansel, chemist; No. 11, the Golden Fleece, public-house; Nos. 1, 2 and 3, Sandiland-place, belonging to Messrs. Carver, Robertson, and French; Nos. 42, 43, 44, and 45 opposite, belonging to Messrs. Honeyman Goodacre, and Moore, all of which are greatly damaged, and all uninsured. When the fire had reached this spot, the firemen were in hopes that all fear of it extending further was at an end, but all of a sudden the roof and party walls of Messrs. Cotton and Co.'s premises fell in with a tremendous crash, and instantly after the flames shot forth with increased violence. About four o'clock the wind shifted, and the flames were blown right across the street to Crosby-place, setting fire to the private house belonging to T. Bramley, Esq., which is partly demolished; it then laid hold of Captain Page's residence, being No. 3, which is considerably damaged; No. 1, belonging to Mr. Wheeler, is partly consumed; No. 2, Mr. Fleming, is quite down; No. 4, Mr. Little, potato merchant, quite down; Messrs. Landels' granaries, No. 14, Bermondsey-wall, totally destroyed, with an immense quantity of corn; Mr. Spry, baker, No. 15; Mr. Saunders, cookshop-keeper, No. 16; and an uninhabited house, all three quite destroyed. Many of the above houses are uninsured.

LATEST PARTICULARS.—Throughout the whole of Thursday night and Friday morning, two large floating engines have been kept in constant operation, pouring an immense stream of water upon the still burning ruins. The loss is estimated at £20,000

Another fire broke out at about two o'clock on Friday, on the premises of Mr. Neal, potato sales man, Bermondsey-street, which was not extinguished until the building had become one heap of ruins.

MELANCHOLY DEATH.—On Tuesday morning information was sent to Mr. Carter, the coroner for Surrey, of the melancholy death of a gentleman residing in Cloughall-place, Kent-road, of the name of Butler, and connected with a firm in Tower-street, who was drowned whilst bathing in the large bath in Addington-square, Camberwell, on the banks of the Grand Surrey Canal, on Monday evening.



Saturday Morning.

IMPORTANT NEWS FROM INDIA AND CHINA.

OVERLAND MAIL.—The French telegraph conveys the following news brought by the Indian mail, which left Malta the 26th, and reached Marseilles the 29th. On the 16th, General Pollock joined Sir R. Sale at Jellallabad, re-establishing on his march the authority of Thorabaz Khan Sollipore. He was to march on Cabul as soon as he was joined by Colonel Boulton General England had re-united troops, forced the passes, and joined General Nott at Kandahar. Captain M'Kenzie had arrived at Jellalabad, with offers from Akbhar-Khan to release the prisoners on conditions. The answer was not known. Ephinstone died on the 23rd of April China news is of the 19th. On the 10th of March the Chinese, 10,000 or 12,000 strong, tried to retake Ningpo, while another force attacked Chughae. In both instances they were repulsed with considerable loss

[We expect many drawings and illustrations from China, which we shall not fail to present to our readers in our next paper, July 9th.]

The Queen honoured the Duchess of Gloucester with her presence on Thursday evening, at her residence, Gloucester House.

The King and Queen of the Belgians are not expected to prolong their visit to her Majesty beyond the middle of the ensuing week.

The Duke of Wellington is expected to leave Apsley House, on Sunday morning, for Cambridge.

His Royal Highness Prince George of Cambridge will shortly join the 17th Lancers at Leeds, of which regiment his Royal Highness has recently been appointed Colonel.

The Duke and Duchess of Northumberland arrived in town from Sion House, on Wednesday evening. Their Graces are expected to leave Northumberland House to-morrow for Cambridge.

THE LATE COUNTESS DOWAGER of Galloway died, on Thursday, at her residence, Rutland-gate, Hyde-park, in her 68th year.

SIR JOHN H. SEALE, Bart., has been appointed colonel of the South Devon militia, vacant by the death of Lord Rolle.

EARL OF LEICESTER.—The venerable Earl (better known as Mr. Coke of Norfolk) expired on Thursday morning at Longford-hall, Derby, at the great age of 89.

KING'S COLLEGE, LONDON.—On Thursday afternoon the distribution of the prizes among the successful competitors in the various classes, at King's College, took place in the theatre of that establishment, his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury presiding, delivering the prizes with his own hand to those pupils who were fortunate enough to be ranked among the more meritorious students

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL.—Richard Thornton, Esq., one of the governors of Christ's Hospital, has presented to that institution the munificent sum of £2000 Three per Cent. Consols, being the amount of the verdict obtained by him in the Gurney affair, with upwards of £200 added from his own purse to complete the purchase.

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT. A public meeting of booksellers, publishers, and authors, was held on Thursday at the Freemasons' Tavern, for the purpose of taking into consideration the enormous and increasing evil of the foreign printing of British literary works, and for adopting such measures as might seem expedient for putting a stop to the same. Among the gentlemen present we observed the Messrs. Longman, Mr. A. Spottiswoode, Mr. Colburn, Mr. Blackwood, Mr. Dickenson, Mr. James, author of "Richelieu," &c., Mr. Horace Smith, Mr. Buckingham, Mr. Poole, Mr. T. Hood, Dr. A. T. Thomson, Lord W. Lennox, Sir C. Morgan, &c.

GERMAN OPERA.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert, with the King and Queen of the Belgians, and their suites, honoured the performance of "The Huguenots" with their presence: the house, we are happy to say, was a bumper.

ST. JAMES'S THEATRE. The celebrated Stabat Mater of Rossini was produced last night at this house, the principal parts devolving on Fraulein Lutzer, Mdlle. Pacini, Sig. Mario, and Herr Staudigl. It is a splendid composition, and was most admirably performed. So many pieces were encored, that it may almost be said to be repeated twice over; and Lutzer and Staudigl added fresh laurels to their vocal fame. It is to be repeated. The Stabat Mater is also announced for a grand morning performance on Wednesday at her Majesty's Theatre, when Rubini, Labloche, Persiani, and Frezzolini, with the principal performers of the opera, will take part.

HERR BREUNIG'S MATINEE MUSICALE.—This German artiste gave a morning concert on Thursday at Saville House, Leicester-square, for the purpose of exhibiting the qualities of his harmonicapiano, which he has just brought from Vienna. The instrument is in appearance like the ordinary grand piano, but possesses the novel advantages of sustaining, strengthening, diminishing, or modifying the sonorous vibrations produced by the percussion of the hammer (as in the ordinary piano) by a current of air acting upon a set of reed-stops placed upon the piano. These and other peculiarities, which our limits will not permit us to enumerate, were displayed in various pieces executed by Herr Breunig, especially in selections from Meyerbeer's Robert the Devil, the adagios, above all, during a very felicitous effect from the instrument, played by Staudigl, who himself accompanied three very fine morceaux of his own composition, which he sang with his wonted excellence; its alternate swelling and falling tones mingled most pleasingly with its rich notes

MISS KEMBLE, accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. Bolfe, left town for Dublin, to fulfil her last engagement with Mr. Calcraft. It is understood that Miss Kemble will perform at Covent Garden Theatre till Christmas when she will retire from the profession.

VAUXHALL Gardens open on Wednesday next under Mr. Bunn's management.

IRELAND.—The Tipperary Special Commission was opened at Clonmel on Tuesday. Lord Chief Justice Pennefather, in his address, stated that "it was shocking to humanity to be informed that there was hardly a crime of violence that was not perpetrated almost with impunity in the county."

THE MARCHIONESS OF WATERFORD.—The following bulletin has been issued :—

"Curraghmore, Tuesday, 12 o'clock.

"Lady Waterford passed a tranquil night, and is conscious of all surrounding objects, and is progressing as well as can be expected.

(Signed) "J. Peard, M.D.
"John Ribbeck, M.D.
"Denis Shaw, M.D.
"John Cusack, M.D."

A letter written several hours after the foregoing had been posted says, "I am happy to say that her lady ship continues to go on favourably." Wednesday's report is still more favourable.

THE RUSSIAN FLEET.—Thursday the steam ship Jupiter, Lieut. D. C. Waters, R.N., arrived from St. Petersburg. Lieut. Waters reports, that he sailed from Cronstadt on the 22nd of June, and subsequently passed, off the south-east end of Gothland, the Russian exercising squadron, consisting of nine sail of the line, two large frigates, and two corvettes.

The Board of Admiralty has ordered two new ships of the line, the first to be called the Prince of Wales, of 110 guns, and the second, the Princess Royal, of 90 guns, to be built at Portsmouth, and they are accordingly already on the stocks.

It is a fact appearing from returns to Parliament, lately printed, that the postage revenue for January, 1842 (£100,380), under the penny rate, equalled within 3 per cent. that for January, 1840 (103,623), under the fourpenny rate.

LATEST POST OFFICE AND LONDON NEWSPAPERS.—PROSECUTIONS, July 1st.—This case, on account of the French Post-office, which has attempted to suppress the long practice of forwarding expresses by couriers on horseback, and for which the courier of the Morning Post, Morning Herald, and Morning Chronicle, was a short time since condemned by the Court of Boulogne to pay a fine of 150f. and costs, has been reversed by the Court of St. Omer, in which superior court an appeal was made. This court has acquitted the courier, Vivier, without costs. We have not yet received a copy of the judgment, but hope to get it by next express."

LIGHT SOVEREIGNS.—A few days since Sir John Paul, of the banking firm of Paul, Bingham and Co., Strand, sent £1000 in notes to the Bank of England for 1000 sovereigns. Upon getting them home and weighing, 27 were found deficient in weight. They were sent back with the request that they might be changed for gold of the proper weight. The Bank refused. Sir John Paul immediately ordered his solicitor, Mr. Cokney, of Lamb's Conduit-place, to serve the Bank with a notice of action; upon the receipt of which the Bank sent to Sir J. D. Paul and arranged the matter.—Globe.

LONDON AND BIRMINGHAM RAILWAY.—At a meeting of the proprietors held on Friday morning, it was agreed that the directors should be empowered to purchase the Warwick and Leamington Railway; and that, in order to provide funds for that purpose, they should be empowered to create, from time to time, such number of new shares, and under such terms and conditions, as they should think fit.

In the bill filed in Chancery against the Wigney family, there are no less than 46 defendants, many of them minors. Eight attorneys are at present working at it: it will remain perhaps in court 20 years, and the costs amount to £5000.

THE NEW CITY LAW COURTS. The intention to reconstruct the Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, will be carried into immediate effect. Upon the termination of the present sittings, workmen will immediately commence pulling down the present courts in Guildhall-yard, and where the new courts are to be situated.

CLERKENWELL.—VIOLENT ASSAULT BY THE MASTER OF THE ISLINGTON WORKHOUSE ON ONE OF THE PAUPERS.—Mr. James Ellis, master of the Islington Workhouse, who had been convicted and fined at this office about a month ago for assaulting one of the paupers, was charged with violently assaulting Charlotte Marchioni, an inmate of that establishment. The assault was proved, and Mr. Greenwood committed the defendant for trial. Bail was afterwards accepted for his release.

MARLBOROUGH STREET.—A few days ago a tall, slim, smartly-dressed young man, who gave the name of Frederick Isambert, obtained a summons against Miss Thyrza Saunter, a young lady residing at Oatlands Farm, Surrey, for having torn his coat at Dulbear's Hotel, Haymarket, and for having, as stated, so bewitched him with her matrimonial advances as to render it necessary for him to seek the protection of the law. Thursday the young lady's guardian, Mr. Haynes, of Oatlands Farm, and a solicitor, attended before Mr. Hardwicke, to answer the complaint. Long personal disclosures and recriminations were entered into, and a whole volume of love-letters was produced in court—the end of all which was, that Mr. Hardwick decided upon dismissing the case, and leaving the complainant to his remedy, if he had any, in some other court.

QUEEN SQUARE. Robert Cleverley was charged with indelicately addressing Miss Eliza Davis and her sister, on Wednesday evening, while taking their walk on Millbank, and fined the highest penalty, 2s., which was paid.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS COURT. William Scott, a linendraper's shopman, whose debts were upwards of £500, contracted in a few years, was opposed, yesterday, by his cashier, a Mr. Kerby, and he was remanded for four months from the vesting order.

Henry Elmore, son of Mr. Elmore, the Lover-dealer of Piccadilly, whose debts amount to about £800, also applied to be discharged, but the case was adjourned to serve a creditor, and further ban refused.

THE CONVICTS FRANCIS AND COOPER. The above two unhappy criminals now under sentence of death have been visited daily by the Rev. W. Carver, the ordinary of the gaol of Newgate, since the chaplain and sheriffs communicated to them the day fixed for their execution. They both attended the chapel to hear the morning service. The murderer Cooper has, within the last few days, assumed a more subdued demeanour, and he attentively and respectfully listens to the spiritual instruction of the reverend gentleman. During the time that gentleman is engaged with him. Occasionally, however, in the absence of Mr. Carver, he breaks out into menaces and expressions of a coarse and violent character against the police. But these paroxysms are no sooner over than he expresses his deep regret and contrition for what has occurred. From the statements made by Francis, it would appear that he now views his conduct in a very different light from what he did when he was first committed to prison. Yesterday morning the last day usually allowed for convicts under sentence of death to see their friends prior to execution, both the wretched men were visited by several relatives, and the scenes at parting, as might be expected, were of a most distressing character.

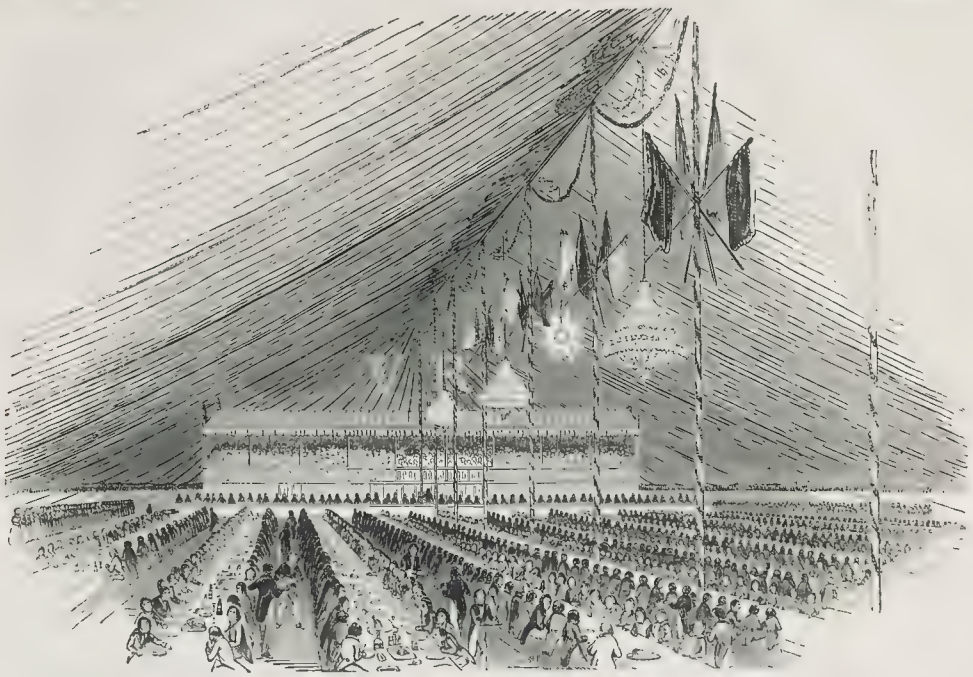
FRANCE. The French papers contain nothing of any election news, which is now over with accounts of the turmoil up everywhere in France against the ministry.

BURGLARY.—The Courrier de Lyon gives an account of a burglary which took place in the night of the 24th ult., at and in the environs of Chantenay, in the Seine et Loire, which consisted most of the houses of the town, scattering the tiles and slates like so many feathers, and making the tall chimney of a steam-engine bend like a reed. In its course it destroyed the crops and vegetation to a vast extent, dilapidated whole forests, and rooted up many trees. The entire country was covered with wreck and ruin of every description.

SPAIN.—Madrid papers and letters of the 22nd inst. have reached us by express, containing little intelligence of interest.

The Regent introduced on the 22nd the new Ministers to the Queen and the Infants, who received them most graciously.

HAMBURGH. The total amount of subscriptions of the sufferers from the late fire, received up to the 1st inst., was millions of marcs banco, about 4,800,000*l.*



GREAT DINNER TENT AT HIGHBURY BARN.

ANNUAL FESTIVAL OF THE LICENSED VICTUALLERS' SCHOOL.

We this week present to our readers spirited and faithful illustrations of the Licensed Victuallers' Grand Annual Festival, which took place on Wednesday, at Highbury Barn; and next week we shall add to our present designs an engraving of the noble institution which the festival was held to aid. We have selected these illustrations to meet the expressed wishes of a very large and influential class of the community, involving many thousands in number, and a vast amount of respectability and wealth; and, moreover, we have thought it right to catch the spirit of our public festivals generally, and to indicate to our country readers the way in which these metropolitan celebrations are got up and conducted. The particular instance of the fête on Wednesday became imposing from the circumstance of one trade in London being able to enlist in the cause of a single charity connected with it no less than 2000 visitors, supporters, and friends, to promote at an annual festivity the growth and accumulation of its decaying funds.

The dinner took place under a large marquee raised in the garden. There were eleven oblong tables, which extended the whole length of the marquee. There was one cross-table at the upper end, at which were seated the chairman, members of Parliament, governor, trustees, committee, &c. All those tables were crowded at an early hour, and sideerooms were, besides other marquees, provided for company, and they were very fully attended. About the grounds there were also crowds of visitors. There was provided a gallery above the Chairman's, or cross-table, for the ladies, and it was crowded with very elegantly dressed company. A military band was in attendance, stationed at the side of the chief marquee, and it continued to play during dinner, and afterwards at intervals. The weather was uncommonly favourable, the day was brilliant in every respect, so that crowds of cheerful countenances were seen on all hands.

Robert Hanbury, Esq., was in the chair. On his right were G. Byng, Esq.; Robert Hanbury, jun., Esq.; Captain Polhill, M.P., &c., and, on his left, B. Wood, Esq., M.P.; the Hon. Captain Rous, M.P.; Charles Madox, Esq.; J. T. Clement, Esq.; and many of the Directors of the Licensed Victuallers' Fire and Life Office. Amongst other gentlemen present were D. W. Wire, Esq., Dr. Sheridan, R. Knox, Esq., Messrs. Bryon, Greaves, F. Ward, J. Wells, and other past Governors and Chairmen of the Institution.

The cloth having been removed, Non nobis Domine was admirably given. The vocal performers were Messrs. Ashton, Martin, Healey, Wallis, Walker, J. Price, Rake, Morgan, Morley, Bell, Frost, and Smith.

The Chairman then proposed the first toast. He said he had the gratification of giving "The health of her most excellent Majesty, Queen Victoria, the Patroness of the Licensed Victuallers' School." He was quite sure that they would join with him in gratitude and exhilation that her Majesty's excellent life had been preserved; that they would, with him, think it matter of just rejoicing to every true-hearted Briton. (Loud applause.)

The toast was received with three times three, followed by loud applause.

The anthem of "God save the Queen," was then admirably given.

The Chairman next gave "His Royal Highness Prince Albert, the Prince of Wales, and the Princess Royal."—Three times three and loud applause.

Glee—"Here's a health to the Prince," which was beautifully and most harmoniously given.

The Chairman gave "Her Majesty the Queen Dowager," which was very warmly honoured.

Glee—"Health to Queen Adelaide."

The Chairman, in proposing the next toast, said he did so with the greatest pleasure. It was "The health of the Duke of Sussex."—(Loud applause.) He was quite sure, in honouring such toast, they would not forget the debt of gratitude they owed to the illustrious duke as the liberal and distinguished patron of their Institution (immense applause), nor to remember that his royal highness was also the liberal patron of almost every charity in the metropolis. (Continued applause.)

LAWN AND GROUNDS, HIGHBURY.

The toast was received with three times three, followed by loud and long continued applause.

The "health of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, and the remaining branches of the Royal Family," was greeted with the most enthusiastic applause.

Song by Mr. Morgan—"The Coronation," which was given with all that point and humour for which this talented gentleman is known to be distinguished by all who ever heard him.

The Chairman next proposed the health of "Captains Rous and Polhill, in connection with the Navy and Army," which was drunk with great applause.

Captains Rous and Polhill respectively returned thanks.

The Chairman next proposed, "Prosperity to the Licensed Victuallers' Society." (Loud cheers.) After the children of the school had made their appearance, he would take occasion to make a few remarks respecting the excellent institution they were met to support.

The toast was drunk with great applause.

The children of the school were then introduced, and ranged on several tables in such a manner as to enable as many as possible of those present to obtain a view of them. The remarkably healthy and happy appearance of the children drew forth expressions of admiration from the vast assemblage, and afforded the most conclusive evidence of the great attention and care bestowed on their health and comfort, as well as their education.

An address was then delivered by the two senior boys, one of whom was situated at the top of the table, and the other in the centre of the marquee; after which the children generally sang an appropriate hymn.

Mr. Blake, the secretary, then read the list of subscriptions, which amounted, in all, to no less a sum than 2200 guineas. This being concluded,

The Chairman said—the children still remaining on the several tables—that it now became his duty more particularly to advert to this most noble charity. He could most sincerely assure them, that he never more deeply felt his own deficiencies to fulfil the duties of chairman than he did upon the present occasion; but he, nevertheless, most earnestly hoped that their admirable institution would not in any way suffer on account of the feebleness of its advocate upon the present occasion. (Hear, hear.) The children who had just passed before them, he expected, had spoken in far more forcible language than any expressions he could use. He here addressed them with confidence—because he addressed them as parents; on that ground he hesitated not to call on them to support this institution. (Applause.) He had one day last week visited the school, and he had the happiness of stating that every department of it most highly gratified him. From that visitation he must bear testimony to the excellent selection made of those who had to superintend the management of this excellent institution. He had witnessed the great order that prevailed in every department of the Institution; and it was a most gratifying part of his duty to bear his humble testimony to the excellence of the selection and management. The parties selected to fulfil such duty showed their anxiety to perform it, by the judicious and efficient arrangements made to protect the children, and to advance their moral and religious knowledge. They established and enforced the means of preparing the scholars to pass into the world, and to guide and steer them in their progress through life. While visiting the school, he had put questions to several of the children, and particularly to the female children, and he was delighted to say, allowing for the timidity that naturally characterised the female scholars, he was gratified to be able to state that the answers to his inquiries had been of the most gratifying character. (Hear.) He had now to advert to a more painful part of his duty; he had to notice the state of their funds. Looking at a paper that was before him, he found that there were not now more annual subscribers than there were eighteen years ago: the life subscribers were not, but the annual subscribers had diminished. He did not complain of these results, for most painfully did he know the depression in trade to which the licensed victuallers had been exposed. He had had, he was sorry to say, almost daily experience of such fact. For thirty years he had been acquainted with the trade, and he was glad to have the opportunity of bearing his testimony to the manner in which the licensed victuallers had conducted themselves, borne the difficulties in their trade, and shown their readiness to contribute to this Institution. If none had so acted, he was quite sure they would do their duty; he hesitated not to believe that each would ask himself whether he had done his duty whether he had made any sacrifices to promote the advantages of this Institution? If not, he was quite sure that they would not longer delay. It was, in fact, their own cause; for who could say that the day of adversity might not arrive, and thus involve families in difficulties? He would also allude to the occasion of the meeting when a gentleman nearly connected with him, Mr Barclay, had taken the chair; he had great pleasure in recollecting that upwards of one hundred gentlemen had volunteered to collect subscriptions. He hoped that the result would be satisfactory; he did not doubt that it would be. (Hear, hear.) He thanked the company for their kind attention, and again hoped that the Society would not suffer on account of the want of distinction or rank on the part of their chairman. He, however, could not conclude without expressing the hope that the ladies, whether as mothers or daughters, would exert themselves on the present occasion; and, although his wife had not hitherto been a subscriber, he was authorised to put down her name for an annual subscription of five guineas. (Loud applause.)

Mr B. Wood, M.P., gave the health of the Chairman, who returned thanks.

Captain Ross returned thanks for the Members of the House of Commons.

Mr. David Wire, in responding to the toast of "The Lord Mayor and Corporation," delivered an eloquent and impressive appeal in favour of the charity.

Mr. Walter, the Governor, acquitted himself with eclat, in returning thanks for the Governor and trustees.

The healths of gentlemen connected with other Licensed Victuallers' Institutions were severally given and responded to, after which, "The health of the Ladies" succeeded, and the Chairman and the other distinguished guests retired.

The Governor (Mr. Walter) was then called upon to preside, and he instantly took the chair.

The Chairman then gave "The Stewards of the day," to whom they were so much indebted for the very numerous and interesting company by which they were surrounded.

The toast was drunk amidst applause.

Mr. Bleaden proposed the health of the Secretary, Editor, and other gentlemen on the establishment of the Morning Advertiser.

Mr. Blake, the Secretary (Dr. Sheridan, the editor, having retired) returned thanks.

Several other toasts having been delivered, the Governor quitted the chair; the whole of the company having been, obviously, highly delighted with the day's proceedings. The marquees and gardens were not cleared till a late hour.

 Next week we shall present our readers with a fine view of the Licensed Victuallers' School, in Kennington-lane, and a brief history of the progress of this excellent charity.

THE NEW BEACON ON THE GOODWIN SANDS.

THE LIGHT OF ALL NATIONS.

The above engraving represents the new Safety Beacon now being erected on the Goodwin Sands, and will be known to all mariners by the name of the "Light of all Nations. The great loss of life annually occurring on our eastern coasts, is universally known; and the Goodwin Sands, in particular, being situated at the very portal through which passes the most active commerce in the world, is the scene of the most frequent and fatal shipwrecks. There is no other spot, perhaps, on the face of the earth, so well known for its dangers, or so much dreaded by seamen. Nor are its terrors diminished by popular opinion; on the contrary, it is commonly believed that the Goodwin Sands swallow up and engulf, irrecoverably, whatever is thrown upon them.

THE NELSON MONUMENT. Last week the immense block of Granton stone, presented by his Grace the Duke of Buccleuch for the statue of the immortal Nelson, and which is intended to grace the summit of the column now erecting in Trafalgar square, was safely landed at the wharf in Abingdon-street, Westminster, and was afterwards conveyed, by the aid of twenty-two horses, through Parliament-street and Whitehall to Trafalgar-square. The column is, we understand, to be as high, or nearly so, as the spire of St. Martin's Church. The stone in question is stated to weigh thirty tons, and has already been reduced, to favour its more easy removal, from a block weighing at least forty-five tons; it is of the description known as "Craigleith," of the Liver-rock, and in point of durability equal to granite.

THE GREAT EARTHQUAKE AT HAYTI.—In the late earthquake at Cape Hayti, the American Consul and all his family perished by the fall of his house; Mr. Thompson, the English Consul, happened at the moment of the shock to be out riding, but on hastening home, found that his house was utterly destroyed, and his wife, children, and servants all killed in the ruins. On the arrival of the Tweed steam-packet at Hayti, on the 14th May, she found that out of a population of 9000, 4000 had been destroyed, and property to the value of one million of dollars wholly lost. The town of Savana and Port Platt on the east, Port Paix, Gonaives, Nichola Mole, Portau-Prince, and many others, have been equally sufferers.

THE FIRE AT HAMBURGH.—A private letter just arrived from Hamburgh states, that the amount already received for the sufferers from the late fire is more than sufficient to build up a magnificent town, much larger than that part of which has been destroyed. The writer of the letter alluded to states that the inhabitants are very far from grateful to the English, for the liberality they have displayed. On the contrary, they seize every opportunity of loading them with curses and execrations, charging them with having been the authors of the conflagration; and this they attribute to the jealousy of the English at the rapidly increasing commercial prosperity of Hamburgh, and their fears that ere long it would rival London.

LITERATURE.

THE BOOK OF BRITISH BALLADS. Edited by S. HALL, Esq. How and Parsons, Fleet-street.

"The Book of British Ballads!" what a world of poetry, of pathos, of simple and nervous expression, and all the attributes of "old and antique song," is contained in the very title, on which we could dwell as on a theme that it would take long to exhaust. Who does not remember Robin Hood, "the English ballad-singer's joy," and all his song-recorded adventures, throughout which our hearty sympathies are always with the outlaw of "Merrie Sherwood," even when, in the person of the bishop, he despoiled the church, and, in outwitting the sheriff, made a very mockery of "Old Father Antic," the law. Then the bold deeds or the "sun-burnt mirth" of Clim of the Clough and Scarlett (let no one confound him with Lord Abinger; it would be profanation of the more ancient celebrity), and little John, and Friar Tuck; to say nothing of Maid Marian, who appears to give the grace of kirtle and garland to scenes that else-cans and quarter-staffs might otherwise render somewhat too boisterous. Honour to them all! say we; and though Sherwood Forest has yielded its leaves to the blasts of many a hundred winters since they made its shades their dwelling, and its paths their fee-simple and inheritance, let them not be forgotten. There is a forest freshness, an open-air and sunmer-sunshine sort of nature about all associated with them, which, in these days of steam and gas and cast-iron, it is a new life and health to inhale, though but for an hour. What though conscience, hanging about the necks of our hearts, does whisper with an awkward air of truth, that they were verily and truly thieves? We turn to the poetry of their life, as it took shape from the lips of the bard and the minstrel, and choose rather to look on them as equaliters of the world's injustice, and redressers of its wrongs; a later chivalry, which, clad in Lincoln green instead of ponderous mail, and with the cloth yard shaft, in lieu of lance and sword, did, with all the warm impulse of old romance, without its pomp and ponderosity, take a freer and more prompt method of working out its purposes—

> Robbing the rich, but to bestow
> And give unto such as were poor and low.

Besides, Robin was a belted earl, and might have taken to the greenwood from the reason pressed upon Prince Hal, a feeling that "the poor abuses of the time wanted countenance." But, whatever were their motives or their deeds, certain it is, they inspired much of the poetry of our language, and it is as poetry we have to speak of the British Ballads.

We must pass with a brief general notice those ballads which treat of subjects, and are written in a different style. Of the martial ballad, "stirring the heart as with a trumpet," "Chevy Chase" will always be the first remembered, and the last forgotten; it contains poetry which we should hardly place second to the very finest in our language; thus, is there not the same keen feeling of defeat, more bitter than death, because it comes from the hand, and is suffered in the presence of, an enemy, in the dying words of Douglas, and in Shelley's amplification of the expression in that fine passage—

> My foe above me like a cloud,
> Darkens my fall with victory!

The idea is essentially the same in both. We are glad to see that "Chevy Chase" is the first in the present collection.

Next to the martial ballad, comes that of domestic life, which thinks not of "battles long ago," but of

> Some natural sorrow, loss, or pain,
> That has been, and may be again;

breathing forth the voice of pathetic complaint wrung from the heart by desertion or wrong, or the lament of humanity under some crushing misfortune, or narrating, in the very spirit of simplicity, the fall of innocence beneath the grasp of the fiend. To this class belongs the "Children in the Wood," and this too we find in the present number.

The other two ballads it contains are the "Demon Lover," and the "Nut Brown Mayd," models of those two numerous classes in which the supernatural is called on either to tempt or to punish, and that of which love is the burden, varied by countless differences of outward circumstances, but the same in all, whether arising from palace or from cot. This last is beautiful exceedingly—one of those songs which Shakspeare must have remembered when he made the love-lorn duke call for the strain that

> D. . have his passion mad,
> More than light airs and recollected terms
> Of these most brisk and giddy paced times;
> The spinners and the knitters in the sun,
> And the free-maids who weave their web with bones,
> Did use to sing it—it was silly sooth,
> And dallies with the innocence of love,
> Like the old age.

Prior attempted to improve it in a modern version, but it is a sad failure; the attempt, indeed, almost amounted to a poetical sacrilege as great as if he placed a seventeenth-century peruke on the golden locks of Apollo. In the present work it is given in all its integrity.

The "Book of English Ballads" is not intended to be a mere reprint of the old collections. A judicious choice is to be exercised, that will present us with the finest flowers from the old garland of song. We have the highest veneration for the memory of Ritson and Percy, and of all those who rescued, or aided in rescuing, the fragments of song which were floating on the stream of time and tradition down to the ocean of oblivion. They worked in a right spirit, and they did their work well; their task was to gather all, and to reject nothing, lest, under the coating of rough and rugged language, they might cast away a pearl of poetry. They recorded, but did not select, and for what they did the world cannot be sufficiently grateful.

But now that research can scarcely be expected to yield us more than we possess—now that time has yielded up all we are ever likely to obtain of this kind of treasure, may not a guiding

THE NUT BROWN MAID.

E it right, or wrong, these men among
On women do complayne

A labour spent in vayne,
To love them wele; for never a dele
They love a man agayne:
For lete a man do what he can,
Theyr favour to attayne,
Yet, yf a newe do them persue,
Theyr first true lover than
Laboureth for nought: and from her thought
He is a banyshed man.

taste he called in, to select from the mass these pieces which are invested with peculiar beauty? All that is equal in age is not equal in value; and it is no disparagement to our old poets to say that the stream of their verse did not always run over diamonds.

For the "Book of British Ballads," then, there is room in our literature, and it will find a welcome from every one who has a taste for the charms of poetry and art. The work is on a plan similar to that of the "Lieder und Bilder" of the Germans, but is by no means a servile imitation. As specimens of art, the illustrations are exquisite, from the vignette to the preface, into which Mr. J. Franklin has crowded a little world of life, to the splendid engraving by Creswick, which introduces the "Nut-brown Mayd," which we are fortunate enough to be enabled to transfer to our pages. (See preceding page.)

The illustration of each ballad is intrusted to a different artist. The first in order, "Chevy Chase," is enriched by the pencil of J. Franklin; and, considering the narrow space to which he had to confine his battle-groups, he has thrown a wonderful life and vigour into his figures. The last illustration of the ballad, the bearing home the bodies from the field, is particularly fine. The illustrations to the "Children in the Wood" are by J. R. Herbert, A.R.A.; engraved by Green. Those of "Fair Rosamond," by Franklin; engraved by T. Williams, Miss Williams, Walmsley, Evans, and others. Had we time to point out beauties, we should be happy to dwell on the quaint device of the border design that surrounds the opening stanza, and the grace thrown into the figure of Rosamond, wherever she is introduced. "The Nut-brown Lover" has fallen to the share of J. Gilbert, who has been ably seconded by Folkard and Bastin, as his engravers. There is great spirit in the first illustration, where the tempter fiend looks down with scorn on his fair, but frail victim, though she is in the very act of breaking her dearest earthly ties to follow him. The last illustration, the "Demon flinging with the Lady into the Sea," reminds us, and not disadvantageously, of some of the wild and unearthly forms of Retsch.

The number includes the opening stanzas of the "Nut-brown Mayd," which is illustrated by Creswick. Looking at the extreme beauty and delicate lightness of the foliage of the noble tree, in the cut which enriches our imperfect notice of one of the most exquisite of modern publications, we cannot help thinking, that, in this style, our school of art is superior to that of Germany, though, in correct delineations of the human figure, we must sometimes admit that they surpass us

Both in design and execution, the present work is a splendid specimen of the perfection to which we have brought the art of wood-engraving. Many of the plates are perfect studies, that may be looked into again and again; and so delighted have we been with the number before us, that we must earnestly claim for the undertaking the support of the public at large; that support we are assured will not be withheld, unless poetry and art—both, be it remembered, thoroughly English in subject and style—unexceptionable taste and refined execution must appeal to the world in vain.

THE JAR OF WHISKEY: OR, AN ADVENTURE AT CROOKSTON CASTLE.

(FROM THE ILLUMINATED MAGAZINE.)

It was shortly after I had read the "Abbot," that I was induced to take an excursion to Crookston Castle; a fine old relic of ancient times, situated on the southern bank of the Cart, in Renfrewshire, about half-a-dozen miles from Glasgow, where I happened to be sojourning at the time. As every reader, I presume, has read the novel in question, I do not deem it necessary to make any further allusion to it; what I have got to relate is the adventure I had there, and thus it was:—

It was upon a fine breezy summer noon—no matter for the year—that three of us, sworn friends and close companions, resolved to pay a visit to this old ruin, or "interesting relic of feudal times," as the guide book has it. Before leaving, however, it was agreed that we should, at least for once in our lives, enjoy the luxury of dining in a castle, even although the carpet should be formed by the green turf, and the roof of the chamber nothing better than the bright canopy of heaven; so we had a plentiful repast packed with an abundance of eatables, together with a bottle of port, and a large tin flask of Islay whiskey.

It was a bright warm sunny day; but there was also a strong breeze, bringing along with it a most delicious coolness, and sending the blood dancing through each vein, with such vigour and freshness, that I found it impossible to resist the strong impulse, to rush forward against the breeze, so away I started over the green sward, and brae, till, quite exhausted, I sank breathless upon the green sward, where, amidst rowans and buttercups, I gaspingly inhaled their perfume. The actual distance of the castle "as the crow flies" was not very great; we, however, deeming it preferable to deviate from the usual route, wandered along in the most approved zigzag fashion; at one time sauntering along a narrow country road, at another by the banks of a winding canal, then scrambling up to the top of a heather-crowned hill, plucking the blackberries as we went, totally unmindful alike of rents in skin, or cloth; anon, scouring across a forbidden field, where the farm-servants came shouting in our rear, till at length, when heartily tired, we sat down to rest ourselves upon the trunk of a fallen tree, and at one short sitting, finished the contents of the tin flask. This latter proceeding did not cause us any uneasiness, as before setting out we were led to understand, that it could easily be replenished at an old-farm-house in the neighbourhood of the ruin, and it was even whispered, with liquor undefiled by the prying gauze of the exciseman; but of this anon.

As we drew near the castle we were witnesses of a singular phenomenon, something similar to which I had often seen, but had never seen; it being one of those singularly beautiful optical delusions that are only to be seen in certain situations, combined with peculiar states of the weather,—a thing which I am told is of very rare occurrence. Our road took an abrupt turn round by the side of a steep hill, which rose right in our front, rendering the whole country that lay beyond impervious to our view. Before we came to this turn, on looking over the top of the fence or hedge, we beheld a large opening in the side of the hill, of at least forty feet in diameter, through which appeared stretched out for many miles one of the most striking and beautiful landscapes which it is possible to imagine; bearing a strong resemblance to some of those which Turner has sometimes painted; over which a hazy indistinctness hangs, yet where every objects is plainly visible.

According to all the usages of the sentimental tale-writers of the day, I ought to burst out into a long and labored description of some enchanting landscape, which has no existence out of my own brain, and only brought in here for the purpose of showing my powers of description. But as this is a true history, which does not aspire to any such high flights, the reader's imagination is left entirely free, as I pretend to nothing beyond giving a plain statement of the facts as they actually occurred on this eventful day.

For awhile we stood entranced, and gazed, with feelings of awe and admiration, upon this wonderful scene, doubtful of its reality, and for a time totally incapable of accounting for its appearance. On approaching the hedge, however, the whole affair vanished from our view, and in stead we found a round-pit, dug into the side of the hill, for supplying that material to the neighbouring farmers; yet on moving back a few yards in the same direction that we approached, the same beautiful landscape again became visible. I remained awhile amusing myself by tracing out on the sides of the pit the various curves and projections that formed the most prominent features of the picture; and endeavoured to satisfy myself upon scientific grounds for their occurrence. In this employment I lingered a considerable time, and had come to a very satisfactory conclusion, just as the sun had so far changed his position in the heavens that the phenomenon was no longer visible. While thus engaged, my companions had walked on, and were by this time far out of sight. Afraid of not being able to overtake them in time, I resolved upon taking a short cut across the fields; so leaping the hedge, and with the top of the tower for my guide, I ran straight on.

After passing through several fields I wandered on toward the castle, so far lost in reverie that I was nearly ridden over by a man on horseback, riding hastily along the road. He apologised for his carelessness, when we entered into a brief conversation. At first I took him for a gamekeeper or overseer of some sort, but I soon understood that he was the exciseman of the district. After a little chat about the ruin which I was going to visit, he rode on.

With the exception of one large square tower, there is not much of the castle remaining, and the whole is fast crumbling into ruin; here and there, are large portions of the walls, which enable you still to trace the entire extent of the building, the moat and rampart being still distinctly visible; the moat, of course, is perfectly dry, and in many places nearly filled with large pieces of the fallen walls, and other rubbish that has been gathering for ages. None of the chambers are complete, though you may still observe the extent of the large hall, with an immense fire-place at one end; but the roof is gone, which erst reverberated with the loud revelry of the bold Barons of Renfrew.

It was at Crookston that the ill-fated betrothment of Mary and Darnley was arranged: and tradition points out the chamber which they occupied for some time after their unfortunate marriage. The view from the window of this chamber commands a large extent of country, pleasingly diversified by hill and dale; while immediately beneath it, reaching from the castle to the brink of the river, stretches a green lawn, where, it is said, the Queen witnessed, and sometimes joined in the dances and other entertainments which took place shortly after her marriage. On the summit of the tower, provided you have the hardihood to climb to that perilous height, you may see the stone in which the flag-staff was fixed, from which the broad banner once floated, together with the large stones, often rode to and fro by the watchful guard; and from which the signal fire was wont to blaze. No part of the castle has been inhabited for many generations, and the walls that were once hung with rich tapestry, are now overspread with green moss, or mouldering in the deadly grasp of the ivy plant.

By this time we began to think that it would be as well to see after our dinner; so, without much further ceremony, down we sat upon the sill of the principal window, a large square place, the walls being nearly eight feet thick. The portmanteau was soon unpacked, and it was universally allowed that one bottle of wine was rather too scanty an allowance of liquor for three weary travellers; as a punishment for losing my way, I was packed off to the farm-house to have the flask replenished with a quantity of the best "mountain dew."

In some of the remote Highland districts of Scotland, there is still a little traffic carried on in illicit dis lation; but, I had no idea until this day, that it was to be found so far down in the lowlands as the outbounds. I was met at the entrance by an exceedingly dark, ill-favoured looking fellow, of whose age I could not form a guess. Without moving to let me pass, he stood right in the centre of the doorway, and with a frowning brow demanded, in a gruff voice, the nature of my business.

"Could you fill this, my man?" said I, holding up the flask, which he took into his hand with a furtive glance, his countenance if possible growing darker with emotion.

"Hark ye, young Sir," he replied, "you seem to go pretty coolly about this sort of work, but take care you do not come this errand once too often. And if you must do the dirty work of that scoundrel F——(naming the exciseman whom I had met), with whom I saw you speaking at the foot of the hill, you must also lay your account to take the consequences. Now mark me, and tell him to be wary how he tempts a desperate man; he has already thwarted me more than once, but, if he again dares to cross my path, by heaven it will be at his own peril. Now, trump, you've had your answer; there is your road, and there goes your property before you;" saying which, he gave the tin flask a smart kick with his foot, which sent it whirling through the air down to the foot of the hill; showing that, whatever else he knew in perfection, there was one thing at least of which there could be no doubt, and that was, that he possessed a thorough knowledge both of the theory and practice of foot-ball playing.

Thunderstruck at this strange behaviour, I was utterly at a loss how to proceed, believing at first that I was actually confronting a madman. However, I assured him that he was mightily mistaken if he took me either for a gauger or the spy of one. I told him the occasion of my presence in the neighbourhood, and if we had really been misinformed as to the nature of his other business, hoped he would excuse me for troubling him. But this was of no avail; he still stuck to his former points, and had become so violent in his insonate tirade, when he was interrupted by the appearance of a stout old man, who, alarmed by the hubbub, issued from one of the outhouses, demanding the cause of quarrel.

I told him in a few words

"Hout, tout," said he, "ne'er fash your thoom; that's aye the gate wi' him," glancing at the surly fellow, who slunk away round by the end of the house. "But ma ne nevvy is no here yet, and when he comes to—Your flask—ne'er mind it, wait a wee;" and he entered one of the back rooms, from which he soon reappeared. "We're to be awee but canous, but no see much as you'll tak, here's a bit jar o' the real stuff, and when ye've feenished, ye're de me, and I'm no here, so I can pitch it into the cart-house."

He presented for the contents, I tendered off with the jar to my friends at the castle, where I soon arrived.

I found them both loaded with the eatables, and standing on the green sward on the outside of the tower, evidently preparing for some adventure.

"What's the row now?" said I.

"Oh nothing, only we have made a discovery."

It seemed that one of them had dropped a fork over the window, and on going down to look for it, he discovered another chamber, the existence of which we had never dreamt of, the entrance being completely hid from view by some bushes growing close to the wall. They had both been in the chamber, and had resolved that we should, only for the fun of the thing, come within. I consented, seeing that it was rather chilly above, and moreover it threatened rain soon. The entrance was up two or three steps, and then down a narrow spiral staircase, leading to a narrow aperture, so small that it scarcely deserved the name of door. The light was admitted by a loop-hole near the ceiling, the roof being high, considering the size of the apartment. The walls were of hewn stone, and, altogether, the chamber had a very comfortable appearance; so much so, that the dinner was soon spread and the cloth extended upon, without much further delay. We did it ample justice; the tracks of our labours in showing the effects our inroads upon them, and the liquor came in for a due share of our attention. On producing the whiskey, I told them of the scrape I had nearly got involved in, when looking out for it, and to make all square, we toasted a bumper or two to their confusion. How long we sat discussing the eatables, and other topics, I cannot now say; all that I can remember is, that the spirits soon began to work their enchantments. We sang and shouted, danced and jumped, till we were all hoarse and tired. Then nothing would satisfy the other two, but a view from the top of the tower; but, as I had always the name of being a rather cautious individual, I deemed it more prudent to remain where I was, and enjoy a cigar, rather than run the risk of breaking my head, which at the time was not in the clearest state.

I had sat only a few minutes, when I was suddenly interrupted by an appalling incident; at first, when we entered the vault it seemed totally dark, owing to the sudden transition from the broad glare of day, into its gloomy walls, where the light was rather scanty, being only admitted by the loop-hole which I have noticed as being above; by the time we had finished our repast, our eyes had become somewhat accustomed to it that we could discern every object in the place. Turning with my back to the wall, facing the loop-hole, and occupied as I have already stated, I was startled by the appearance of a bright red light glaring up suddenly on the opposite wall; at this alarming occurrence I immediately sprung to my feet, and advancing, found it proceeded from a narrow, deep pit, the mouth of which had hitherto escaped our notice, being hid by the dark shadow cast by the wall, right below which it was situated. How I mustered courage to look down, I cannot now say. I felt as bold as a lion; but whether it arose from the quantity of drink I had taken, or proceeded from what philosophers style innate courage, I need not trouble either the reader or myself by inquiring. Look down, however, I did, and seeing some steps, or rather projecting stones on each side, began to descend, without for a moment considering what I was about. Down I went, step by step, with a foot on each side, the place being much wider than an ordinary chimney. I went down for a considerable way without stopping, and with an ease akin to that which we feel in dreams, when we pass through scenes and overcome difficulties, almost independent of the slightest act of volition. When about half-way down, I thought, judging from the distance of the bottom, which I could dimly see, I became conscious of a choking sensation, and experienced some difficulty in breathing; doubting whether to go down, or return, I stood for a short time, till I recovered so far, that I determined to persevere.

On arriving at the bottom, I found myself standing in a dungeon vault, which, after looking at the distance I had descended, I concluded to be far beneath the level of the ground; the walls being covered with a black slimy composition, and dripping wet. It being too far sunk for either windows or loopholes, the ghastly apartment was lighted up by a blazing fire, which burned in a stove, or furnace, beneath a large vat full to the brim of boiling liquor. It was the glare of the fire in this furnace, the door of which was open, which had penetrated to the chamber above, and attracted my attention.

There was another chamber adjoining the one where I stood; if anything, it was larger, and, on entering, I found that it contained a still, in good working condition; along with a quantity of barrels, tubs, and jars, lying about in all directions. "Oh, oh," thinks I, "here's a solution of the whole mystery;—this must be the workshop of these rascals, there is no doubt of it, and it argues a pretty extensive business too,—not to be despised by any means." But how they got entrance to these apartments, I could not divine. It must have been underground, for there was no trace of any passage or door above, that I could remember, and it was absurd to think that it could be the one by which I had gained admittance.

Groping about in the dark for a solution of this difficulty, I was startled by the creaking of hinges quite close to me, and had barely time to step aside, when a door burst open, and the smuggler entered, dragging some heavy body along the floor. He pulled it into the inner apartment, and you may guess my astonishment when, instead of a sack or something of that sort, I discovered the very exciseman, whom I had met at the foot of the road! His hands tied tightly behind his back, and otherwise presenting a most frightful spectacle. His face was completely covered with blood proceeding from an ugly gash in his brow, above the eyes, one of which was entirely hid by a piece of raw flesh, which had been torn from the same sharp instrument, and now hung from his eyebrow. It was a horrible sight. I was fixed to the spot, and remained trembling in the dark chamber, hidden amongst the barrels, determined to watch their proceedings. It was a most fearful scene that now took place. The smuggler was a big, strong, large-boned fellow, with a chest like an ox, and a pair of tremendous fists, in which he grasped the poor excisemen as firm as a vice. His face was purple with passion, his hair, hung matted upon his brow, from beneath which a pair of bloodshot eyes glared upon his victim. They were both breathless with the struggle, but he was the first to speak.

"Again I have got you in my power, and you won't escape me this time. You have been the bane of my existence—the curse of my life—you have crossed my path in every way, and blighted every project upon which I have set my heart. But now you shall learn what it is to goad a desperate man."

"You coward, you have have taken advantage of me," said the exciseman.

"Liar, that you are, you know I am no coward. But you, you crawling viper, by every step and action of your despicable life, do well deserve the name. By your hidden, underhand means, you have ruined me. You have deprived me of the means of pursuing my lawful employment, you have ruined my character, and driven me from the society of my fellows! And, oh God! at last you have whispered your vile insinuations to her, and wiled away the heart of my wife,—her for whose sake I have endured all the misery." He paused here, and seemed deeply affected; he then resumed,—"And all this because she had the hardihood to give her hand to a man whom she loved, instead of such a contemptible wretch as you, but I shall yet make you an offer. Let us both go and seek out my wife in your castle, and before her acknowledge the falsity of your statements; then let you and I separate for ever. Promise this, and you shall go forth from here unharmed."

"I'll be hanged if I do."

"Then be so," and he struck him a blow upon the face which sent him staggering back into the ashpit of the furnace, where he fell with his head upon the red-hot bars.

Maddened with the scorching pain, the exciseman sprung to his feet, and, rendered desperate with agony, he snapped the cord which bound his arms, at the same moment springing at the throat of his opponent, he brought him to the ground

A fearful struggle ensued. The exciseman was uppermost for awhile, and I thought he had fully mastered his enemy, who seemed paralysed by the suddenness of the shock. They both lay calm for a few minutes, the exciseman, as if considering how next to proceed; while the smuggler, whose arms pinned down, separated one of his legs and gave the exciseman a kick in the abdomen, which made him groan with pain. He lost his hold, and his enemy got above him. He twisted his arms behind, and, as if suddenly inspired with a new idea, he dragged him up, and, with a swing, he placed him upon the edge of the boiling vat.

"Now do you accept my terms?—speak, or by heaven I plunge you in." But the exciseman only screamed with desperation at the thought of the dreadful death. "Once more I ask you, will you go? speak!"

The only answer was a dreadful yell, which rung through the vaulted roof. There came a splash, he plunged him into the vat, followed by a hissing sound as the boiling liquor closed over him, and in a moment his struggles ended for ever.

The smuggler stood amazed at what he had done; it was an awful pause. It was the look of the murderer after he has done the deed! I had often tried to conceive such a look, but I pray heaven I may never see it again.

At this while I stood shivering with fear; I had approached the door of the apartment during the struggle, and now that it was over, I became alarmed for my own safety. As I turned to look about me for a hiding place, the smuggler discovered me. He stepped onward, and seized me by the collar, while I shrunk beneath his baleful gaze. He never spoke, but, dragging me to the vat, prepared to plunge me in. I cried for mercy—I roared and struggled, but it was all in vain. My strength failed me, while with a powerful grasp he bent me down—down—down. I felt the warm steam covering my face, and the scorching liquid was already touching my hair—I felt it boiling and bubbling in my ears. "Oh, murder, murder!"

"Hillo! what the devil's the row?" said a voice; and I felt myself rudely shaken.

"Oh! murder—murder—mercy—murder!"

"Ha! ha! ha!"

"Ho! ho! ho! here's a decided case."

"Oh, mercy, where am I?" I suppose I have been dreaming," said I, looking up, and seeing my two friends in the vault, where it seems I had fallen asleep.

Reader, I had eaten a hearty dinner, and when I awoke, I found the flask was empty. I will confess I was occasionally troubled with the nightmare, and now I assure you I was glad that it was no worse. The day, by this time, was pretty far spent, so we prepared to return home immediately. One of my friends took the jar from the farm-house, where he saw the smuggler enjoying a pipe by the fireside.

On our road home we met the exciseman, but whether he had betrayed the smuggler to the extent I had dreamed, I never took the trouble to inquire.

WHITTINGTON'S STONE AT HIGHGATE.—Until within the last very few years might be observed in passing from Holloway to Highgate, on the right hand side of the road, a rudely constructed stone in the form of a mile stone. From this spot it was, by a former measurement, ascertained four miles from London; and it was upon the above stone—which tradition, for a long lapse of years, handed down to after generations—that the boy Whittington sat and rested himself, when he was, as he fancied, welcomed on by the vocative invitation of the merry bells of Bow Church. On the stone was distinctly legible the following inscription:—"This is Whittington's stone." This perishable memorial has been removed, and another erected in its room, on which is inscribed "This is where Whittington's stone formerly stood."

THE FORCE OF HABIT. A story is told of a tallow chandler, who having amassed a fortune, disposed of his business, and took a house in the country, not far from London, that he might enjoy himself. After a few months trial of a holiday life, he requested permission of his successor to come into town and assist him on melting days. Another person who kept a retail spirit shop, and having in like manner retired from trade, used to employ himself by having one puncheon filled with water, and measuring it off by pints into another. A butcher in a small country town, some little time after he had left off business, informed his old customers that he meant to kill a lamb once a week, just for amusement.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

The Duchess of Cambridge, and Prince George and the Princess Augusta of Cambridge, attended divine service on Sunday afternoon in Westminster Abbey.

A Cabinet Council was held on Monday afternoon at the Foreign office. The council sat two hours.

EARL DE GREY.—The Lord-Lieutenant has deferred his departure from Ireland for Baden-Baden till the 16th of this month. Mr. Magenis, private secretary, accompanies his Excellency. The Countess de Grey remains at the Viceregal Lodge till the return of her noble consort.

Her Majesty and the Queen of the Belgians took an airing on Monday afternoon in an open barouche and four, attended on horseback by Lord Charles Wellesley and Sir Edward Bowyer, the Equerries in waiting. His Royal Highness Prince Albert rode out on horseback at the same time, attended by Mr. George Edward Anson.

His Majesty the King of the Belgians returned to Buckingham Palace soon after six o'clock on Monday afternoon, from his residence at Claremont.

The Queen and Prince Albert, the King and Queen of the Belgians, and the Duchess of Kent, honoured the German Opera with their presence on Monday evening.

On Monday evening the Earl and Countess of Jersey gave a sumptuous entertainment to their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge and Prince George and Princess Augusta at the family mansion in Berkeley-square.

The Right Hon. J. Nicholl, Judge-Advocate General, had an audience of the Queen on Tuesday, and submitted to her Majesty the proceedings of some courts-martial

THE DUCHESS OF BUCCLEUGH'S FETE TO THE QUEEN AND PRINCE ALBERT.—This brilliant fete was given on Tuesday at Winchehill. Her Majesty, accompanied by Prince Albert, the Duchess of Kent, the King and Queen of the Belgians, and a numerous suite, arrived at ten minutes before five o'clock P.M. The Queen and the other illustrious personages were met at the foot of the grand staircase by the Duke and Duchess. Her Majesty was graciously pleased to accept the arm of the noble host, and proceeded through the noble hall to the state apartments, and thence to the grand pavilion, erected on the Terrace next the Thames. Here the royal party found already assembled, about five hundred fashionables of the first families in the kingdom. After the usual courtesies, the party took their seats on ottomans, or chairs, to be spectators of a boat race by selected watermen. During this period the band of the Coldstream Guards played selections from some favourite operas. The déjeuner was a most elaborate, costly and tasteful display of refinement. The royal table was divided in the grand saloon, whilst other apartments were appropriated for the general company. The party began to break up about seven o'clock.

The Queen and Prince Albert, and the King and Queen of the Belgians and suite, returned to Buckingham Palace at seven o'clock; and afterward her Majesty and Prince Albert, and the King and Queen of the Belgians, with the usual attendants, honoured the Italian Opera with their presence.

MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE. On Tuesday morning, by special licence, Viscount Ruslyn, eldest son of the Earl and Countess Cawdor, to Miss Sarah Mary Cavendish, second daughter of the Hon. Colonel Cavendish, and late Maid of Honour to the Queen. The very reverend the Dean of Carlisle officiated at the ceremony, in the presence of a numerous family circle.

The Queen held a Court on Wednesday at Buckingham Palace for the reception of addresses on the throne.

The Bishop of London and a deputation presented an address of congratulation from the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's and the clergy of London and Westminster.

The Lord Mayor of Dublin and a deputation presented an address of congratulation from the Corporation of the city of Dublin, to which her Majesty was pleased to return a most gracious answer.

Her Majesty afterwards held a Privy Council. It was attended by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and the principal officers of state.

At the Court Ali Ben Nasser, Envoy from the Imaum of Muscat, had an audience of the Queen, introduced by the Earl of Aberdeen.

The Protestant Dissenting Clergy of the three denominations presented addresses of congratulation to the Queen and Prince Albert.

Her Majesty and afterwards a dinner and evening party

The Queen Dowager, accompanied by the Duke and Duchess of Saxe Meiningen and the Hereditary Prince, left her residence, Bushy House, Bushy Park, on Wednesday afternoon for town.

Count d'Appony, the Austrian Ambassador, returned with his family to Paris on Saturday night, after an absence on leave for eight months. On Sunday he visited the Minister of Foreign Affairs, and afterwards went to the King and royal family at Neuilly, where he passed the day.

Information has been received at Coblentz, by telegraph, that the King of Prussia had set out for St. Petersburgh, and the Queen for Dresden.

The Marquis of Bute has subscribed the liberal sum of £100, and the Marquis of Breadalbane £50, to the fund for maintaining the schools established in connexion with the General Assembly of Scotland.

PUBLIC MEETINGS.

EAST INDIA-HOUSE.—A Quarterly General Court of Proprietors of East India Stock was held on Monday at the Company's house in Leadenhall-street, pursuant to adjournment, for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the following resolution:—"That, upon consideration of all the circumstances connected with British intervention in the affairs of Afghanistan, as they appear from the papers already laid before Parliament, it is the opinion of this Court that the expense of that war ought not to be thrown on the people of India, but that it should be borne by the Exchequer of the United Kingdom." The chairman, Sir J. L. Lushington, after a desultory but somewhat animated discussion, suggested an amendment, to the effect that the "whole" expense of the war should not be thrown on the people of India, but that a "portion of it" should be borne by the Exchequer of the United Kingdom; which having been adopted, the motion as amended was carried by a majority of 23 to 20.

A crowded meeting of the Metropolitan Anti-Corn Law Association, and of deputies from its sixty-four branches, was held at their hall on Monday. Besides the members and officers of the association, the meeting was attended by a deputation from the provinces—of gentlemen sent to the metropolis to represent the state of the country to the Government. Francis Place, Esq., president of the business committee, was unanimously called to the chair. Several resolutions tending to advance the objects of the meeting were adopted.

MEETING OF JAMAICA PLANTERS.—On Wednesday a public meeting of planters, merchants, and others interested in the colony of Jamaica, was held at the Thatched House Tavern, St. James's street, Lord St. Vincent in the chair, for the purpose of offering to Sir Charles Metcalfe, Bart., their assurance of their participation in the sentiments of gratitude and admiration expressed by the colonists for the manner in which he has governed Jamaica, and also of their regret at his resignation. Mr. Burge read an address, which was adopted nem. con. A deputation, consisting of the principal gentlemen in the room, was appointed to present the address to Sir Charles Metcalfe upon his arrival. Mr. Burge moved a vote of thanks to the noble chairman, which was seconded by Sir Alexander Grant, who said that the Earl of Elgin, the successor of Sir Charles Metcalfe, was "resolved, sequæ ab accepta, to adopt the same line of policy with his predecessor.

PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL.—PAINTED HALL AND CHAPEL.—We have the satisfaction to inform our readers that Sir Robert Stopford, the governor, has attended to the recommendation of the Select Committee on National Monuments, of 1841, to admit the public free on two days in the week. Sir R. Stopford (Governor of the Hospital) has given orders that the Painted Hall and Chapel shall be open, free of charge, on Mondays and Fridays, from ten to seven o'clock in summer, and from ten to three o'clock in winter; and we trust the public will show by their conduct a just value of the boon thus given them, which will place Greenwich Hospital on the same liberal footing as the National Gallery and Hampton Court are now placed. We view the conduct of Sir Robert Stopford as highly honourable to him as a gentleman and a sailor; and we trust his example will be followed by those who have charge of public buildings and collections of the works of art that would be invaluable to the mass of the people, as a means of education and acquiring a knowledge of the fine arts, which tend to soften the ruder manners of the ignorant.

BARTHOLOMEW'S HOSPITAL. A General Court of St. Bartholomew's Hospital was held on Thursday last, for the purpose of electing a treasurer in the room of Mr. Thomas Helps, deceased; when Mr. James Bentley, senior almoner, was unanimously chosen.

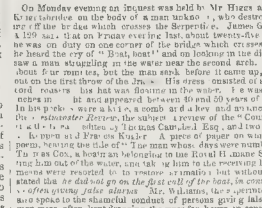
BETHLEM HOSPITAL. THE CASE OF OXFORD.—A meeting of the governors of Bethlem Hospital was held on Monday last. After the general business of the court was concluded, a governor requested to be allowed to call the attention of the court to a subject which had given rise to much conversation in several circles in the metropolis. A report prevailed very extensively about the prisoner Oxford, which stated that he had privileges afforded him quite inconsistent with the treatment to which it was reasonable to suppose persons guilty of such an offence as that with which he had been guilty, and for which he was confined in the Hospital. It was represented that Oxford had an allowance of a pint of wine per day, and masters to teach him the French and German languages; and it was very desirable to have such reports contradicted if there was no foundation for them. The President said he was glad to have an opportunity of disabusing the public mind on this subject, and of assuring the governors that Oxford had no advantages from his situation beyond those possessed by other inmates. On the contrary, he had the misery of perpetual imprisonment for his contemplation; and the report of the pint of wine per day, was only one amongst the absurd reports of the day. With regard to the statement that Oxford had masters to teach him languages, those who swallowed such a report had just as much reason to take the dose, as the prisoner had opportunity of taking the wine. It was possible that the prisoner had been endeavouring to learn the French language from books which he had procured; but reports never lost anything of the wonderful and incredible by being circulated amongst people. He had heard something about an application to take a likeness of Oxford; and he would call the steward of the Hospital to say whether such an application had been made, and if such was the case, what was the result?—Mr. Nicholls (the steward) said that such application had been made at the Hospital, and had of course been refused, as he could not think of consenting to allow anything of the kind without the orders of the Court.

GENERAL PENSION SOCIETY. The anniversary dinner in commemoration of the establishment of this society, took place on Wednesday, at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street. It was attended by a numerous muster of the supporters of the Institution, and conducted, both as to the excellence of the viands, and the arrangements for the vocal and instrumental music, in a manner that left nothing to be desired. The company were indebted to Messrs. Hobbs, Fitzwilliam, Hawkins, Chapman, &c., and to Miss Betts, who contributed her talents, for the latter orphanages to good cheer and social harmony. The chair was taken by Lord Mauners. The announcement by the secretary of the contributions was hailed with applause, and from their amount, and the large sum subscribed by the company, it may be anticipated that the resources of the society are in a wholesome and flourishing state. The company did not separate until a late hour.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN SCHOOL SOCIETY.—On Wednesday afternoon the annual public examination of the children educated by the above society took place in the Central School-room, Borough-road, Southwark. The room was well attended by ladies and gentlemen. Owing to the absence, from indisposition, of his Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex, who had promised to take the chair, Lord Russell presided. The proceedings commenced at two o'clock, with the examination of the scholars in reading, writing, arithmetic, grammar, geography, botany, zoology, chemistry, drawing, and singing, the latter according to the system of Mr. Hullah.

GENERAL SHIPOWNERS' SOCIETY. On Wednesday the tenth annual meeting of the merchants and others connected with British shipping was held at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street, for the purpose of receiving the annual report of the committee appointed to watch over the interests of this most important branch of national industry. The chair was taken by Mr. Robert Barry. Mr. G. F. Young read the report of the committee, which was unanimously received and adopted. Mr. Palmer, M.P., proposed a resolution to the following effect:—"That this meeting concurs cordially in the sentiments so ably expressed in the report; and, satisfied of the injury which must be inflicted on the British shipping interest by the operation of the 'Customs Amendment Bill,' and the 'Bill to Amend the Laws for the Regulation of the Trade of the British Possessions Abroad,' highly approves of the steps taken by the committee in opposition to those measures, and of the fearless and straightforward avowal of those principles which can alone secure to British navigation the pre-eminent position it has attained." Mr. A. Chapman, M.P., seconded this resolution, which was adopted. Thanks having been voted to the chairman, the meeting broke up.

ST. THOMAS'S HOSPITAL.—On Wednesday the annual Court of Governors of St. Thomas's Hospital was held at that establishment, when the accounts for the past year were audited, and the Governors afterwards went over the wards of the hospital, and inspected the recent alterations. At the termination of the business of the day, the Governors dined together at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street, when the chair was taken by Sir John Cowan, Bart., president of the Court of Governors.



On Monday evening an inquest was held by Mr Higgs at the Life-Gun tavern Kensington on the body of a man unknown, who destroyed himself in the manner after he had crossed the Serpentine. James Green, police-constable A 159 said that on Friday evening last, about twenty-five minutes to ten o'clock he was on duty on one corner of the bridge which crosses the Serpentine, when he heard the cry of "Boat, boat!" and on looking in the direction of the cry, he saw a man struggling in the water near the second arch. The boat came up in about four minutes, but the man sank before it came up, he, however, was found on the first throw of the grapnel. His dress consisted of a dark frock coat, which he took off before he left the bridge. He was about five feet nine inches in height, and appeared between 40 and 50 years of age, with a bald head. In his pockets were a knife, a comb and a key and an unprotected proof sheet of the Westminster Review, the subject a review of the "Court and Times of Frederick the Second," edited by Thomas Carlyle. Henry Gardiner, Works Assistant to Mr. Francis Kinder. A piece of paper on which was written a long poem, bearing the title of "The man whose days were numbered," was also found. The Rev. Mr. Cox, a boatman belonging to the Royal Humane Society, deposed to having him out of the water, and taking him to the receiving house, where the usual means were resorted to to restore animation, but without avail. This witness stated that he dashed up on the first call of the boat, in consequence of the bathers often giving false alarms. Mr. Williams, the superintendent of the society, also spoke to the shameful conduct of persons giving false alarms, and that they men were often kept dragging the river for hours in consequence, and he hoped the jury would, in their verdict, strongly condemn the practice. Mr. Williams further stated, that the boat had only just arrived at the receiving house from the ships, and that the deceased must have thrown himself in immediately on the boat's return, as their verdict a rony condemned the conduct of persons giving false alarms. [illegible] Mr. Williams [illegible] shameful [illegible] in not attending to the first call for assistance. We see a great parade of benevolence on every recurring anniversary of the Humane Society's establishment, and a general distribution of medals; but every night an unfortunate wretch is drowned; but we hope that at the next general meeting something will be done with regard to the discretion allowed to boatmen to judge between genuine and false alarms. That the practice of giving "[illegible]" there is none, is fraught with mischief is sufficiently apparent, and it is [illegible] seems to be but an end to, but we think that Mr. Williams [illegible] subject to the jury was guilty of very gross impertinence, and we consider that Mr. Higgs allowed it to [illegible]

DEATH IN A STATION HOUSE.—On Monday forenoon an adjourned investigation was resumed before Mr. Wakley, M.P., at the Dudley Arms Tavern, Harrow-road, on the body of Mary Pearce, aged 54, whose death took place in Paddington station-house under circumstances which were alleged to reflect on the conduct of the police. From the evidence taken prior to the adjournment it appeared that the deceased resided with her husband, who is a bricklayer, at No. 7, Edward's place, Bryanstone square. About half-past five o'clock on the morning of Tuesday se inspector the husband went out, leaving the deceased in bed. The deceased left home shortly after seven o'clock, and while proceeding along the Edgeware road, [illegible] named Bridges, observed her suddenly to stagger and fall. He assisted her up, and placed her against some railings, but finding her quite insensible, although she muttered something, he believed her to be intoxicated, and sent for a policeman, who, with assistance, conveyed her to the station-house, and charged her with being drunk and incapable of taking care of herself. The charge having been entered by the police-sergeant on duty, the deceased was placed in one of the cells by herself, without having previously been seen by a medical man. About a quarter past o'clock the sergeant on duty went into the cell to rouse her, in order that she might be taken to the police office. Finding it impossible to do so, he ordered that she might be taken to the police office. Finding it impossible to do so, he ordered that she might be taken to the police office. But being unable to do so, he ordered that a surgeon, who declared deceased dead. The deceased had received a severe contusion on the forehead, and at the desire the inquiry was adjourned for a post-mortem examination of the body. Mr. Ancell, surgeon, of Norfolk-crescent, said he had since examined the body, and from appearances, it was his opinion that she had died of apoplexy. The witness and two other medical men, Mr. Lane and Mr. [illegible], were in attendance on the deceased differently in obtaining the [illegible] between themselves and apoplexy. The coroner said, if that was the case, they, of course, could not expect the police to be judges in such a matter. He believed in this instance that no blame was attributable to them; but for their own protection it was necessary that in all cases where persons were found in the streets insensible they should instantly call in the aid of a medical man. If it was not done, the law, in his opinion, ought to remedy the evil. The jury ultimately returned a verdict of "Natural death."

THE WORKHOUSE TEST.—On Tuesday an inquest was held before Mr. Wakley, the coroner, in the infirmary of the Marylebone workhouse, Newroad, on the body of Elizabeth Pearce, aged [illegible], who had been formerly in affluent circumstances, but who, becoming reduced, was obliged to enter the [illegible] workhouse [illegible] evening. She had frequently heard to declare, that going into the workhouse would break her heart, a prediction which was too fatally verified. The jury returned a verdict of "Natural death."

On Tuesday evening Mr. Higgs the acting coroner for Westminster, held an inquest at the George the Fourth, Gilbert's passage, Clare-market, on the body of James Stevens, a plumber, glazier. It appeared in evidence that on Monday last, about noon, deceased was cleaning the first-floor windows of No 23, Red Lion-street, Holborn. To do so he stood on the top (a foot and a half wide) of a shop front, and having completed his task, he was stooping down to enter one of the windows, which was partially open at the bottom, when his foot slipped, and he fell into the street. He was taken up insensible, and conveyed by the police to King's College Hospital, Carey-street. He never rallied, and died in about two hours after his admission, of the injuries caused by the accident. Verdict, "Accidental death."—[This melancholy case should act as a warning to masters and mistresses, who endanger the lives of their servants by ordering them to clean windows in the manner above described. It is really fruitful of [illegible] to daily exhibitions of this kind which the metropolis presents.—ED. I. L. N.]

DEATH FROM EATING PEAS. The same coroner afterwards held an inquest at the same place, on the body of George Lethbury, aged sixty years, a man who died in the King's College Hospital, on Monday last, in consequence of having eaten a quantity of parboiled grey peas, which had remained since winter [illegible] the Wine Office, near-street, Wandsworth, before Mr Carter, upon the body of John Finch, aged forty-four who a few years since kept the Jolly Gardeners, Lambeth walk, and whose body was found in the river, above Battersea bridge, on the Wednesday morning last. The deceased had latterly become, through misfortune, an inveterate drunkard. His widow, on being examined, said she supposed her husband must have committed suicide or fell into the river whilst drunk, as he [illegible] when he left home. In her opinion, however, five years since, the 26th June, which was Sunday, the body of her sister, who had been drowned the day before was picked up off the same spot where the body of her husband was found, and she had likely heard deceased say, he would drown if he was to drown himself whether his body would be found there also. The jury, after remarking upon the singular coincidence in the case, returned a verdict that the deceased was dead in the Thames, but how or by what means he came there, there was no evidence to show.

The Cheltenham Examiner says:—"It is whispered in circles likely to be well informed, that our gracious Sovereign purposes in the course of the summer to pay a visit to Cheltenham."

DESTRUCTION OF A CIRCUS BY FIRE.—It is with deep regret we record that Mr. Cooke, the celebrated equestrian, has met with a great calamity since his recent arrival in Glasgow, his splendid Circus on the green having been completely destroyed by fire on Monday evening last. Fortunately, all the horses were got out uninjured, and not one was in the animal department but a donkey. A considerable portion of Mr. Cooke's valuable wardrobe, however, has been destroyed, and will add very materially to his loss; but we are glad to learn that the property is, to a certain extent, insured. Not more than a quarter of an hour elapsed from the first discovery of the fire till it had completed its work. The audience had began to assemble for the evening's performances when it broke out—nearly three hundred being in the gallery at the time, and a few in the pit and boxes, but they were all got out without the slightest accident. The Circus was only opened on Saturday last, for the first time since its re-erection. Mr. Cooke's Circus has several times before been destroyed by fire; once in America, where his whole stud, as well as other property, was consumed.

PARLIAMENTARY REGISTRATION.—To avoid the disfranchisement of electors in cities and boroughs, all the poor-rates and window-taxes (if any) payable by a voter in respect of his premises, previously to the 6th day of April, must be paid on or before the 29th of July, whether demanded or not.

COUNTY VOTERS.—Monday was the first day for sending notices to the overseers of the poor of the township where the property is situated, of such claims, with a shilling to pay for the insertion of the same in the overseers' list, and this notice may be given any time before the 20th of July.

AS a late sitting of the Commissioners for Assessed Taxes in Glasgow, an appeal was brought against a charge for armorial bearings, by a gentleman who utterly disclaimed the use of them. The letter in which he objected to the charge, however, was produced, the seal of which bore the impress of armorial bearings; and this glaring fact of course settled the appeal, to the great confusion of the stupid appellant.

GROUSE. The reports from our correspondents in Scotland and in the vicinity of the Yorkshire Moors, are of the most cheering character. They all concur in stating that grouse will be found this season in more plenty than has been the case for several years past. This they attribute to the favourableness of the weather during the period of incubation, which was neither too hot nor too wet; either of which extremes generally proves fatal to two-thirds of the young during that process. Poults are getting strong on the wing, and out of danger from every rain, by which numbers, when very young and weak, perish. Partridges and pheasants are likewise very forward, and promise more than an average number.—Leeds Journal

MYSTERIOUS CIRCUMSTANCE.—About seven o'clock on Sunday morning last, police-constable Gayler, 348, who was on duty in Upper Thames-street, on arriving at the warehouses of Messrs. Rownson and Drew, discovered a large pool of blood near an iron gutter, to which adhered a quantity of human hair. Gayler, suspecting that something wrong had taken place, instantly commenced a search; and on proceeding down Paul's-wharf, which is immediately opposite the above firm, his attention was directed to some distressing groans proceeding from underneath a boat which had been turned keel upwards, and was lodging upon some planks. On approaching the boat he perceived a man, who was quite black in the face, and apparently nearly dead. On dragging him out, an extensive wound was discovered at the back of his head, around which was a quantity of coagulated blood, and he was quite senseless. Up till Tuesday, although the unfortunate man had in a slight degree regained his reason, he was very incoherent, and nothing could be elicited from him touching the occurrence, or anything concerning himself or his circumstances.

THEATRES AND THEATRICAL PORTRAITS.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

ROSSINI'S "STABAT MATER."

It would seem that this extraordinary work of the greatest living composer of Italian music is destined, through all the stages of its performance, to create a greater amount of "sensation" than any other production within the range of his genius. Begun, in the first instance, under peculiar auspices—imagined for a sacred purpose, and conceived in the fervent spirit of religious inspiration—composed to appeal to the pride and pomp and glory of ancient Spain, through the influence of one of her grandees, who was supposed to combine piety with power, and virtue with political and religious strength—this glorious effort of Rossini's muse seems to have awakened more jealousy, curiosity, and litigation, than is compatible either with the grandeur of its subject or the sacred spirit of its design. After being the rage in Paris—not only in the "sphere musical," but in the courts of law and appeal—after waking the energies of French eloquence, and stirring the words of judicature in its utmost depths—after passing through all the ordeals of complaint, judgment, and appeal, which are invented for the benefit of aspirants after justice in the French capital—we find it, at last, on the eve of completing its renown in England under the roof of her Majesty's Theatre; where it is likely to achieve more triumph, and be illustrated with greater effect than in any of the capitals of Europe wherein it has hitherto been produced. We understand that the enterprise of the Italian Opera is to be focussed, as it were, upon the production of this stupendous composition. It will be tried elsewhere, and, probably, with some degree of spirit and success; but all the vital points of illustration—all the mighty purpose of the swelling music—all the vocal eloquence which Lablache, Rubini, Ronconi, Persiani, Frezzolini, and the direction of Costa can evoke, will be concentrated within the only temple capable of eliciting the full greatness of the work. Many of the best critics of the Continent have compared the fine odes, madrigals, and concerted pieces of the Stabat Mater to the magnificent choral glories of Handel's muse; but, whether such comparisons are strictly admissible or not, it is clear that only within a large arena, and under the support of a splendid body of voices, can it hope in performance to achieve anything like the purpose for which it was designed. The superb cathedrals of ancient Spain are specimens of architectural grandeur in their way unrivalled—and it is cathedral magnificence that should accompany the performance of the music, to give it power, volume, and effect. We presume we shall attain this chiefest point at the Italian Opera. We learn that more than a hundred voices will be employed to give effect to the sublime choruses, and that the solos will be superbly worked. Lablache, who is marvellous in sacred music, and who refuse, the part allotted to him in Paris, has consented to accept it here, and Rubini is the other acquisition to the work. All the musical arrangements are upon a scale of grand completeness, and the authenticity of the score is, we hear, alike exclusive and beyond dispute. We all know what litigation has led to in Paris, and how the quibbles of the law have allowed the music of the Stabat Mater to be appropriated; but in its genuine form, in the identical spirit of its composition, with all the grand appurtenances of illustration which a large theatre alone can produce, with the men who, par excellence, Rossini would have selected for his most splendid sacred effects, with the finest female singers of our age and time, and with a choral power such as only our musical festivals have been accustomed to produce; with all these means and influences to make it perfect, we may regard the advent of the Stabat Mater at the Italian Opera, as something quite excelling what we have been accustomed to see and hear within the walls of that favoured temple of genius and fashion. Wednesday morning, the 6th of July, is appointed for the first production of this sacred chef d'œuvre.

FRENCH PLAYS.

Bouffe took his benefit on Wednesday night, on which occasion he appeared in a new character. The one-act vaudeville Les Merluchons, or, Le Testament Sanglier, which yielded it, is the joint production of three play-wrights, who have made a comedian the hero of it. Bouffe makes the utmost of the part allotted to him in this little piece. His narrative of his theatrical disasters is replete with humour, and kept the house in perpetual laughter. His repartees are not less exhilarating, and the gravest can scarcely help being derides when he returns from the theatre in his cobbler's attire to bewail his failure in lyric drama. In the Gamin de Paris, which concluded the evening's entertainments, he also won reiterated plaudits, and on the fall of the curtain was again recalled; bouquets and wreaths being superadded to this just tribute which we are glad to see awarded to so excellent an actor by a very numerous audience; among whom we observed the Marquis and Marchioness of Lansdowne, the Marquis and Marchioness of Devonshire, Earl and Countess of Radnor Earl of Belfast, Lord Templetown, Lord and Lady Conington, Lord and Lady Worsley, Mr. and Lady Catherine Cavendish, Marquis of Litchfield, Lady Rendlesham, Lady Stewart, Lady Harriet Bentinck, Lord Sandys, Lady Caroline Strangways, Lady Fitzmaurice, Lady Caroline Maxse, Lord and Lady De Tabley, the Ladies Cust, Lady Dacre, Lord Fitzroy Somerset, Lord Stradbroke, the Earl of Ilchester, Sir F. H. Bathurst, Sir W. and Lady Middleton, Sir John Walsh, Sir John Kynaston, &c. &c.

GERMAN OPERA.

The German Opera closes this night (Saturday) after a most unsuccessful season. It is much to be regretted it has not been better "countenanced," as every effort has been made by the management to produce novelty and talent of the highest order. It has introduced to us Staudigl, unapproachable as a bass singer, with a voice sonorous and of amazing scope, and Demoiselle Lutzer, the prima donna of the opera at Vienna, a beautiful vocalist and surprising executor. The chasises and band are too well known and highly appreciated to need comment.

ENGLISH OPERA HOUSE.

The commencement of the campaign at this theatre commenced with good promise. A good—an excellent company for light dramatic pieces, at once received the stamp of public approbation and patronage. Even the fatal blast from the Trooper's Horn awaked but few echoes of discontent. The Enthusiast was welcomed, and the promised novelties augured well for the future. Harley made his bow in the Bee Hive, with mingled laughter and applause; but the farce, though a good one and well played, may be served the purpose of re-introducing an old favourite to his earliest audience, should have been withdrawn, to make way for something more novel and attractive.

In One Fault, not the only misnomer, Miss Ellen Faucit made her first appearance, and displayed such intensity of feeling and artistical knowledge of her profession, as at once placed her in a high position with her auditors; and her subsequent performance of Lucille, has fully realised their expectations.

O. Smith next appeared, and lent his "supernatural powers" to the Doge of Death, thus strengthening the phalanx of talent which in the names of Oxberry, Mrs. Humby, and others, had been already secured.

We now learn, that all the available resources of the theatre will be brought to bear upon the production of a series of novelties which are preparing with unwonted spirit and activity.

SURREY THEATRE.

This theatre is now crowded every evening. The very excellent style in which the opera La Sonnambula is produced, and the talent engaged in it fully merit the popularity acquired. On Monday evening last, Mr. John Webster, from the Theatre Royal Haymarket, made his first appearance in the clever farce of the Crown Prince, he played with much humour and spirit, and was warmly greeted by the audience.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

MR. MOSCHELES' GRAND MORNING CONCERT IN AID OF THE HAMBURGH SUFFERERS.—Mr. Moscheles gave a morning concert last week at the Italian Opera House, in aid of the sufferers at the late disastrous Hamburgh conflagration, the large concert-room of that theatre having been kindly granted by the manager for that benevolent purpose. We are happy to bear our testimony to the complete success of Mr. Moscheles' undertaking, as the concert went off with the greatest eclat the following eminent artistes having rendered their gratuitous assistance on the occasion, viz.:—Mesdames Persiani, Frezzolini-Poggi, Ronconi, Caradori Allan; Mademoiselles Moltini, Pacini, Grammaglia, Graziani, Lutzer, E. Grisi; Miss Adelaide Kemble, and Miss M. B. Hawes; Signors Lablache, Rubini, Ronconi, Mario, Guasco, F. Lablache, B. Costa, Herr Staudigl, Mr. Vrugt, and Mr. John Parry, in the vocal department; and Mr. Moscheles, Dr. Mendelssohn Bartholdy, Madame Dulcken, M. Thalberg, and Signor Liverani, in the instrumental. The programme was an attractive one, the selection of pieces being most judicious. The duet between Mesdames Persiani and Caradori Allan, "Se tu m'ami" (Rossini), was beautifully sung, and elicited the warmest applause. A song entitled "Revenge," from a manuscript opera by Halton, was given with most thrilling effect by Herr Staudigl, who, indeed, sang it with such energy and expression that he was rapturously encored. Fraulin Lutzer afterwards gave a scena and air from Nicolai's Il Templario, in which, by her graceful execution and the rich tones of her voice, she succeeded in eliciting the loudest plaudits. Signor Rubini sang Beethoven's Cantata "Ade aide." and a duet with Mademoiselle Pacini, from Rossini's opera of Tancredi (m'abbracia, Argiro), and was most warmly received on both occasions. Signor Lablache and Madame Graziani were encored in a buffo duet from Donizetti's I Pazzi per Progetto. We must not forget Miss Adelaide Kemble, who was by no means the least successful contributor to the morning's entertainment. Guasco, Molteni and Mario, were equally successful in their respective pieces. The instrumental performances consisted of a solo on the grand pianoforte by Mr. Moscheles, in which he produced two new manuscript studies, followed by "recollections and improvisations." His "recollections," which extended from "grave to gay," if not "from brevity to severe," appeared greatly to interest the audience, who honoured his performance with the warmest applause. Mr. Moscheles, at an after period of the concert, played his celebrated duet, "Hommage a Handel," with M. Mendelssohn, who brought out some tones which, for fulness and depth, in some degree resembled those of an organ. A grand concertante duet for two pianofortes, on airs from Bellini's opera of "Norma," was brilliantly played by Madame Dulcken and M. Thalberg. The concert-room was crowded. Not only were the orchestra, boxes, and side-galleries fully occupied, but many of the audience were glad to obtain seats in the refreshment-room adjoining, and as many more were compelled to stand at the doors. His Royal Highness Prince Albert honoured the concert with his presence, accompanied by Sir Edward Bowater.

SIGNOR GALLINARI'S MORNING CONCERT.—This concert, which, by permission, took place on Wednesday morning, at the mansion of the Hon. Colonel and Mrs Leicester Stanhope, was, in many respects, the very best of the season, although the attendance was rather Limited in number, and not quite so distinguished as might naturally have been expected. The company were accommodated in the apartments that open upon the lawn of Ashburnham House. The exertions which Madame Persiani made not to disappoint the frequenters of the Opera on Tuesday evening, was, we regret to state, the cause of an excess of fever, which prevented her giving the favourite aria which she was announced for. A slight change in the order of the programme of course was made (no concert ever took place without it), and Mad.le. Bertucat's capriccio on the harp opened the entertainment. The jewel, however, of the concert, in whose beauty all minor stars faded, was the "Fra nembi erudeli" of Mercadante, in which the great tenor, Rubini, put forth all the delicacy and rich quality of his wonderful voice, and was as rapturously encored as we ever remember hearing him. Among other brilliances were the aria from Belisni, by Madame Gallinari, which elicited nearly as warm applause, being also encored; and the delicious romanza from Schubert, in which that delicious songstress Lutzer displayed her flexible voice with a rich, deep feeling that is not always the accompaniment of so much mechanical skill. No nightingale ever warbled more delightfully. The aria by Guasco, from "Orsini," was new, and admirably sung by that artist. Nor must we omit a sincere eulogy on Herr Staudigl's grand execution of Schubert's song, and the splendid trio from Rossini, in which Rubini, Campagnoli, and Buridni sung. The chief instrumental performances of the evening, besides that of Madame Bertucat on the harp, were a very beautiful solo on the oboe by Mr. Barret, a fantasia on the violoncello of great excellence by Mr. Rousselot, and a fantasia on motives from the "Lucia," by Muller, who, we also believe, accompanied Mademoiselle Lutzer in her romanza. We had almost forgotten to do justice to Madame Gallinari's exquisite execution in the duet, "S'io l'amava scagurata," which she sung with Guasco. It was most beautiful.

M. MAINZER'S SINGING FOR THE MILLION.—On Wednesday a body of M. Mainzer's pupils, belonging to his different classes in the metropolis, made an excursion to Gravesend, with the double purpose of spending a day in innocent amusement, and of exercising themselves in the practice of vocal harmony. One of the large transient steamers, hired for the occasion, left the wharf at London-bridge about ten o'clock in the morning, having on board nearly four hundred persons of both sexes, and various degrees in society a large proportion of them being mechanics and working people, whose attention to personal appearance and propriety of deportment might have done honour to any class. M Mainzer himself was present, as was also the fine band of the Scotch Fusilier Guards, which added to the effect of the vocal pieces by their rich and delicate accompaniment. At Gravesend the party spent several hours in the beautiful Rosneryille Gardens, where they partook of refreshments and then, being duly arranged according to their voices, sang several pieces of sacred music of the highest and most classical kind, accompanied sometimes by the seraphine, and sometimes by the military band.

MR. AND MADAME BALFE'S CONCERT.—A laudable custom has been adopted of late years by our noblesse of throwing open their houses, and turning their salons into public concert rooms, for the benefit of such members of the musical profession as are so fortunate as to possess a musical Maecenas. On Wednesday evening Lady Tankerv lle's drawing-rooms were placed at the disposal of Mr and Madame Balfe, for the reception of the guinea-paying guests. We may congratulate Mr. Balfe on the results of his soirée, as it was one of the most superb réunions of the season. Amongst the crowd we observed the Marquis of Headfort, Marquis of Titchfield, Lady Palmerston, Hon. J. Macconald., Lord Lowther, Lord Ossulston, &c Rubini was in excellent voice, and was received with much empressement. In the second part Madame Balfe was encored in a charming, beautiful little ballad by Balfe. Ronconi and Weiss also sang "Suoni la Tromba" with much energy and expression. In Part III., Balfe's admirable and popular trio, from his "Falstaff," was sung by Miss Kemble, Madame Balfe, and Miss Mason. Miss Kemble afterwards made a superb display of her transcendant powers in two songs, in the latter of which she went beyond her former efforts, and created a universal feeling of delight and admiration. The song to which we here allude was composed by M. Dessauer, with words by Mr. Alfred Tennyson. Some selections from the "Stabat Mater concluded the evening's entertainments.

THE FASHIONS

Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin, Paris, June.

Mon cher Monsieur,—The warmth of the weather has induced the pretty general adoption of white both for morning and evening dresses.

Cambric muslins are much worn for morning deshabille; these robes have high corsages, disposed in perpendicular plaits to the waist, where they are set into a plain band. Demi large sleeve, tight at the upper part, moderately full in the centre, but descending almost tight to the wrist, where it is terminated by a small plaited clear cambric ruffle, or one of Valenciennes lace.

Nothing can be lighter or more fresh in their appearance than bonnets in tulle bouillonnée, particularly when relieved by a wreath of lilies of the valley with the dew upon them.

Muslin scarfs, bordered with lace, daily supersede the shawls—they are sometimes lined with shot silk.

India muslin tarlatan and organdie are the favourite materials for evening dress.

Robes of white organdie have a very rich appearance when embroidered in wreaths of various colours.

Muslin dresses have low bodies trimmed with folds, revers, of folds and Mechlin inlet; sleeves plain and very short, bordered with two folds and inlet, and the skirt very long, trimmed with from six to nine folds or tucks, with inlet between. These dresses are worn over a slip of a pretty light colour.

Au revoir, Monsieur, FELICIE.

THE LATE FRED. H. YATES.

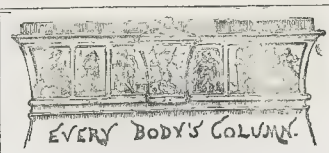
PORTRAIT OF YATES.

We last week, in recording the sad and sudden decease of this accomplished and popular actor, presented to our readers a brief memoir of his theatrical career. We now give a portrait of him, taken some years before his death; but in the likeness which we subjoin at the close of this notice he will be best recognised by our readers, as he is there depicted in the precise spirit and character in which he has so often made his appearance before his Adelphi audience, with those inimitable morceaux of appeal to their reason or justice which episodes of disturbance called forth, and which no other manager in Europe would have dared to utter. He, however, kept his privilege, and his audience used to give him his way, and aid his popularity with an undeviating good humour of their own. He was their pet "boy," and they would not have him roffled.

We have now the melancholy task of laying before our readers an account of the last illness and funeral of their lost favourite. On Mr. Yates's arrival in London, on Friday, the 10th ult., he was conveyed to the Victoria Hotel, Euston-square, whence he was removed on Thursday, the 16th, to lodgings in Mornington-crescent, where he breathed his last on Tuesday, the 21st. He sank from exhaustion, never having suffered pain during his illness. It is to be lamented that he was not removed earlier to London, where, under the care of his medical attendants, Doctors Billing and Yates, who knew his constitution and ardent temperament, he would not have been so reduced. All the subsequent efforts of these able men were ineffectual, and, from the moment of his arrival, no reasonable hope of his recovery was entertertained. Everything that the most devoted attachment could dictate was done for him by his amiable wife, his family, and a few sincere friends, who never left him. He was perfectly sensible of his approaching dissolution, and with his last breath commended Mrs. Yates to the care of those whom he knew would never desert her.

By his own desire his funeral was strictly private, and his remains were followed, on Sunday morning, the 20th ult., to the family vault, in St. Martin's Church, by his son, his brother (Doctor Yates), his nephew (Charles Yates), Mr. Gladstane (his partner), and his attached friends, Mr. Hodgson, M.P., and Mr. Manby.

It may appear singular that the interment of a man who was so highly esteemed, not only among his private friends, but generally in the profession of which he was so distinguished an ornament, should not have been attended by a large assemblage: but with great good taste his wishes were strictly complied with, and only a few of the older members of the Adelphi corps, such as Wilkinson and Lyon, and the old servants of the theatre, were in waiting at the church, to render the last testimony of respect to the remains of him who was always an indulgent master and a kind friend to them all. His talents as a theatrical manager are well known; but his private worth as a friend, and his domestic virtues, can only be estimated by the few who were admitted to his intimacy, and who must now feel acutely the loss they have sustained.



JULY.

The clean-rak'd fields resume their green attire;
The flocks, close-shorn, o'er downs and meadows stray;
Men, birds, and beasts, to coverts calm retire;
Nature respires, by night; and pants, by day.
The stately swan, to shun the noontide blaze,
On lake and river, in their isles or creeks,
Leading her cygnets to the verdant maze,
The breezy shade and grassy coolness seeks.
The foremost fruits are tempting ripe, to treat
The present thirst, or pile their fragrant wealth;
Currants, and berries rich, and cherries sweet,
A mixture that invigorates the health!
While pungent scents of lavender, and flowers,
Ma Mignonne—Eglantine revive the drooping hours.

NO STRANGER OF ME

A parson who had a scolding wife one day brought home a brother clergyman to dinner. Having gone into a separate apartment to speak to his spouse about the repast, she attacked and abused him for bringing a parcel of idle fellows to eat up their income. The parson, provoked at her behaviour, said, in a pretty loud tone, "If it were not for the stranger, I would give you a good drubbing." "Oh!" cried the visitor, "I beg you will make no stranger of me."

ROGUERY OF OUR ANCESTORS.

An Irishman telling what he called an excellent story, a gentleman observed, he had met with it in a book published many years ago. "Confound those ancients!" said the Irishman, "they are always stealing one's good thoughts."

EXPERIENCE.

Experience is the most eloquent of preachers, but she has never a large congregation.—Mirror.

"My muse," says a lively dramatic writer of the age of Queen Anne "produces me a play every year, and my wife a child; but I find the latter much more disposed to live than the former."

PROFITING BY THE EXPERIENCE OF OTHERS.

A celebrated clergyman was called upon by a gentleman to attend a friend in the country. The gentleman offered to carry him to the place. By what conveyance?" "I will take you down in my gig." "I am much obliged to you," said the wary disciple of Æsculapius, "but I decline your offer, as I have at this time half-a-dozen gig patients under my care."

OLD FRIENDS TOGETHER.

Oh! time is sweet when roses meet
With spring's sweet breath around them;
And sweet the cost when hearts are lost,
If those we love have found them!
And sweet the mind that still can find
A star in darkest weather;
But nought can be so sweet to see
As old friends met together!

Those days of old, when youth was bold,
And time stole wings to speed it,
And youth ne'er knew how fast time flew,
Or, knowing, did not heed it!
Though grey each brow that greets us now—
For age brings wintry weather—
Yet nought can be so sweet to see
As those old friends together!

The few long known that years have shown,
With hearts that friendship blesses;
A hand to cheer, perchance a tear,
To sooth a friend's distresses,
That helped and tried, still side by side,
A friend to face hard weather;
Oh, thus may we yet joy to see,
And meet old friends together!

I will tell you, scholar, I have heard a grave divine say, that God has two dwellings—one in heaven, and the other in a meek and thankful heart.—Izaak Walton.

He who is always in want of something cannot be very rich! 'Tis a poor wight who lives by borrowing the words, decisions, mien, invention, and actions of others.—Lavater.

DEFINITIONS OF PLEASURE.

It is difficult to say what pleasure means. Pleasure in a country miss just "come out," means "a race ball, and so many partners, that she has danced till she can hardly stand." Pleasure to an aspirant after fashion, means "a card for Devonshire-house, or a nod from Lady ——." Pleasure to a schoolboy, means "tying a string to his schoolfellow's toe when he is asleep, and pulling till it awaken him." Pleasure to a man of an inquiring mind, means "a toad inside a stone, or a beetle running with its head off." Pleasure to a man of taste, means "a first rate artist and a good dinner." Pleasure to a labouring man, means "doing nothing." Pleasure to a fine lady, means "having something to do to drive away the time." Pleasure to an antiquarian, means "an illegible inscription." Pleasure to a connoisseur, means "a dark, invisible, very fine picture." Pleasure to a philosopher—a modern philosopher, a young philosopher, means "liking nothing, despising everything: and proving every one a simpleton except himself." Pleasure to a beggar, means "a sovereign by mistake, instead of a shilling." Pleasure to a sailor, "a fresh breeze, and a sight of land." Pleasure to the afflicted, "a tear." Pleasure to the sweetest of all tempers, "the last word in an argument." Pleasure to the social, "the human face divine." Pleasure to the morose, "I shan't see a soul for the next six months." Pleasure to an author, "the last page of his manuscript"—bliss inexpressible—"Finis" Pleasure to all, every one in their own way, and that way a different one.—Anne Grey.

BEING TAPPED.

An old toper, in the last stages of the dropsy, was told by his physician that nothing would save him but being "tapped." His son (a witty little shaver) objected to this operation, saying, "Daddy, daddy, don't submit to it; for you know there was never anything tapped in our house that lasted more than a week."

BANK ROGUERY.

In a late number of "Sylvester's Counterfeit Detector" we find a list of the names of upwards of 1200 banks in the United States. Upon a careful examination, we find that of the 1200 upwards of 300 are broken or "no sale," which means the same thing; 64 are fraudulent institutions; 44 are either closed or closing; 35 are at a discount of from 25 to 90 per cent.; 62 are from 2 to 20 per cent. discount; and but 92 are at par, or worth 100 cents on the dollar, in the city of New York. The same paper also contains a list of over 300 different counterfeits on the various banking institutions in the Union. These are some of the beauties of banking.

"I am afraid of the lightning," murmured a pretty young woman during a storm. "Well you may," sighed her despairing adorer, "when your heart is steel."

NEWTON'S SKULL.

A lady visiting the British Museum, inquired if they had a skull of Newton; when answered in the negative, she said, "I wonder at that: they have got one at Oxford."

CHILDHOOD.

Childhood is like a mirror, catching and reflecting images from all around it. Remember that an impious or profane thought, uttered by a parent's lip, may operate on the young heart like a careless spray of water thrown upon polished steel, staining it with rust which no after scouring can efface.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

ARCHES COURT.—Monday, June 27.

KING v. KING

This was a suit for divorce by John against Eliza King, his wife, on the ground of adultery, with a man of the name of Stacey, who was said to be a conductor of an omnibus; and the plea which had been given in as a bar to the husband's claim for separation was not a denial of the crime, but the insanity of the lady. An allegation was to-day offered on her behalf, stating the facts. It asserted that this lady had always been of weak mind and of eccentric habits, but that since 1837, the birth of her first child, when her labour was protracted for two days, and her sufferings great, she had exhibited peculiar dulness at one time and restlessness at another. She had been cross and ill-tempered, had refused on many occasions signs of insanity, and had been placed, and now was, under the care of Dr Sutherland

Her Majesty's Advocate and Dr Curteis, in opposing for the husband the admission of the allegation, said that the general averment of insanity commenced in November, 1839 and, as the first adultery was alleged to have been committed in the beginning of that year, the insanity, if proved, could be no defence. But the allegation itself made out no case of insanity. The lady was said to have been of weak mind and eccentric habits in early life, and to have been dull and restless in her later years. But was this insanity, and could insanity be inferred from it? There were no facts spoken to which indicated unsoundness of mind during the commission of the adultery, or which tended to show that this lady was not aware of the immoral character and consequence of the offence which she was committing.

Dr Phillimore, for the wife, contended that a defendant labouring under this infirmity, was entitled to especial protection—so much so that Blackstone had it down that a sentence, even when pronounced, would be stayed by the lunacy of the person convicted

The Court: Upon that principle, can a suit be brought against Mrs. King, who is now admitted to be a lunatic?

Dr. Phillimore: I should contend not. It is certainly against the policy of the English law.

Her Majesty's Advocate: But the objection cannot now be brought forward Mrs. King has appeared by her father, who is agent and curator, and an allegation has been given in on her behalf. This admits the jurisdiction, and precludes the party from making any such objection now.

The Court: I cannot without I could pronounce a sentence of divorce against a lunatic; and, though the objection must be brought forward in a different form, I must direct the case to stand over.

BARGESS v. BURGESS.

This was a suit for divorce, on the ground of adultery, by the wife against the husband. The husband had not appeared, and the suit was not opposed. The Court, satisfied of the husband's adultery, signed the sentence of divorce.

STREET v. STREET.

A similar course was pursued in this, which was also an unopposed claim for separation

The case of the Rev. Mr. Langley, perpetual curate of the parish church of Wheatley, in Oxfordshire, who was prosecuted against for child-stealing and breaking a church, under a recent statute, was this day brought to a close: when the learned judge gave sentence, and directed that Mr. Langley should be suspended from the exercise of eight calendar months from the day when the sentence was proclaimed in the parish, and that it should be signified there by fixing it on the door of the church on next Sunday The Court was bound also to condemn Mr. Langley in all the costs of these proceedings.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH, Guildhall.—Wednesday, June 29

Sittings at Nisi Prius, before Lord Chief Justice Denman and Common Juries

BREESE v. HEAP

This was an action arising out of a dispute on the Blackwall Railway, in which the plaintiff charges a gentleman with smoking a cigar; but, having declined to prosecute after going to the station-house, he was locked up for the night, and the property which he had about him, consisting of a silver watch and a small sum of money, was taken possession of by the police. On the next morning he was taken before the Lord Mayor, by whom he was discharged. He then demanded the watch and money, but the authorities at the station house refused to give them up unless he signed a statement which seemed to him to contain an acknowledgment of the propriety of his committal, and to which he therefore refused to affix his name He has already been at an enormous expense in the amusement against Mr. Jerdeine (the person accused of smoking), in which he obtained a verdict and damages. The present action was in trover to recover the money and the watch

Mr. Jervis and Mr. Ogle appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. M. D Hill and Mr. Hewson for the defence.

Lord Denman having summed up the case to the jury, they found a verdict for the plaintiff.

WALTER v. W. N. HOPE

The plaintiff in this case is the landlady of the King's Head Inn, Puddingline. The defendant is a young man connected with the medical profession, and is the son of a lieutenant in the navy residing at Chatham; and the present action was brought to recover the sum of £65, for the board, lodging, and washing of the defendant and his wife, who is the plaintiff's daughter. It appeared that the evidence that the defendant, whilst attending the hospitals, frequented the plaintiff's house, and became acquainted with herself and her daughters. For one of these he conceived a very violent affection, and upon some difficulties being thrown in the way of his proposed union with the lady, he threatened to put an end to his existence He succeeded, however, in procuring the plaintiff's consent to his marriage, which accordingly took place. Some cause or other, not explained, produced an estrangement of his affection, and a separation took place, his wife continuing with her mother, and the husband removing elsewhere. The present action was brought to recover compensation for the expense which the mother had been at in supporting her daughter since the marriage, and for some necessaries furnished to the husband both before and after that event

Mr. Pratt and Mr Ball appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. M. Chambers and Mr. Bovill for the defence

Upon both sides evidence was given of the circumstances which attended the courtship and cohabitation, and of facts from which the jury were desired upon the one hand to infer that Mrs. Walter had undertaken to support her daughter and son-in-law; and on the other, that the defendant had expressly contracted to pay two guineas a week for the board and lodging of himself and his wife

The jury, after a very elaborate statement of the evidence by Lord Denman entered upon the consideration of their verdict, and, after having consulted together for about three quarters of an hour, found for the plaintiff—Damages, £24 2s. 6d

EXCHEQUER COURT.—Wednesday

BARBINI v. BUCK.

It appeared in this case that the defendant, travelling in Italy, purchased pictures for a sum of £970 from the plaintiff, who is an agent for such articles at Venice. The defence was that the pictures, the "Three Graces," and a "Venus in Venice," we e warranted originals by Giorgione and Canaletti but had on arriving in this country they turned out to be copies The pictures were sold for £16, and this action was brought for the freight and charges and balance of the sum agreed upon as the price. The defendant endeavoured to show that the warranty was broken; but, as he paid a sum of £50 into court, it was decided that no proof could be given as to the nature of the contract, and the only question was as to the fairness of the charges.

Verdict for plaintiff

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY, Basinghall-street.—Tuesday.

(Before Mr. Commissioner Evans.)

WILLIAMS AND NOTTRAM'S BANKRUPTCY.—THE LINEN-DRAPERY TRADE.

This case, which has excited much interest in the public mind, came before the court to-day in the shape of an examination of witnesses in continuation of parts the evidence adduced on a former occasion, relative to the destruction of the book which the bankrupts used, called the salary

After a number of witnesses had been examined, Mr. Maynard, who appeared for the assignees, said he should not at that time proceed further with the evidence but should reserve it for the purpose of a future investigation. He had in the course of the present examination got at the fact that the salary book, which it had been sworn was destroyed three months before the bankruptcy, was in existence, and was seen by Mr. Fraser, who had been examined a fortnight before the bankrupts stopped payment, with the very signature to the terms upon which he agreed with the first entered their employ. That great economy examination also proved the additional important truth, that the sums of money which were placed in the receipt statement of salaries were not paid to him, and that they could not then have been paid as entered, the dates in the earliest instance being a fortnight subsequent to his actual quitting of service.

The official assignee said it was a complete contradiction of the story relative to the salary book.

Mr. Commissioner Evans: Then, if that is the case, they have never paid the money so stated. Should that be found true, should it eventually appear they have concealed this money, I shall most certainly refuse to sign the certificate.

The proceedings were then adjourned.

(Before Mr. Commissioner Holroyd.)

WILLIAM HITCHCOCK'S BANKRUPTCY.—THE LINEN DRAPERY TRADE.

This often-reported case came on before the court to-day, the sitting being for the proof of the contested debt of Messrs. Cook and Gladstone, of St. Paul's Churchyard

Mr. Sole, the solicitor to the assignees, said an arrangement had been effected between the creditors and Messrs Cook and Co., which was, that by that firm paying into the hands of the official assignee £1500, all further litigation should be suspended, and they allowed to prove their debts of £4000 and £7000.

A creditor said this compromise should have been approved.

Mr. Commissioner Holroyd saw no necessity for it the assignees would take all the responsibility. It must, he added, be good news for the creditors to know that all litigation was at an end.

It is stated a further dividend will shortly be declared for the creditors.

WEDNESDAY.

(Before Sir C. F. Williams.)

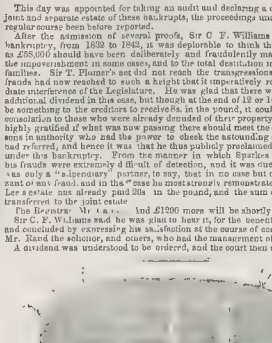
THE BANKRUPTCY OF SPARKS AND CO., OF THE GUILDFORD BANK IN RE ANTHONY LEE

This day was appointed for taking an audit and declaring a dividend upon the joint and separate estate of these bankrupts, the proceedings under which have in regular course been before reported.

After the admission of several proofs, Sir C F. Williams said in this one bankruptcy, from 1832 to 1842, it was deplorable to think that so large a sum as £58,000 should have been deliberately and fraudulently made away with, to the impoverishment in some cases, and to the total destitution in others, of whole families. Sir T. Plumer's act did not reach the transgression in question, but Parliament had now reached to such a height that it imperatively required the immediate interference of the Legislature. He was glad that there was likely to be an additional dividend in this case, but though at the end of 12 or 14 months it might be something to the creditors to receive 8s. in the pound, it could afford but little consolation to those who were already denuded of their property. He should feel highly gratified if what was now passing there should meet the eyes of those persons in authority who had the power to check the astounding evils to which he had referred, and hence it was that he thus publicly proclaimed what had passed under this bankruptcy in the manner in which Sparkes and Lee carried on his frauds were extremely difficult of detection, and it was due to Mr. Lee, who was only a "dormant" partner, to say, that in no case but one was he consultant of such fraud, and in that case he most strongly remonstrated against it. Mr. Lee's estate has already paid 20s in the pound, and the sum of £900 has been transferred to the joint estate

The Bankers—Messrs. —— and £1200 more will be shortly handed over Sir C. F. Williams said he was glad to hear it, for the benefit of the creditors, and concluded by expressing his satisfaction at the course of conduct pursued by Mr. Rand the solicitor, and others, who had the management of this estate.

A dividend was understood to be ordered, and the court then adjourned.



Mansion-house, Monday.—The Lord Mayor found it necessary to at once in terms of strong reprehension the conduct of some of the consuls residing in London for foreign governments, with respect to desertion from foreign vessels.—It ought to be trusted, the attention of the British government, or of Parliament, would be called before the termination of the present session. He had called the attention of the American consul a short time ago, to the deplorable condition of an unfortunate sailor who had been born in one of the Italian States, which was subject to that government, and who had been abandoned to starvation, or his casual charity of those who walked the streets To that miserable individual's claim the consul turned a deaf ear; because it happened that the claimant had worked on board an English vessel, no assistance was given. On the previous occasion a Spanish sailor appeared at the police office to return thanks to the Lord Mayor for his admission into Bartholomew's Hospital, through the instrumentality of his lordship's order, and for the care and attention he had experienced during a period of nearly six months of continued ill-treatment there by a severe and protracted illness. The Spaniard, who spoke the English language well, said had the appearance of an invalid, stated that about seven months ago he was paid off in London from an English vessel, and after leaving endeavour to procure a ship, and having sold all his decent clothes for food, he had applied, with a shipmate and fellow-country man, to the Spanish consul for assistance That functionary having ascertained that they had been serving on board an English vessel, refused to give them any help or advice whatever, and drove them contumeliously from his office. The Lord Mayor said he felt it incumbent upon him to state that the American consul was marked by inhumane execution to the class of persons of whom he had spoken. The gentleman had uniformly come forward to the aid and relief of poor Americans that applied to

Soon after his lordship had expressed himself on the subject of the conduct of some of the consular functionaries, an American sailor was brought before him. This seaman had broken windows in order to obtain a lodging, and, upon being questioned by the Lord Mayor, told a melancholy tale about his sufferings and privations, and stated that all he wanted was a passage home. But the case having been clearly proved, the prisoner was sentenced to be imprisoned for two calendar months.

Guildhall.—Tuesday.—James Cavanaugh, a tall Irish tailor, was charged with assaulting Daniel Steward, a city policeman and savagely breaking his arm in his own shop. Evidence of the assault having been given, the prisoner said he was very sorry. He was the worse for liquor at the time, and the policeman irritated him by saying he hated all Irishmen, and giving him the first blow—Mr James Duke said, he should remand the prisoner till Friday, to see whether the policeman was in danger from the dreadful injury he had received, and the prisoner might depend on receiving the heaviest punishment the law would allow.

The prisoner asked if he might be bailed?—Mr James Duke said certainly not till it was known that Steward was out of danger.—The prisoner was then remanded till Friday.

Ann Roberts, a woman about thirty five years of age, in the service of the Rev. Herbert Kynaston, one of the masters of St. Paul's School, was charged with having a certain quantity of beef and bread, with which she had entertained a man to whom she had called to see her.—Evidence of the facts having been given the prisoner replied, the young man was formerly a fellow-servant with her at the Rev. Mr. Farrington's, and he called in passing. On inquiring for her, the other servant invited him in, and she was not locked in with him, as her mistress's sister-in-law was with the man who called to see her. If she could have asked leave to give the visitor a lunch she would have done so, but her mistress had not been, and she understood Lady master had gone to bed again, and she had no opportunity of asking her. The young lady came into the kitchen to ask her to make some gruel for a little dog that sleeps with her, and, when prisoner spoke to her for the presence of the stranger, she told them not to disturb themselves as he was a friend. She gave him the beef and bread, and some tea and sugar with such nonsense. She must see the impropriety of a servant asking visitors to eat and drink at her master's expense without his consent, and if she had done wrong she ought to have an apology, and the forgiveness Without a character, what was to become of her now?—The reverend gentleman's footman was then examined. Mr. Combe: Have you any thing to observe—I am going to send you for trial.?—Prisoner: Is it a serious thing?—Mr. Combe: No, but for stealing the collar.—Prisoner: Where is the collar? Mr. Combe: That is more than I can tell.—The prisoner was then committed.—He is a noted dog-stealer

Union Hall.—On Tuesday, Edward Lansley, a young man of respectable appearance, was brought before Mr. Trelle, charged with assaulting and threatening the life of Mr. John Franks, a surgeon, in Basing-place, Lambeth.—The complainant stated that the defendant had forced himself into his bed-room and dragged him out on the lobby.—Mr. Trelle asked the complainant to what he attributed such an attack on the part of the young man whom he made the charge against? The complainant said that he attended the defendant's father in a medical capacity, and that the young man asserted that he had killed him.—The defendant here ejaculated, "and so you did: the proof of his death by unfair means will now be brought to light, as my father's body shall be taken out of the grave and examined for the purpose."—The complainant said that the defendant's father had now been dead fourteen years, and it was evident the young man labored under the extraordinary delusion that he was poisoned.—Defendant: "And so he was poisoned."—The defendant on being asked whether he had to say to the charge, was proceeding to reply in such a strain that it was evident his mind was affected. Some of his relations having been sent for, they attributed it to intense study, and added that they observed a sudden alteration in his manners for the last few days particularly; that the extraordinary delusion which manifested itself in this case was that his father had been poisoned by the complainant, and although the body had been in the grave fourteen years, yet he took it into his head that it was about to be exhumed to undergo an examination. On all other subjects the defendant was perfectly sane, and transacted his business, that of an attorney, with correctness and accuracy. It was ultimately arranged that the relations of the defendant should take him into the country for some time, to see whether a change of air would benefit him.

A countryman, from Devizes, attended to give information of having been plundered that day of £16, by some of the sharpers with which the metropolis abounds. The applicant stated that he was no stranger in London, being up here twice before; and that in the course of that morning he went to a banker's in Lombard-street, and got a check for £16 cashed. As he was walking a-top King William-street, he was accosted by a well-dressed man, who said that he had just arrived by one of the "liners" from New York, adding that he was a "Yankee," and that he had several American sovereigns in his possession, and was not aware that money was weighed at this side of the Atlantic until he landed at St. Katharine's Dock. He then produced a yellow bag, containing what appeared to be gold, and invited the applicant to take some refreshment at a neighbouring public-house. The invitation was accepted, and they had hardly seated themselves when the stranger requested applicant to lend him a sovereign, in order to test its weight against one of his own country. Applicant complied, believing there were American sovereigns as well as English; and for this purpose he pulled three £5 notes, in which a sovereign was wrapped up, out of his fob, and giving the latter coin to his new companion, left the notes momentarily on the table while the fellow was examining the difference between the coins. This having been done, they were returned to the pocket-book, and he informed the stranger that on taking out his notes, and advised him to return them to his fob, which he did, and soon after the man departed. When applicant found that notes of the "Bank of Fashion" had been substituted for his genuine notes, and in guess of his sovereign a counterfeit one had been given to him. He then gave a description of the man, both of whom are known to the police as "babblers," who visit fairs and horse races, and are adepts at the "thimble-rig," and other games of a similar description. The magistrate said the applicant had displayed very little knowledge of the world to have been gulled by such follows as those whom he described.—Orders were given to the police to apprehend the men.

On Wednesday Samuel Fish, a policeman of the P division, and Olivia Davis, cook in a gentleman's family at Talse-hill, were brought up under the following circumstances:—On the preceding night the prisoner was missing at a late hour from her master's house, and, on search being made for her, she and the policeman were found together in a summer-house at the bottom of the garden drinking a bottle of wine, while his trousers were being taken to "throw a light on the subject." The wine-cellar having been broken open in order to procure the beverage for the policeman, both parties were given into custody. On a further examination of the female prisoner's boxes, several articles belonging to her master were found, together with a quantity of tea and sugar; and the whole of the property being identified as stolen, Davis, the cook, was committed for trial, and the policeman was fined 10s., which is a pastime him in future from serving in the force.

Sir Augustus Clifford has arrived on a visit to the Duke of Devonshire, at Kemp Town. His Grace has much improved in health during his short sojourn in Brighton.

The Earl of Eglington and the Hon. F. Charteries, M.P., left town on Monday last for Cheltenham, to attend the races at Gloucester, of which the noble earl and hon. gentlemen are stewards.

Sir Edward L. Bulwer has recently completed a new drama, which Mr. Macready has accepted; and it will be one of the earliest novelties at Drury-lane next winter season, which will commence in September.

The Greek Observer of the 9th of June, informs us that on the 3rd, Admiral Susse gave a grand entertainment, with dancing, on board the Inflexible, at the Piræus. The King and Queen of Greece were present, and remained until midnight. Amongst the amusements of the evening was a vaudeville, performed by amateurs of the crew.

Rumoured Death of the Earl of Lichfield.—It was generally reported at the clubs on Tuesday evening, and the rumour was very general at the West-end, that the noble lord's death had taken place at Naples, where he was residing with the Countess

The Late Lord Rodney.—At an early hour on Wednesday morning the mortal remains of his lordship were removed from Sir Charles Morgan's residence, in Pall-mall, for interment in the family vault at Alresford, Hants.

Lord Morpeth in America.—The New York Herald announces that Lord Morpeth is at the White Sulphur Springs, and intends to spend the summer at Saratoga, Niagara Falls, and Upper and Lower Canada. His lordship, it appears, wherever he gets a chance, travels by stages in preference to railroads or steam-boats, and always takes the reins and drives himself, if the driver will let him.

Major-General Percevel Lewis, R.M., died at Stonehouse, near Plymouth, on Monday last, in the 70th year of his age. He served in many of the naval engagements during the last war in the Royal Marines, and was promoted to his own colonelcy on the 28th of December, 1830, and to the last brevet rank of Major-General.

The Hon. Mrs. Charles Fox is seriously ill at her villa, called St. Ann's Hill, near Chertsey, and owing to advanced age and infirmities, her medical attendants do not expect her to rally. Mrs. Fox, who is the widow of the Right Hon. Charles James Fox, great uncle to the present Lord Holland, is nearly ninety years of age.

A correspondent of the National at Toulon, in a hasty postscript to a letter with Levant and port news of no interest, says:—"A telegraphic despatch arrived here this morning (the date is not given), recalling the Prince de Joinville to the Tuileries. Orders have been given to the steamer Sphynx to go after the squadron and bring back the Captain of the Belle Poule. We are lost in conjectures as to the cause of this sudden recal.

The Austrian Observer states, under its Constantinople head, that the last news from Trebizond announced that Sir Hugh M'Neil, Brigadier Emmet at the court of Persia, was performing quarantine in hat town, and that he reckoned setting out for Constantinople on the 8th ult.

The packet-ship George Washington, Captain Burrows, which sailed from New York on the 8th ultimo, arrived at Liverpool on Wednesday morning. Mr. Charles Dickens (Boz) and his lady were passengers by her.

A free charge for the poor is about being erected in the parish of Whitechapel, for the accommodation of the destitute poor. The population amounts to 34,000, and there is at present only church accommodation for 3000. The sum already collected in aid of this object is £2400 in donations, and £2000 from the Church Commissioners.

The New Music Hall.—The projectors of this building have abandoned the intention of having it in Leicester-square, in consequence of the ground being required by the Commissioners of Woods and Forests for the improvements of the metropolis for their contemplated alterations; and it will now be built in the vicinity of her Majesty's Theatre, the site being purchased.

The total eclipse of the sun, which will take place on the 7th of July, 1842, is exciting much attention among the scientific, not only in England and on the Continent, but in America. In the Royal Astronomical Society's notice for the last month there appears a paper by Lieutenant W. S. Stratford, R.A., on the path of the moon's shadow over the southern part of Europe, the north of Italy, and part of Germany, during the total eclipse of the sun on July 7, 1842.

Lady Catherine Townley, the wife of Charles Townley, Esq., has, it is said, been received into the Roman Catholic Church.

The Spanish Consul-General has written a letter to the Times, denying the imputations made against him by the Lord Mayor at the Mansion-house on Monday last, with reference to the treatment of Spanish marines arriving in this country in foreign vessels.

The Bishop of Norwich, Sir Grey Skipwith, and several others of the former pupils of the late Dr. Arnold, master of Rugby School, were present at the funeral of the very gentleman, whose remains were deposited in a vault underneath the altar of the chapel on Friday last.

Attempted Assassination.—On Saturday night last, as Mr. Mark Knight, of Exeter, was entering his own house, a miscreant discharged a pistol at him, which, by marks subsequently discovered, appeared to have been heavily laden with small shot. Mr. Knight, with the exception of a slight wound on the chin, altogether escaped injury. A shoemaker named Trump was arrested on suspicion of having committed the offence.

Distress in Paisley.—The number of unemployed in Paisley, as taken up on a new inspection, amounts to 9650. For some weeks past the unemployed have been supported with funds entrusted to their charge by commissioners from London; but Mr. Twistleton, one of the commissioners, has intimated his connexion with the Paisley Relief Committee in London to organize a new committee to take charge of the employment.

The Times, on the suggestion of a correspondent, says, that the crowd which usually assembles at the gates of Buckingham Palace, on occasions when her Majesty takes her airing, might pay her Majesty a more agreeable compliment by politely uncovering the head than by the vulgar "huzza;" a repetition of this on such occasions as these, he imagines, must be rather disagreeable than otherwise to her Majesty. With due deference to our contemporary, we think her Majesty has too much good sense to be offended with her subjects for expressing their regard in this hearty and manly manner. We prefer sincerity to politeness always.

FLOWERS.

Beautiful Flowers! wherever we bloom,
With your soft-tinted leaves, and your fragrant perfume;
Whether in Spring ye come forth from the ground,
Or when Autumn scatters her dead leaves around;
Whether in cottage or palace ye dwell,
Beautiful Flowers! I love ye well.

Behold a young girl, in her mirthful play,
Laughing the hours of childhood away,
The light winds are waving her sunny hair,
And her voice sounds sweet in the silent air
While her fair hands are twining, from summer bowers,
Wild blooming wreaths of beautiful Flowers.

The scene's now changed, for years have flown;
That gay laughing girl to a woman has grown;
And the lover is there, who fain would tell
The secret their eyes have reveal'd too well!
But Flowers he plants in her snowy breast,
And their eloquent leaves have his love confest.

'Tis a bridal morn, and loudly swells
A merry peal from the old church-bells;
The white-rob'd bride is smiling now
'Neath a budding wreath from the orange-bough;
And bright-ev'd maidens before her strew
Beautiful Flowers, of every hue.

There's a voice of sorrow—for time hath fled—
A wife and a mother lies cold and dead;
They've laid her to sleep in her endless rest,
With a young babe clasp'd to her marble breast;
And Flowers are there, with their perfum'd breath,
Decking the bud and the blossom in death.

In the green churchyard is a lonely spot,
Where the joyous sunshine enters not;
Deep in the gloom of the cypress' shade,
There is her home in the cold earth made,
And over still the sweet flowrets bloom—
They were near her in life, and forsake not her tomb.

Beautiful Flowers! ye seem to be
Link'd in the fond ties of memory
Companions ye were to our childhood's day—
Companions ye are for our lifeless clay:
And barren and drear were this wide world of ours,
Lacking the smile of the beautiful Flowers!

FREDERICA EMILIE D.

LIBERALITY OF LORD ELDON.

In 1783, when Mr. Scott first became a candidate for the borough of Weobly, he was received and lodged in the house of Mr. Bridge, the vicar, who, having a daughter, then a young child, took a jocular promise from him, that if he should ever become Chancellor, and the little girl's husband should be a clergyman, the Chancellor would give the clergyman a living. Now comes the sequel, partly related by Lord Eldon himself to his niece, Mrs. Foster.

Years rolled on I came into office; when one morning I was told a young lady wished to speak to me; and I said that young ladies must be attended to, so they must show her up. And up came a pretty young lady, and she curtsied and simpered, and said she thought I could not recollect her. I answered I certainly did not, but perhaps she could recal herself to my memory; so she asked me if I remembered the clergyman at Weobly, and as little girl, to whom I had made a promise.

"Oh yes," I said, "I do, and I suppose you are the little girl?"

She curtsied, and said "Yes."

"And I suppose you are married to a clergyman?"

"No," she said, and she blushed, "I am only going to be married to one. I hope you, my lord, will give him a living."

Well, I left her to come back in a few days, and I made inquiries to ascertain from the bishop of the diocese that the gentleman she was going to be married to was a respectable clergyman of the Church of England, and then I looked at my list, and found I actually had a living vacant that I could give him. So, when the young lady came back, I told her she might return home and get married as soon as she liked, for her intended husband should be presented to a living, and I would send the papers as soon as they could be made out.

"Oh no!" she exclaimed, and again she simpered, and blushed, and curtsied; "pray, my lord, let me take them back myself."

I was a good deal amused; so I actually had the papers made out, and I sealed them, and she took them back herself the following day. But, alas for the honour of man! Miss Bridge, after all, did not become Mrs. Jones until two years after the gentleman had been rector of Stanton.

The son of the clergyman who ultimately married them at Stanton writes thus:—"Jones would have jilted the lady, but was shamed into the fulfilment of his engagement by the friends and relations of both parties. Miss Bridge, with her party, arrived there from Hereford in a post-chaise. She refused, however, to enter the parsonage-house, until she did so as his wife."

To conclude the story, Mrs. Jones survived her husband, and, being in indigent circumstances, once more applied to the Chancellor, "to obtain for her an admission into a recently-instituted establishment, near Bath, for the support, maintenance, comfort, and benefit of the widows of clergymen and others." Lord Eldon not only complied with her request, but sent her money to defray the expenses of her removal.

MISCELLANEOUS.

It is asserted, on the authority of parties connected with the Mint, that the half-farthing coinage will not be ready for two or three months.

A WELL-ATTESTED EXPERIMENT IN MESMERISM.—To effect the opening of oysters by mesmerism, the operator advances to the oyster-stand gazes intently on the empty plate or saucer—lays a piece of silver upon the stand, and knocks upon the counter; when, without a word being spoken, and with no possible chance for collusion, the mesmerizer advances on the other side of the stand, and, acted upon by the will of the mesmerizer, commences forcing the natives from their shells, one by one, which continued until all have been forced under the plate, when the subject immediately falls back into the real state, and can only be induced to perform again when another piece of silver is placed in the same position. Gull, it is said, will produce the same effect, even to a greater extent than silver.

SLANDER.—It is in the power of every person to preserve their honesty, but who has it in their power to say they can preserve their reputation; while there are so many evil tongues in the world ready to blast the fairest character, and so many open ears to receive reports. In the business of tale-bearing a false tongue hath as much credit as any, for slander hath more power to persuade than either reason or eloquence. The failings of good men are commonly more published in the world than their good deeds; and one fault of a well deserving person will meet with more reproach, than all his virtues praise. Such is the force of ill-will and ill-nature. To see one careless person must pass his whole life without saying or doing one ill or foolish thing; and who is sufficient for this? who can say I have pursued an infallible course? who can even understand his errors, when all, like sheep, have gone astray? Let any man, every mouth be stopped; let that odious spirit which many have, who are better pleased to detect a fault than to commend a virtue, be chiefly employed about their own affairs, and, if I mistake not, they will find so many offences in their own conversation, such variety of perturbations in their own souls, and manifest failures of duty, that will take up so much time to reform, as not to leave room to be impertinent or ill-natured in remarking upon the faults of others. It not only appears silly to see a man endeavouring to procure a good name by slander—that foulest whelp of sin—but it indicates a heart black as death. The man in whom this spirit enters is undone; his soul is set on fire in eagerness to propagate the thing, perhaps, that his own soul hath framed; he finds, ere he is aware, poured upon his head ten thousand slanders, all his own, at which weight his heart recoils, his very eyes weep blood, and every groan is big with horror, as he sees round his dire altar unnumbered victims slain.—M.T.

THE PROPER SELECTION OF SUBJECTS FOR PAINTING.—In the third report of the Commissioners of the Fine Arts, there are some judicious remarks upon the necessity of selecting such subjects for painting as can convey a proper impression of the matter which it is intended to represent; so that the idea may strike the spectator at once. Sir Joshua Reynolds gives an instance of an ill-adapted subject of this kind which was recommended to a painter. It was what passed between James II. and the old Earl of Bedford in the Council which was held just before the Revolution. "As soon as James entered the city, he summoned an assembly of the peers to ask their advice, and to make an apology to them for not having called a Parliament. In passing to the Council he met with a shock, perhaps as severe as any he had felt. Meeting the father of the unfortunate Lord Russell, the old Earl of Bedford, who had offered £100,000 for his son's life, but with the King, when Duke of York, had prevailed with his brother to refuse, he said to the earl, 'My lord, you are a good man; you have much interest with the peers; you can do me service with them to-day.' 'I once had a son,' answered the earl, sighing, 'who could have served your Majesty upon this occasion; James was struck motionless.' This is a very striking piece of history; but so far from being a proper subject, it unluckily possesses no one requisite necessary for a picture."

NELSON'S LAST MEMORABLE SIGNAL.—On the morning of the great event of the battle of Trafalgar, October 21st, 1805, previously to leaving into action, Sir Thomas Hardy requested Lord Nelson to appoint his two senior lieutenants as captains of the line-of-battle ships, the commands of which were vacated by the departure of captains who held them to attend as witnesses at Sir Robert Calder's court-martial; but the reply of the hero was worthy of his hopes—that he considered the officers of those ships were fully adequate to fight them, and he would not imply such a want of confidence in them at such a moment, and as to any disappointment of his own lieutenants, he trusted their anxiety would be allayed when he assured them it was his intention to make them all post captains when the day was done. Shortly after he commanded his memorable signal to be made to the fleet, which it appears was in these words:—"England confides that every man this day will do his duty." This, however, offering some difficulty in communication, from having to spell separately the word "confides," his lordship's flag lieutenant, then the senior of the Victory, suggested that the word "expects" should be substituted, when it was acceded to, and the signal was promptly executed.

QUALIFICATIONS FOR THE BAR AT ALABAMA.—After the formality of an introduction, the judge said "Well, Mr. C., you want to be examined for admittance to the bar." "Yes, sir." "Well, sir, I like something to drink. Barkeeper, give us two julips." After drinking the juleps, the judge said "Mr. C., can you swim?" "Yes, sir, I can," said C., greatly surprised. "Well, sir, let's take another drink. Barkeeper, "two cocktails." The cocktails vanished, and the judge said—"Mr. C., have you got a horse?" "Certainly, sir," said C. "Very good," said the judge, as soberly as though charging a grand jury. "Mr. C., if you please, we'll take a dring. Barkeeper, two toddies." The toddies disappeared, and Cowns he began to feel rather queer. "Mr. C." said the judge, "can your horse swim?"—"Yes, sir, he can—for I have tried him from necessity." "Then, sir, said the judge, with increasing gravity, "your horse can swim—and you can swim, and I think you are well qualified for an Alabama lawyer. Give me your commission, and I will sign it Meanwhile, barkeeper, give us two punches for my friend Mr. C. and myself. Mr. C.," continued the judge, "I drink success to your admission to the Alabama bar."

FIRST CULTIVATE THE IMAGINATION.—In the education of children, love is first to be installed, and out of love, obedience is to be educed. Then impulse and power should be given to the intellect, and the ends of a moral being be extricated. For this object, the faculty of imagination, by means of imitation; that they carry the mind out of self, and show the possible of the good and the great in the human character. The beast, whatever it may be, of the imaginative standard will do no harm; we are commanded to make one who is immitable. We should address ourselves to those faculties in a child's mind which are first awakened by nature, and consequently, first admit of cultivation, that is to say, the memory and the imagination. The conquering power, the judgment, is not at that age active, and ought not to be forcibly excited, as is too frequently and mistakenly done, in the modern systems of education, which can only lead to selfish views, debtor and creditor principles of virtue, and an inflated pride of merit. The expansion of man, and the seeds of all moral and scientific improvement; chemistry was first alchemy, and out of astrology sprang astronomy. In the childhood of those sciences, the imagination opened a way and, through mistakes, on which the ratiocinative power, in a maturer state, operated with success. The imagination is a distinguishing characteristic of man, as a progressive being; and I repeat that it ought to be carefully guided and encouraged, as the indispensible means and instrument of continued amelioration and refinement.—S. T. Coleridge.

KIDNAPPING AT WORKHOUSES. The attention of Mr. Burrell, the sitting magistrate at the Queen-square police-office, was occupied for a considerable time on Saturday last, in investigating a charge connected with the St. Margaret's workhouse, Dean-street, Westminster, which forcibly illustrates the arbitrary and tyrannical character of the present Poor-law, and shows the necessity of the public press—the only real guardian of the rights and liberties of the people—keeping a strict eye over the capricious we should rather say ruffianly (if the phrase were conventional) conduct of the "dogs in office." From the statement made to the magistrate by the complainant, a young woman, who was rather decently, but homely clad, it appeared that her father, who had been for some time unable to support himself by his labour, had recently been received into St. Margaret's workhouse, but that her mother, who had never received or sought for any parochial relief, had remained with her, as she (the applicant) was determined to support her in the best way she could by her own exertions. In the early part of the week, however, her mother was sent for to attend at the workhouse for a few minutes, and witness accompanied her thither. On their entering the house, her mother was ordered into the back part of the building, and applicant was told to go about her business. In two days after applicant called to see her, when she informed her that she had on the succeeding morning been ordered to go to the washing-room, where she was kept employed until the usual hour in the evening, although she had repeatedly expressed a wish to leave the house and return home. We can well imagine the surprise of the worthy magistrate at hearing so startling a statement as this, and do not at all wonder at his expressing great doubts as to the complainant's veracity. A prima facie case, however, having been made out, he sent to the workhouse to make inquiries, and next day Mr. Restell, one of the officers of the establishment was sent to the police-office to give an explanation how to beg the magistrate's attention to Mr. Restell's statement. Mr Restell said, he had no doubt that the case had in some way been misrepresented by the young woman, he did not mean to say intentionally, but because, as he presumed, she did not clearly understand the nature of it. The fact was, that both the parents of the applicant had been passed to St Margaret's workhouse, by an order from the parish officers of St. Giles's, dated the 21st of June, but as the man only came into the house, it was presumed that there was no occasion for the order, and the woman was accordingly sent for, and taken in also. In the meantime the officers of St. Giles's were written to, but he only received their answers on the previous (Friday) evening, although by the post ought to have reached him two days before. He immediately made the parish solicitor acquainted with the contents of that letter, and he, by desire of that gentleman, had that (Saturday) morning placed the whole matter before the proper parish authorities, who decided that there was not the slightest ground for detaining the woman in the workhouse for a single moment.—Mr. Burrell: Very well, then let her be immediately discharged. The applicant, who had been in anxious attendance from an early hour in the morning, asked with great earnestness whether her mother would at once bk set at liberty.—Mr. Restell: Oh, yes, certainly. If you will come with me to the workhouse, she shall go home with you immediately. The parties then left the office. In our opinion comment is unnecessary. Whether we regard the convenient delay of the post-office, or "the presumption that there was an error in the order," it is clear that, under the present system, the most atrocious outrages may be perpetrated on the liberty of the subject, so long as a plausible pretext can be adduced.

MINA'S WIDOWED COUNTESS.—One of the greatest curiosities in this palace at Madrid was, undoubtedly, the Countess of Mina, who was a vr, or governess, to the Queen, and charged with the principal superintendence of her education. The seeing the simple and unpretending daughter of a merchant installed in the office of preceptress to the representative of the proud race of Spanish Bourbons would have been probably a legitimate excuse for seeking an introduction to her; but I should have hardly broke in upon the scanty leisure afforded by her very serious occupations without some previous claim to do so. I had made the acquaintance of her husband and herself when he was living in a small house at Plymouth, an exile from the country he served better than, perhaps, any contemporary, suffering from the wounds he had received in making the only real resistance offered to the iniquitous invasion of 1823, of which he never entirely recovered, and finally died in the flower of his age. I found the countess much improved in health and appearance since that time, when the sufferings and ill-usage of her husband had deeply marked her countenance. Her stature is rather below the middle size, and her person stout, with an abundance of the blackest hair amply dressed; eyes very large, dark, and fuller than usual even in this classic land of them, and beaming with intelligence. Her forehead and lower part of the face are remarkable for their deve opment, and an admirable study for the phrenologists, who would pronounce them models as indicating firmness of character. Her constant costume is the deepest black, and even she accepted the appointment it was stipulated that she should never be required to lay it aside. The only ornament she wore was a simple but rather massive gold chain and cross, which had a singularly good effect in relieving the mass of deep black; and her manner, noble and serious, bordering on the severe at first sight, made her the beau ideal of a lady abbess. Such is the portrait of this distinguished lady, whom, as an historical personage and in her public capacity it may be allowed to sketch. The conversation I had with her turned on general subjects, as I of course avoided making any allusion to the Queen, or her own very arduous situation, and I obtained the particulars respecting that part from other sources. One subject, however, was not tabooed, that of the "noche triste" as it may well be called, when the Queen was attacked in the palace."—Captain Widdrington.

HOMAGE TO ANIMALS.—At last the day arrived on which the beasts of draught and burden were to receive a benediction from the hand of a priest at the door of St Anthony's church. The sun shone brightly, and the scene was truly exhilarating. Every horse, and mule and ass, was decked out in splendid colours, and in trappings corresponding with the means of their owners whose faces bespoke the joy of their hearts, and whose orderly conduct at once proved that the religious feeling which had brought them to the place. When the animals had received the benediction, they passed onwards with their masters, to make room for those behind them; and this was the order of the day, until the last blessing upon the last animal brought the exhibition to a close. As this scene of primeval piety was going on, an English gentleman, with whom I had a slight acquaintance, and who was standing by my side, remarked that he was tired with looking at such a scene of superstitious folly. "If it be folly," said I, in answer to his remark, "to give a blessing to an animal in one shape, it is certainly folly to pronounce a benediction upon an animal under another. And still we all do this in England, and in every other Christian country. Where is the well-regulated family which, on sitting down to a leg of boiled mutton and caper sauce, does not beg the blessing of Almighty God upon it, through the mouth of the master of the house, or by the ministry of a clergyman, if present? "Benedicite omnia opera Domini, Domini!" Who ever thinks of putting up a young roasting-pig, trussed in delicious gravy, and hot from the kitchen, without asking a blessing on it?—"Bless us, O Lord, and these thy gifts!" -Waterton's Essays.

FRENCH CHARACTER.—By this time I became aware of a truth which had dawned on me before, that the French common people are but much of that grace of manner which once distinguished them above all other people. More courteous than the Italians they could not be; but, while their manners were more artificial, they were more playful and winning. And thus has changed. I did not remark the alteration so much with regard to myself, as in their mode of speaking to one another. The "Madame" and of Monsieur," with which stable-boys and old beggar-women used to address each other, with the deference of courtiers, has vanished. No trace is to be found of it in France. A shadow faintly exists among Parisian shop keepers, when speaking to their customers: but only there is the traditional phraseology still used; the courtesy, the soft manner, even so changed, exists no longer. I speak of a thing known and acknowledged by the French themselves. They want to be powerful; they believe money must obtain power; they wish to imitate the English, whose influence they attribute to their commercial prosperities: but now and then they go a step beyond, and remind one of Mrs. Trollope's description of the Americans. Their phraseology, once so delicately, and even, in its change, straightforward people, amusingly deferential, (not to superiors only, but toward one another) is become blunt, and almost rude. . . . Perhaps more than any people, as I see them now, the French require the restraint of good manners. They are dreadfully irritable. It is true; but that amour propre is so sensitive, and their tempers so quick, that they are easily betrayed into anger and vehemence. . . . On board these long narrow river-steamers I found the same defects—the air, most agreeable to a traveller, of neatness and cavility, was absent. There is, however, no real fault to be found, and I should not mention this, were it not a change; and I sincerely wish the French would return to what they once were, and give us all lessons of pleasing manners, and polished courtesy. Faults, and additions to faults, and adding them as impress all their own—a sort of fierceness when displeased, which is more startling than our sullenness. As I said, this has no reference to the wounds myself; but the winning ease and manner that had pleased me of old no longer appeared, and it was in the phraseology used among each other that the change was most remarkable.—Mrs. Shelley's "Rambles in Germany and Italy."

AN ADVENTURE.—I had a little adventure on the road from Baccano to Rome not worth relating, but which I deem necessary to be introduced here in order that some of my friends in the latter city, and others in England, may not give me credit for an affair which deserves no credit at all. These good friends that got in into their heads that I had reached Rome after walking barefoot for nearly twenty miles, in order to show my respect and reverence for the sacred capital of the Christian world. Would that my motive had been as pure as represented! The sanctity of the churches, the remains of holy martyrs which enrich them, the relics of canonized saints placed in such profusion thro'ghout them, could well induce a Catholic traveller to adopt this easy and simple mode of showing his religious feeling. But, unfortunately, the idea never entered my mind at the time: I had no other motives than those of easy walking and of self-enjoyment. The affair which caused the talk, took place as follows. We had arrived at Baccano in the evening, and while we were at tea, I proposed to our excellent friend Mr. Fletcher, who had joined us at Cologne, that we should leave the inn at four the next morning on foot for Rome, and secure lodgings for the ladies, who would follow us in the carriage after a nine o'clock breakfast. Having been accustomed to go without shoes a month after month in the rugged forests of Pomania, I took it for granted that I could do the same on the pavement of his Holiness Pope Gregory the Sixteenth, never once reflecting that some fifteen years had elapsed from the time that I could go barefootedly in comfort and impunity over the internal, however, the sequel will show that the soles of my feet had undergone a considerable alteration. We rose at three in the morning after, and having put a shoe and a sock or half-stocking into the pocket of my coat, we left the inn at Baccano for Rome just as the hands of our watches pointed to the hour of four. Mr. Fletcher having been born in North Britain, ran no risk of injuring his feet by an act of imprudence. The sky was cloudless and the morning frosty, and the planet Venus shone upon us as though she had been a little moon. Whether the severity of the frost, which was more than commonly keen, or the hardness of the pavement, or perhaps both conjoined, had deprived my feet of sensibility, I had no means of ascertaining; but this is certain, I went on merrily for several miles without a suspicion of anything being wrong, until we halted to admire more particularly the transcendant splendour of the morning planet, and then I saw blood on the pavement; my right foot was bleeding apace, and on turning the sole uppermost, I perceived a piece of jagged flesh hanging by a string; seeing that there could be no chance of replacing the severed part with success, I twisted it off, and then took a survey of the foot by the light which the stars afforded. Mr. Fletcher, horror-struck at what he saw, proposed immediately that I should sit down by the side of the road, and there wait for the carriage, or take advantage of any vehicle which might come up. Aware that the pain would be excessive so soon as the lacerated parts would become stiff by inaction, I resolved at once to push on to Rome; wherefore, putting one shoe on the sound foot, which, by the way, had two unbroken blisters on it, I forced the wounded one into the other, and off we started for Rome, which we reached after a very uncomfortable walk. The injured foot had two months' confinement to the sofa before the damage was repaired. It was this unfortunate adventure which gave rise to the story of my walking barefooted into Rome, and which gained me a reputation by no means merited on my part.—Waterton's Essays.

ANGLING.

THE CHUB

To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

The chub is a very coarse and bony fish, and, although he affords good sport to the angler, he is in very little estimation for the table. They spawn in April or May, and are best in season from September to April. They may be fished for all the year round. They rise freely at the artificial fly, and are not at all particular in their choice, although I think they prefer the red and black palmers—the red with gold and the black with silver twist. They will grow to the weight of six or seven pounds. A friend of mine once rose one which weighed nearly six pounds with a black tackle-fly, which, after some sport, he succeeded in landing. Great caution is requisite in approaching the water, for, although he is a very greedy fish, he is also very shy, and will seldom take your bait if you are seen.

In fishing for chub during the winter months, the best baits you can offer them is bullock's brains, or the pith of an ox's backbone. Fish with fine tackle, and a No. 8 hook, in deep water, or under any bank where there is a harbour for fish, and you will have sport. Some people recommend this bait to be used without a float; but in my opinion you cannot do better than use a small swan-quill float, and let your bait swim as near the bottom as you possibly can. You should be provided with strong running tackle, as the chub, when first hooked, runs out furiously; but when once turned, he yields easily. He is a leather-mouthed fish, and there is no danger of him breaking his hold when once firmly hooked. In March, April, and May, he is usually taken with the worm, to be fished with in the same manner as described above with brains and pith, and in the spring he will afford capital sport with the artificial fly.

Another excellent bait for chub, to be used during the summer months, is the grub of the wasp, which is to be found in the holes of banks, and by mowers when cutting the grass. They must be baked for a few minutes before using, to harden them, for they are a very tender bait, and require great address in fishing with them. They will take maggots and gentles all the year, which may be thus preserved for winter fishing:—In September put your gentles into a large wooden vessel, and cover them well over with earth, not too dry, and keep them in a rock cellar during the winter; they will be ready for use whenever they are wanted.

During the hot months the best way of taking chub is by dibbing with almost any fly you can procure; the common house-fly will be found an admirable bait, as is also the grasshopper. You may sometimes see under trees or bushes, which hang over the river, from a dozen to twenty-five chub laying basking in the sun, and waiting for the flies which are dropping off the trees. You must have a long rod and a short line, and be very careful how you approach them. Stand behind the tree or bush and drop a No. 8 or 9 hook, baited with a natural fly, a few inches before any of the fish, and you will most likely take him. You should be provided with a landing-net, as you will generally be in an awkward situation for landing fish if you have not the assistance of a landing-net. He is often taken with the minnow when fishing for trout. He feeds upon small fish, and all kinds of flies, grubs, and insects, but is more especially fond of the cockchafer. He will often take (and which is strongly recommended by Walton) a black snail with his belly slit to show the white.

Although I have said at the beginning of this letter that the chub is held in very little estimation for the table, yet Walton differs in opinion, and gives two recipes for cooking them, one of which is as follows:—If he be a large chub, then dress him thus—First, scale him, and then wash him clean, and then take out his guts; and to that end make the hole as little and as near the gills as you may conveniently, and especially make clean his throat from the grass and weeds that are usually in it, for if that he not very clean it will make him to taste very sour. Having so done, put some sweet herbs into his belly, and then tie him to a spit and roast him, basted often with vinegar or rather verjuice, and butter, with good store of salt mixed with it. Being thus dressed you will find him a much better dish of fish than you or most folk, even fishermen themselves, do imagine, for this dries up the fluid, watery humours with which all chubs do abound."

RAILWAY TRAVELLING.—The distance traversed daily by the passenger trains alone, on eight of the principal railways, amounts to 10,508 miles, and the yearly distance to 3,562,338 miles! The lines are the Great Western, London and Birmingham, Grand Junction, Birmingham and Derby, Manchester and Leeds, South Western, and Brighton; and it appears, by the Parliamentary returns, that during the year 1841 the number of passengers conveyed on these lines amounted to 4,600,000; and that during that period the total number of persons injured was 56, of whom 22 were killed.

LINEN TRADE.—IRISH CAMBRICS.—Some very important particulars appear under this head in a Belfast newspaper, respecting the manufacture of Irish cambric handkerchiefs, which now employs 10,000 individuals in the north of Ireland, and has been making great progress during the last ten years, comparatively unknown to the public; for it appears from the statement referred to, that three-fourths of the cambric handkerchiefs at present selling in England under the denomination of French are the produce of Irish looms. The French Government, for the protection of their own manufacture, prohibit the importation of Irish cambrics into France, by imposing a duty of 25f. the kilogramme, or 10s. the pound, which, applied to the average weight of qualities suitable for their demand, constitutes a duty of 150 per cent. From this will appear the capability of still greater extension which this branch of industry in Ireland possesses, when its advantages of fabrication become known to foreign countries, or a more liberal revision of the French tariff takes place.

A LEAF FOR LIFE. One day during the last week a party of gentlemen went on a nesting excursion to the Heughs, near Slains Castle, and approaching "Dunbuy," an insulated precipitous rock, well known as a favourite resort for sea-fowl, one of the boldest of the party, enamoured of its rich treasures, ventured to ascend its rugged and almost perpendicular crags, amid the vetoing cries of its reclaiming occupants, which, "hovering about the enemy," seemingly disposed to enter their dilations, in the shape of sundry pounces on his face and hands; but, heedless of all, the daring intruder clambered up to the alarming height of 80 or 90 feet, when, accidentally taking hold of a piece of louse rock, which gave way with him, he lost his balance, but had the presence of mind to make a sudden leap from the face of the rock, much to the satisfaction of his winged neighbours, who rejoced at his exit. He fell into the water, and, to the great joy and surprise of his friends, escaped unhurt.—Glasgow Courier.

Vauxhall is, we believe, to be again opened this year, after all hope of its walks being again trodden by the feet of beauty and fashion, as a public promenade, had nearly vanished.

Crockford has, it is said, let his house to the committee now managing it till 1846.

A LESSON IN THE ART OF HEROES.—Edge and point are good things in their way. But they are the temptations of the general. Frederick's maxim was, the bullet for the infantry, and the spur for dragoon. The weight of fire is the test of infantry, the rapidity of charge is the true test of cavalry. The business of a general is manœuvring, to menace masses by greater masses, to throw the weight of an army on the flank, to pierce a centre while the flanks were forced to stand and see it beaten: these were Frederick's lessons to his staff.—Memoirs of a Statesman.

DUELLING.—From the year 1700 to 1719 the horrid custom of duelling was at its height in this country. The universal fashion of wearing swords gave opportunity and allowed no time for passion to cool or reason to reflect. It pervaded all ranks and professions; and no precinct, however sanctified be its use, or hallowed by its associations, was sacred. Doctors Mead and Woodward, fought like a pair of butchers, under the gateway of Gresham College. The latter slipped his foot and fell. "Take your life!" exclaimed the former. "Any thing but your physic!" roared the other. Dead bodies were frequently found in the streets, but occasioned no surprise or stir.

FLORICULTURE.

THE HEART'S-EASE.

The Heart's-ease, or Pansy, must be grown in a very rich soil, composed, if in pots or boxes, of four parts of rich loam, one of sand, and one of decayed leaves or rotten dung; and if in the open ground, of rich loam, highly manured. It is propagated by seeds or division of the root. The seeds should be sown as soon as they are ripe, in a bed, where the young plants should remain till they flower, when the best should be taken up, and replanted in another bed, or in well-drained pots or boxes, for flowering. The plants will require constant watering during the hot weather, but are very apt to damp off, unless the soil in which they grow has not been well drained. The best varieties are propagated by cuttings taken off from the points of the shoots in the spring, cutting them clean across immediately below a joint. The cuttings should be stuck in pure white sand, and covered with a bell glass: they must not be watered when put in, and they should be shaded for several days The Pansy is also propagated by layers pegged down at a joint, but not slit, on account of their tendency to damp off.

Observations. Roses budded about this time generally succeed better than at any other time. Pipe pinks, carnations, and piccotees, or lay them, if preferred. Keep dahlias constantly tied up, and thin the strong growing kinds.

THE DEITY.—The astronomer has sought for Him in vain; he has looked for Him in the sun, as he shone forth in his glory; in the moon, as she walked in her brightness; in the stars, as they beamed in their loveliness: but it was only His glance which had kindled their fires. The philosopher has tried to find Him; he has searched the feelings of his bosom; he has listened for Him in the whisperings of conscience, and searched for Him in the store-house of memory, and soared aloft for him in the aspirings of reason; but it was only the voice of His spirit which he heard. The mariner has pounded the deep in quest of Him; he has looked for Him in the calm, but saw only the image of His dwelling-place mirrored in the waters; he has sought him in the storm, but heard only the "breath of His displeasure." The naturalist has searched the mountains, but He was not there; he has looked through the valleys, but his search was vain; he has asked of the animated things around him, which are "fearfully and wonderfully made;" has inquired of the trees, which waved their branches to the music of the winds; of the flowers, which opened their beautiful cups, that the beams of the sun might linger in them; but none could tell. They have seen the impress of His hand—His benevolence, His power—on all around, but not Himself. But the Christian has sought Him in the Word of Truth, and there found His will revealed. Though human eye cannot behold Him, He is ever present to the spirit of those who seek Him. He is "a covert from the tempest," a guide to the haven of rest He has promised. There the greatness and glory of God shall be made known: the inscrutable Deity will be revealed.—Woman's Worth.

THE MARKETS.

CORN-EXCHANGE.—We have had a very moderate show of English wheat at market this week, viz., only 4370 quarters, yet the inquiry for that article has proved rather heavy, at barely previous rates. Barley and malt have commanded a free inquiry; but the demand for oats, beans, peas, and flour, has been dull, at barely stationary prices.

SECOND REPRINT.

A THIRD ATTACK UPON THE QUEEN.

On Saturday last it became known over the metropolis that her Majesty had exercised her perogative of mercy in favour of the traitor Francis, and that his sentence of death was commuted to transportation for life in the most penal of our convict settlements.

On the morning of Sunday, as the Queen proceeded to the Chapel Royal, another attempt was made upon her life!

We do not take these two facts as cause and consequence; we do not—like some of our contempories—rush to the conclusion that the crime of the last miscreant was the result of misplaced clemency to the first; nor do we, therefore, argue that if Francis had been executed, his new imitator would have been dismayed out of his morbid villany, or have abandoned his guilty purpose of attaining notoriety at the expence of his Sovereign's life or peace of mind.

We readily concede that Francis abundantly deserved hanging—that the death of a dog would have been too good for him—but we should never advocate the system of death-punishment merely because the criminal had committed the highest degree of crime. We believe such punishment to be adverse alike to the dictates of humanity and the law of God. We hope to see it abolished, and are convinced that it was never advocated by any human wisdom, except upon the high ground of example, a ground long since become untenable with the progress of civilization, and by the effect of unerring experience. But upon the subject that is now prominently before us, we wish to fling away the speculations of philosophy, and turn from the larger theory to the palpable reasoning that is before us. The matter seems to lie in a nutshell.

Three consecutive blackguards attempt the life of one of the best Sovereigns that ever swayed the English realm. They have no personal hatred to her—they have no political feelings—they are no members of plots or conspiracies—but they are hopeless, morbid, miserable, crime-goaded fools. They spring from the lower ranks of society; and come what will of their doings, they can never become heroes or victims, although they are ambitious to be both.

The first of the three who conceives the design of his distinction, hits upon a regicidal project which he thinks will tell. He is taken in the act of fulfilling it, and the voice of the empire cries out that he is mad! He pleads ditto to the universal suggestion; and the houseless, labourless, reckless ragamuffin gets comfort and attendance in Bedlam, and a provision for his natural life.

That affair settled, a gloomy and improvident outcast, of the name of Francis, shakes his rags in the wind, and mutters a tu quoque to his disordered imagination. "You too" he says to himself "shall send your poverty to look after your honesty and your industry. You too, shall create a sensation by committing, or appearing to commit, a henious crime—you shall be caught at it—made notorious for it—tried for it and condemned for it"—to what?—a participation in the pleasant destinies of Oxford, and that prison competency which only wanton and brutal idleness could enjoy.

Francis was both wanton and brutal, but he overshot his mark. The public became alarmed—the popular devotion to the Sovereign rose to its height, and overflowed the national mind with conflicting emotions of fear, affection, anger, and disgust. A hacknied defence in this case would not do—there was no plea of insanity to put upon the record; and the legal question of "loaded or unloaded," with application to his weapon, was all the evasion that a jury could entertain. It failed the criminal, and he was sentenced to be hanged. Nobody would have pitied him if the law had taken its course. Many would have thought it justice, and we are of that number, if we did not distinctly repudiate the idea of any human justice being consonant at any time with the punishment of death. But the Queen's natural repugnance to the idea of shedding blood on any account, we know, but still more upon her own—her womanly feeling—her natural genorosity—her reliance, too, upon the faith, honour, and love of her people, prompted her to borrow from the Divine attribute, and spare the forfeit life of the wretch who was convicted of compassing her own death. State policy awarded him, however, the second-heaviest punishment of the law—the passing of a life under ground and in chains; labouring with the toil and in the company of the most degraded convicts, and expiating his wickedness in endless misery and shame. This punishment, in the sight of any civilized creature is worse than death; and yet it is within the fair province of human retribution; but dreadful as its contemplation becomes, its practice is removed from us, and therefore its example does not tell. Neither has the example of actual death told latterly, nor proved efficacious in terrifying hardened atrocity out of the commission of its sin. The morbid spirit which one horrid murder feeds has only seemed to have engendered another, and the frequency of crime has been in proportion to its notoriety.

But supposing either Bedlam, transportation, or death, to have resulted from the regicide experiments of Oxford or Francis, we still question their efficacy, in the way of example, to have quelled the kind of spirit which actuated the new culprit, Bean, to throw his miserable abortion of a body upon his Sovereign's path, and seek the wanton assassination of a young and gentle woman, at the moment when she was trustingly and unconsiously wending towards the house of God. Nor do we, in truth, believe that the wretched lad had devised more than the semblance of such an aim. The public prints are contradictory—upon the question of the contents of the pistol—some claiming for them tobacco-pipe with powder, others powder alone. We are willing for the credit of our kind to cling to the latter belief, and to think as we hope, that a morbid craving for celebrity, a mad determination to make desperate change in a bad and hopeless destiny, for good or ill, were the true incentives to the otherwise unaccountable treason. To be a hero, a lunatic, a devil, a victim, or a commisserated scamp, were consummations equally, perhaps—though no matter at what cost of crime or character—within the ambition of Oxford, Francis, and Bean.

Then, it is clear, we must not elevate this style of criminal action into any undue importance in the abstract. Let us not measure it so much by the value of the sacred life at stake, or the love which we all bear unto the virtuous and kind Victoria, as by the moral standard of the creatures who have sought its perpetration. And to meet this standard of brute wretchedness, it seems to us that some of the more degrading and palpable punishments of a former period might be wholesomely revived. We would put these miserable culprits into the pillory, and see them pelted, without a single groan of mock sympathy, or murmur of outraged feeling. We would have them sentenced to the ordeal of the public scourge,

> And put in every honest hand a whip
> To lash the rascals naked thro' the world.

We would give them just the sort of notoriety that they would not envy, and just the order of matyrdom which they did not want. They should have popular execration, but not the crimson execration of blood; they should have nothing in their destiny to stir the imagination of the romantic, the idle, the dissolute, or the dull; but they should be so shamed, so beaten, so reviled, so degraded, and so broken of spirit and pride, that all their life of after-imprisonment should not bring the blood of manhood back into their veins, and that the terrors of the example of their punishment should more than a hundred madhouses, or transportations, or executions, annihilate the chances of an imitation of the example of their crime.

CHINESE ARTILLERYMEN AND GUN.

The above cut represents Chinese artillerymen practising at the gun. This species of warfare appears greatly to have attracted the attention of the Chinese, who begin to know its value, nor is its importance likely to be diminished in their estimation by the late affair at Ningpo, the particulars of which, with all the eastern news by the last overland mail, will be found in our fourth and fifth pages. There is certainly nothing very terrifying in the appearance of the warriors before us, nor in the implement of destruction under inspection, the use of which they seem to ponder on with such a sapient air. In truth, charged or uncharged, a Chinese gun appears more dangerous or, at least, more fatiguing to friends than enemies, and, if even captured, would hardly require the trouble of spiking. Should the present state of things continue, however, for some time longer, the Chinese are likely to become much greater adepts in the arts of war than they have shown themselves heretofore. They are receiving most expensive lessons, in the meantime, from the barbarians sent out to teach them "how to shoot," and will apparently have little call for gunnery by the time they have attained a perfect knowledge of its mysteries.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE, Monday.—The electoral struggle is the all-sorbing topic in the Paris papers of Sunday, but the details are purely of local interest.

M. Thiers has competely lost caste in the country. He has not gone, as was reported, to take the waters at Vechy. He has left Paris for Aix, where his re-election is seriously menaced by a coalition of the Royalists and Ministerialists. It has been considered strange that Thiers has published no manifesto; but it is now thought he must take the course he wished to avoid—speak out at Aix.

M. Odillon Barrot presents himself in some half dozen colleges, including one in Paris, in opposition to General Jacqueminot. The Left party, to which he belongs, and the Left Centre of M. Thiers, will suffer much during the elections, but the Extreme Left (Republicans and Philosophical Radicals) and the Extreme Right (Royalists) are expected to gain.

All the Ministers will be re-elected. M. Guizot has a sham opposition in the use of M. Berrver's name at Lisieux.

Many persons think that M. Thiers's leadership will be superseded by that of M. Billault, his former Aide-de-Camp, who has lately gained ground in the Liberal camp.

M. de Lamartine does not interfere in the elections.

The English at present residing at Paris and its vicinity were startled on Monday night by reading in the Ministerial evening organ, the Messager, the annexed article—"They write from London, July 3: 'It is announced that a new attempt on the life of the Queen has just taken place. The pistol did not go off. The assassin is said to have been disarmed, but to have succeeded in making his escape.'"

One of our letters describes the sensation produced in the French capital as beggaring all description. Nothing could exceed the indignation of all classes, and universal regret was expressed that Lynch Law had not attended the atrocious perpetrator of this fresh outrage.

The Messager in its very next article announced to the French public the clemency of her Majesty in sparing the life of the miscreant Francis.

The French press is honourably unanimous in its deprecation of this fresh atrocity, and the Republican National even thus strongly expresses itself:—"The Government has received from London the intelligence that on the 3d instant an Englishman again attempted to fire a pistol at Queen Victoria. He was perceived in time and disarmed; but he succeeded in escaping. No other detail has been given respecting this matter, of which the English journals could not as yet have given us any intelligence. We shall to-morrow have more complete information. What adds to the unexpectedness, and, we may add, the incredible enormity of this attempt is, that it took place on the very day that the entire press announced that the Queen had commuted into transportation for life the punishment of death to which Francis had been sentenced. The savage and impotent monomania, which has emigrated from France to England, is one of the gravest symptoms of the profound disorders which agitate modern societies."

SPAIN, Madrid, July 26.—The Constitutional question of the Congress during the last two sessions was the settlement of the force of the standing army of the country. The committee proposed ninety thousand men; but there are some of the deputies, who, from motives of economy, or of party, think this number too great, and would reduce it to sixty thousand. Besides this subject of business, there was, as is usually the case in the Spanish Congress, another for the amusement of the Chamber, it being the usage of the assembly to divide their time between wrangling and matters of a more serious nature. This secondary topic was a request made by M. Sanchez de la Fuente to the President of the Council of Ministers to publish a list of the appointments and special favours conferred by the late administration during the last days of holding office; in a word, the "last will and testament" of the Gonzalez Cabinet, which has not escaped, any more than any of its predecessors, the scandal of having been too generous to its friends in its last moments. This being Sunday, there is little news from the provinces. The sons of the Infante Don Francisco are reported as having arrived at Corunna on their way to Madrid. A manufactory of forged Spanish Bonds was detected in the street of Atocha here yesterday, and the parties concerned committed to prison by the political chief Senor Escalanta.

Telegraphic despatches from Bayonne of the 2d inst. bring advices from Madrid of the 27th ult., on which day the Spanish Ministry had withdrawn the project of law relative to the provincial deputations. A second dispatch, of the 28th, announces that the Congress had voted the Bill fixing the effective of the army at 130,000 (90,000 effective and 40,000 reserve) by a majority of 60 against 22.

Our ordinary accounts from Madrid are only of the 26th. The Ministry was then very active in taking precautions to maintain public order.

The Dukes of Cadiz and Seville, sons of the Infante Don Francisco de Paulo, had arrived, it was stated, at Corunna; but this turned out to be a mistake, as they were not expected to arrive before the 4th or 5th instant. The Infanta Donna Louisa Fernanda being indisposed, prevented her Royal parents from attending the Regent's soirée on the 26th.

Senor Mendizabel has offered to contract for the building of six ships of war in the port of Passages.

Count Peracamps (General Van Halen) is to remain as Captain General of Catalonia; but Zurbano is to advance forty millions of reals at twelve per cent., will be accepted by the Government.

Two editors were going to fight a duel.

PORTUGAL.—LISBON, June 27.—The treaty, of which so much has been said, and which has been the cause of so much speculative argument, is not yet signed, and when concluded, I fear it will be a great cry and little wool, consequently a source of great disappointment to many. It appears that one of its principal virtues is to withdraw every remaining privilege from the British residents in this country, and that in regard to the contemplated reduction of the Custom-house tariff, this is to become the subject of an entirely separate convention.

BRUSSELS, June 30.—There seems to be every reason to believe that within a year from this time the Belgian iron railway will be joined to that of Rhenish Prussia. This junction is expected with the utmost impatience by the merchants and manufacturers of both countries; for it may be said with truth that we shall be able fully to appreciate the advantages which will necessarily result from the completion of this railway, extending from Antwerp to the heart of the states of the Customs Union.

THE HAGUE, June 30.—The Second Chamber of the States-General, in its sitting to-day, adopted by a majority of 49 to 3, the project of law confirming the contracts made with the Commercial Company. A message from his Excellency the Minister of the Interior was received announcing that the project of law for making an iron railway from Maestricht to the Prussian frontier was withdrawn. A conference has lately taken place between a person high in office, well acquainted with the subject, and some philanthr pic individuals respecting the important concerns of the colony of Surinam, on which occasion an explanation was given to the latter, showing the danger of taking precipitate and insufficiently-considered measures.

The Malta Times of the 25th ult. publishes advices from Tripoli of the 20th, announcing that the famous Sheikh of Fezzan, Abd-el-Gelil, and his brother, Seif-el-Nassar, had been betrayed by some of his most trusty officers into the hands of Askar Pasha, and decapitated by his orders. Their heads, after being paraded through the streets of Tripoli, and particularly in front of the British consulate, were pickled and packed up to be forwarded to Constantinople. The three children of Seif-el Nasser, and a son of Abdl-el-Gelil, 14 years of age, having fallen into the hands of the Pasha had been likewise beheaded, notwithstanding the interference on their behalf of Colonel Warrington and the commander of the Locust steamer. All those who made peace with the Turkish governor, and surrendered themselves prisoners, experienced the same fate. The remainder of the insurgents, 400 strong, fell back on Soekna to join Sheik Sady, Abd-el-Gelil's general, which, added to the garrison, of Soekna and Mourzouk, will make a considerable force.

DREADFUL FIRE.—ST. PETERSBURGH, June 23rd.—On the 21st inst., a dreadful fire destroyed the old salt-works of Novo Usolsky, in the government of Perm, the property of the Stroganoff family. The conflagration spread to the extent of 2½ versts, and lasted three days. Besides the salt-works, with the immense provisions of all kinds of fuel made for them, from 5000 to 6000 inhabited houses connected with the manufactory, a large church, and numerous products of nature, have become the prey of the flames.—Prussian State Gazette.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

The Royal Assent was given to-day, by Commission, to the Justices Jurisdiction (No. 2) Bill, the Copyright Bill, the Public-houses Regulation Bill, the Municipal Corporations (Ireland) Amendment Bill, and the North American Colonial Assembly Regulation Bill.

The Duke of LEINSTER and Earl of MOUNTCASHEL presented petitions from the Mutual Assurance Society, praying to be exempted from the supervision of the Poor Law Commissioners.—Lord RADNOR moved for certain returns relative to the importation of corn.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, FRIDAY.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL moved, and Lord JOHN RUSSELL concurred, that the Bribery Bill should be referred to a select committee.

The house having resolved itself into a committee of supply, Mr WALLACE brought forward his resolutions relative to the depression of trade, and the distress which prevailed among the labouring classes. The hon member gave, at great length, details—unfortunately too well known—of the wretched state of the districts in our manufacturing districts; and drew almost utter hopelessness at present, of any amelioration.—Sir J. GRAHAM opposed the resolutions; and Mr. ALEXANDER spoke of "the misery of the Ministers; and said "there was a deeper and greater evil, a danger that the distress of the country should meet with nothing but apathy in the Government."—Lord J. RUSSELL thought the resolutions would be unwise if passed.—Sir R. PEEL greatly regretted the distress and said it was not in the power of Parliament to remedy it.—The debate was adjourned to Monday.

Several bills were forwarded a stage. The Mines and Collieries Bill was read a third time, after several unsuccessful divisions, in order to obtain an adjournment of the question. A bill to amend the 3d and 4th Victoria, c. 91, for regulating railroads, was read a second time, and passed. A bill to amend the Insolvent Debtors Act was read a third time, and passed.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The Earl of SHAFTESBURY presided in the absence of the Lord Chancellor.

Lord BROUGHAM presented a petition from a Baptist Association in Ireland, revealing the cleven congregators in Ireland, against Regium donum, and all similar grants

ATTEMPT TO ASSASSINATE HER MAJESTY.

The Duke of RICHMOND wished to ask his noble friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, whether the reports that had been circulated were true or not, that a hearing had been made on her Majesty's life. He could assure his noble friend that he did not ask it question out of mere curiosity, and he hoped of him not to give an answer if there was any objection to it, but he thought the House must feel that they ought not to be entirely satisfied whether there was any truth in these reports.—The Earl of ABERDEEN in answer to the question of his noble friend, could only say that he entirely sympathised in the feeling which his noble friend had evinced, and which he was sure was felt universally by the House and throughout the country. He had to state that the individual referred to had been arrested, but as he was still under examination, he thought it would be premature for him to express any opinion, or to make any statement on the subject at present.

INCOME-TAX ON THE FUNDS.

Lord BROUGHAM wished to put a question to the noble earl, the President of the Board of Trade, respecting a matter which had given rise alarm in the city, particularly among persons connected with the funds. It was understood that the income-tax was to be levied on the July dividends, so as to extend back to January instead of April, when it came into operation. It seemed to him that it could be properly levied only upon a moiety of these dividends.—The Earl of RIPON would make inquiry on the subject, and give an answer next day

The house adjourned at half-past five

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

The Speaker took the chair at the usual hour but there being only twenty three members present, the house stood adjourned until Tuesday.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The Earl of RIPON moved the second reading of the Customs' Duties (Tariff) Bill. The necessity of such a measure he considered to have been admitted by the frequent agitation of the question since the conclusion of the war; and the principle upon which the revision should proceed—that of a more free and open trade had been as generally asserted. One object of the present measure in which almost all interests agreed, was the removal of all positive prohibition: but he thought that, though the scale of protection now proposed was lower than that suggested by Mr. Huskisson, it was still abundantly sufficient. He regretted that the state of the revenue did not admit of the reduction of the duties upon wool and cotton wool, and deprecated the continuance of the high duty on manufactured silk, on the ground that it would be incumbent to make reductions upon articles which were the subject of the recently unratified commercial treaty with France. After passing briefly over several items of minor importance, the noble earl then came to the question of allowing foreign cattle at a reduced duty a measure which, he contended, was rendered necessary by an increasing population, but from which the agricultural interest has little ground for apprehension, as the scarcity of cattle in foreign countries, and the increase of value consequent upon the opening of a new market, would prevent an excessive importation at low prices. He defended the expediency of commencing such a change as the present by a reduction on the duties on a great mass of articles, rather than upon one or two only of first-rate importance; and concluded by expressing his conviction that the consumer would be benefited, and the prosperity of our commerce promoted by this bill, without a serious injury to any interest.

Lord STANHOPE, in moving, as an amendment, that the bill be read a second time that day six months, went into a variety of details respecting the cost of the growth and fattening of cattle in different countries, to prove the inexpediency of admitting them at the proposed rate of duty. He entertained at the same time that the arguments by which the measure was supported neutralized each other, one class of evidence being intended to show that the price of food would be greatly reduced, while on the other hand it was confidently asserted that there would be no reduction at all. The noble lord then proceeded to discuss separately the effect of the alteration upon a number of articles, with the view of proving that while the admission of foreign products at a reduced duty would not materially lower the prices of those things in which the poor were chiefly interested, great distress would be caused among the industrious classes, with whom the foreigner was unfairly put in competition. He was opposed to the principle of free trade; he was convinced that the measure was regarded with apathy by all, except those who expected from it general disorganization, and a new distribution of political power; and he implored their lordships not by thus aggravating the present great distress, to bring about such a consummation.

The Duke of RICHMOND opposed the bill, on the ground that the admission of foreign cattle would bring the comparatively untaxed farmer of the Continent into an advantageous competition with the highly-taxed English agriculturist.

The Marquis of CLANRICARDE would give the measure his hearty support as an important advance towards free trade.—Lord MOUNTCASHEL opposed the measure as injurious in its probable operation both to the colonies and the home producer.

Lord MONTAGLE, in expressing a modified approbation, took occasion to vindicate his own financial policy, and Lord RIPON having briefly replied, their lordships divided, when there appeared for the second reading of the bill—

The bill having been read a second time, their lordships at 1 o'clock turned at a quarter-past 10 o'clock to Thursday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS TUESDAY.

Sir H HARDINGE stated, in answer to a question from Lord Worsley, that as soon as the Commander-in-Chief had been informed of the rumour imputing to Colonel H. Dundas that he had used expressions disrespectful to her Majesty, he had required him to forward whatever explanation it was in his power to offer. Colonel Dundas had, however failed in even putting himself from the grave offence laid to his charge, and had, in consequence, with the approval of her Majesty, and the full concurrence of General the Right Honourable Sir H. Hardinge, been placed at the disposal of the Queen, and removed from the command of his regiment.

The debate on Mr. Wallace's motion, and the business of supply, as well as the committee on the Poor Law Amendment Act, were postponed.

The order of the day having been read for the last stage of the Dean Forest Ecclesiastical Districts Bill, Mr. HUME, on the motion for the Speaker leaving the chair, proposed a series of resolutions, adverse to any grant from the revenue of the Crown lands for the endowments of clergy, or the maintenance of the fabric of churches.

Lord LINCOLN briefly opposed the resolutions, insisting upon the great increase of population in that district, while the revenue derived thereout had risen from £800 a year, to £6000.

Mr. WILLIAMS expressed his fixed hostility to the principle of public grants for ecclesiastical purposes

A division took place, upon which the numbers were—

For the resolutions	....	177
For Mr Hume's resolutions	....	44
Majority	....	133

The house then proceeded with the Mines and Collieries Bill, which, after some observations from several observations resulting, however, in no specific motion, was passed.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—WEDNESDAY.

The house did not sit

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The National Flotilla Bookkeeping Bill was read a third time and passed, the opposition to it, led by Sir C. Douglas, and the marquis of Douro, having been overpowered by a majority of 33 to 20

The clauses proposed by Mr BLACKSTONE to the Sudbury Disfranchisement Bill, for the purpose of extending the franchise to the adjacent hundreds, were negatived by 134 to 55. The bill was read a third time and passed.

Mr HENDRICK withdrew his motion for the assistance of Mr. Cochrane before the Bridport committee, and Mr. Cochrane immediately declared that having examined the precedents that bore on the case, he would attend the committee next day.

On the motion of Mr. SHAW, the Right of Voting (Dublin University) Bill was read a third time and passed

Sir J. GRAHAM fixed the POOR LAW Amendment Bill for Friday

The order of the day on Mr. Wallace's motion was then read for the resumption of the adjourned debate—Mr. Williams, Mr. Aldam, Sir B. Hall, and Mr. Brotherton severally supported the motion by speeches in favour of a free trade in corn.—Mr. JAMES was of opinion that the measure would not do any good.—Mr G. PALMER ascribed the distress to the vicious system of our manufactures, and insisted that it would be increased by any measures calculated to injure the home trade.—Mr C. NAPIER ascribed the distress to a variety of concurrent causes, but supported the admission of foreign corn at a low rate of duty.—Captain Layard, Mr. Scholefield, and Mr. Shurman Crawford, severally bore testimony to the distress of their constituents.—Viscount PALMERSTON could not vote for the motion, deeply as he lamented the distress. Lord STANLEY replied to the noble viscount, and refused to despond of the resources of the country.—At the conclusion of the noble lord's speech, Mr O'CONNELL moved the adjournment of the debate.—After some discussion, in which Sir ROBERT PEEL deprecated the course, the debate was adjourned to Thursday, notwithstanding that the house had decided against the proceeding by a majority of 173 to 84.

Lord STANLEY moved the report upon the South Australia (Government and Revenues) resolutions.—Mr. HUME opposed the receiving of the report.

For the report	....	50
Against it	....	9
Majority	....	41

The report was then brought up, and leave given to bring in a bill founded on these resolutions.

The house then adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

The Sudbury Disfranchisement Bill, and the Mines and Collieries Bill were read a third time; and the Liverpool Improvement and Police Bill was read a third time and passed.

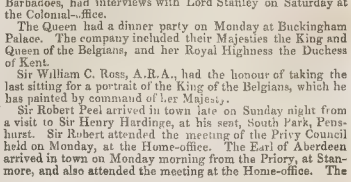
The house resolved itself into committee on the Customs' Duties Bill.—Earl STRADBROKE addressed their lordships in opposition to the measure, and on rousing them to pause before they gave their assent to a bill, the inevitable effect of which would be to throw out of employ innumerable multitudes of our fellow creatures.—The Earl of RADNOR could not think that the bill did not go far enough.—After two or three divisions, the other clauses in the schedule were agreed to; and the bill was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow. Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

Mr CORBALLY took the oath and took his seat for the county of Meath.

Mr. HUME moved for a select committee to inquire into the manner in which the money of the public deposited in the savings' bank had been appropriated to Government, and into the increase in the national debt.—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER opposed the motion. The house divided—for the motion, 94; against it 173; majority, 139.—Sir R. INGLIS moved that parties implicated or accused should be present at the proceedings of the election committees and bribery committees.—Sir R PEEL and other members opposed the motion, which was refused by a majority of [illegible]

Mr. BAINES in rising to move forward his motion for affirming the expediency of vesting in her Majesty, with the advice of the Privy Council, a power of regulating or discontinuing the duty on foreign corn, should circumstances so require during the recess of Parliament.—The motion was opposed by Mr. Gladstone, Sir R. Peel, Lord Worsley, Lord J Russell, &c. &c. For the motion, 113; against it, 175; majority, 62. Mr. HUME moved for returns showing in detail the services of flag officers of the navy.—The motion was opposed as inconvenient to the public service. Leave was given to bring in two bills, one for the establishment of savings' banks in the army, and the other to pay the out-pensioners of Chelsea Hospital monthly, instead of quarterly, as at present.—Adjourned



THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

The Queen and Prince Albert, the King of the Belgians, and the Duchess of Kent, attended divine service on Sunday morning in the Chapel Royal, St. James's.

Archdeacon Davis, of Antigua, and Archdeacon Parry, of Barbadoes, had interviews with Lord Stanley on Saturday at the Colonial-office.

The Queen had a dinner party on Monday at Buckingham Palace. The company included their Majesties the King and Queen of the Belgians, and her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent.

Sir William C. Ross, A.R.A., had the honour of taking the last sittings for a portrait of the King of the Belgians, which he has painted by command of her Majesty.

Sir Robert Peel arrived in town late on Sunday night from a visit to Sir Henry Hardinge, at his seat, South Park, Penshurst. Sir Robert attended the meeting of the Privy Council held on Monday, at the Home-office. The Earl of Aberdeen arrived in town on Monday morning from the Priory, at Stanmore, and also attended the meeting at the Home-office. The Earl of Ripon, Lord Stanley, Earl of Haddington, Lord Fitzgerald, and other members of the Cabinet were present; and the Earl of Jersey and other principal officers of the royal household also attended. Sir Henry Hardinge arrived in town on Monday, and joined the other members of the Privy Council at the Home-office at two o'clock. The Attorney-General was in attendance. Before the examination Sir Robert Peel went to Buckingham Palace; and soon after four o'clock, when the meeting broke up, the right honourable baronet again went to Buckingham Palace.

The Queen and Prince Albert walked on Tuesday in the royal gardens.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent dined with her Majesty and Prince Albert.

The band of the Royal Regiment of Horse Guards was in attendance at Buckingham Palace during dinner.

Departure of the King and Queen of the Belgians.—Their Majesties the King and Queen of the Belgians, attended by the Countess of Merode, Baron de Dieskau, and M. de Moerkerke, left Buckingham Palace at seven o'clock on Tuesday morning, for Woolwich, to embark in a steam-packet for Ostend. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent had previously arrived at Buckingham Palace from her residence, Clarence-house, to take leave of her august relatives. Viscount Hawarden, Lord in Waiting on the Queen, Captain Francis Seymour, Groom in Waiting on Prince Albert, and M. Van de Weyer, the Belgian Minister, attended their Majesties to the place of embarkation. Three of the royal carriages and four conveyed their Majesties and suite to Woolwich.

Woolwich, Tuesday, July 5.—At a quarter before seven o'clock this morning, a field battery of the Royal Artillery, consisting of four light 6-pounder guns, with the usual number of men accompanying them, under the command of Captain Bent, marched into the Dockyard, to fire a royal salute; and in a few minutes afterwards, the grenadier company of the 73rd regiment, under the command of Captain Pinckney, and accompanied by the fine band of the regiment, arrived, to form a guard of honour to the King and Queen of the Belgians, on their Majesties embarkation in the Ariel steam-vessel, Master Luke Smithett, commander, for a passage to Ostend. Two of their Majesties' royal carriages and two travelling carriages had previously arrived from Buckingham Palace, and were at once put on board the Ariel steam-vessel.

The King and Queen of the Belgians arrived at Woolwich a few minutes past eight o'clock. On the carriage containing their Majesties entering the Dockyard, the Belgian royal standard was hoisted on the flag-staff, and a royal salute fired, to announce their arrival. On passing the guard of honour, his Majesty went up to Captain Pinckney, and addressed him apparently in the most flattering manner; and on their Majesties entering the vessel, the Belgian standard was hoisted at the mast-head, the band of the 73rd Regiment playing the National Anthem during the whole time the embarkation occupied, and until the departure of the Ariel steam-vessel down the river.

The Queen and Prince Albert took an airing on Wednesday afternoon in an open carriage and four, the Hon. Colonel Grey and Colonel Bouverie (the Equerries in Waiting on her Majesty and the Prince) attending on horseback.

The Royal dinner party at Buckingham Palace, same evening included his Excellency Ali Effendi, his Excellency General Sancho, the Duchess of Buccleuch, the Earl of Liverpool, and the Earl of Aberdeen. The band of the Royal Regiment of Horse Guards was in attendance at the palace during dinner.

The Lord Chancellor, Sir Robert Peel, the Duke of Wellington, Lord Wharncliffe, the Earl of Ripon, Lord Stanley, Sir J. Graham, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and other Cabinet Ministers, attended the investigation at the Home-office on Wednesday. After the examination Sir R. Peel went to Buckingham Palace.

Royal Marriage.—The Leipsic Gazette contains a letter from Palermo, stating that the King and Queen were to remain there for the fête of Sainte Rosalie, and afterwards repair to Messina for the festival of Our Lady of the Letter. The marriage of the Princess Royal with the Emperor of Brazil is to take place, says the letter, on the return of their Majesties to Naples, and immediately after the illustrious bride is to embark for Rio Janeiro. A great part of the Neapolitan fleet is to serve as escort to her Royal Highness.

By the last letters received at Holderness-house from Lord Castlereagh, his lordship was travelling in the Holy Land, and did not talk of returning home until the autumn. His lordship has made the tour of nearly all the places of any note in the east of Europe.

On Tuesday evening a brilliant ball and supper were given by Lady Catherine Cavendish to Prince George of Cambridge, the Ministers from Austria, Prussia, Bavaria, Saxony, Denmark, Holland, and Belgium.

The commissioners of taxes for the City of London met on Tuesday, to choose seven commissioners for the income-tax out of their body for the city of London, and the result of the ballot was as follows:—Mr. R. L. Jones, Mr. R. Carter, Mr. J. Puckett, Mr. J. Musgrove, Mr. D. Allan, Mr. W. A. Peacock, Alderman Wilson. And for the following supernumeraries, Mr. E. Eagleton, Mr. Greenaway, Mr. John Evans, Mr. Jeremiah Evans, Mr. Butterworth, Mr. J. Hunt, Mr. E. S. Hall. To these are to be added two commissioners for the Bank, two for the East India Company, two for the London Docks, two for the Corporation of London, one for the South Sea Company, one for the Royal Exchange, and one for the Sun Assurance Company, making in all eighteen commissioners for London.

The Execution of Cooper.—On Monday morning Cooper, the murderer of Daley, the policeman, was executed in the Old Bailey. The multitude assembled was not so great as that at the execution of Good. Several men and women were in a state of intoxication, and evidently attended to enjoy the horrible exhibition. He was greatly subdued in spirit when the executioner entered his cell and began to pinion him, and he trembled excessively as he walked along the passages to the place of execution. He uttered not a word after he was placed in the hands of the hangman, but walked slowly, supported by that functionary and an assistant, to the platform, upon ascending which he was saluted with yells and groans. He died without much apparent suffering.

Poulterers' and Fishmongers' Society.—The seventh anniversary festival of this Society was held on Tuesday evening at Lovegrove's West India Dock Tavern, Blackwall, under the able presidence of Mr. Wolverly Attwood. This excellent Society was established in 1835, for providing an asylum and relief for aged and infirm fishmongers and poulterers, their wives or widows, and also occasional relief to their necessitous orphans. On the removal of the cloth a number of toasts were given. The Secretary read the report, by which it appeared that the trustees of the Society had invested £2550 in Three per Cent. Consols. In the course of the evening Mr. Attwood made an eloquent appeal to the charitable feelings of the company, and sat down amidst loud applause, which was prolonged for several minutes. Shortly after, the chairman, who had so well fulfilled his duties, vacated his seat, but several members of the Society remained until a late hour.

Steam-boat Competition.—The competition among the Gravesend steamers has resulted in the reduction of the fare to 9d., by some of the boats, and on Sunday they were crowded to excess with company. We understand that 15,000 persons landed at the Rosherville, Town, and Terrace Piers. About the same number landed at Woolwich on the same day, and 30,000 persons, exclusive of those taken down by railway, landed at the Waterman's Floating Pier, and the "solid piers," on Sunday. The trade above bridge was also immense, and all the steamers were over crowded with passengers. The Waterman's steamers, seven in number, alone conveyed 50,000 individuals to and from various places between the Adelphi Pier and Woolwich on Sunday.

American Independence.—Monday being the anniversary of American independence, the New York packets in the St. Katharine's Dock displayed a profusion of flags. The American ensign, with the pennant above it, was hoisted at the main skysail mast-head, the English ensign at the fore skysail mast-head, and the American jack at the bowsprit end, and several private colours waved at the mizen skysail mast-head. The display attracted considerable notice.

The late Sir William Alexander.—The mortal remains of Sir William Alexander, formerly Chief Baron of the Exchequer, and who died at 3, Grosvenor-square, on Wednesday, were shipped on board a steamship, for Leith, preparatory to interment in the family mausoleum at Airdrie on Saturday.

Reprieve of Francis the Convict.—Shortly before two o'clock on Saturday afternoon a messenger was sent down from the Home Office to her Majesty's gaol of Newgate, with a reprieve for the convict John Francis, who lay under sentence of death for his recent treasonable attempt upon the life of our beloved Queen. Through the clemency of her Majesty, whose benevolent wishes were consulted by the Privy Council, by whom the fate of the wretched man was decided on Friday, his life has been spared, and his sentence is now commuted to transportation for life to the most penal settlement of Tasmania. The prisoner received the tidings of mercy in a manner which became his situation. He had become very anxious and desponding as the day fixed for the execution of himself and Cooper arrived.

Removal of Francis. On Wednesday morning, at half-past seven o'clock, the above convict was removed from Newgate, in the custody of Newman, one of the chief turnkeys of the prison. He was conveyed in a hackney chariot to the South Western Railway-station, and thence to Gosport, and immediately placed on board the York transport ship, bound for the Australian colonies. The wretched man was allowed to take leave of his parents on Monday, when the scene was most distressing. The general opinion is, that he will not long survive the hardships consequent on the fulfilment of the righteous sentence he so justly deserved.

ANOTHER ATTACK ON THE QUEEN.

On Sunday last the metropolis was thrown into general agitation and alarm, by the rumour that her Majesty had been again the object of a malignant, brutal, and treasonable attack from the hand of an intended assassin. We lament to say that the rumour was not wholly unfounded. It appeared that a hunchbacked little miscreant pointed a pistol at the Queen, as her Majesty was proceeding in her carriage from Buckingham Palace to the Chapel Royal, about 12 o'clock, or a few minutes earlier. The pistol was not fired, neither did the circumstance of its having been levelled attract the Queen's attention, or that of any person of her suite, a fortunate accident, since it permitted her Majesty to repair to the chapel in pursuance of her intention, without experiencing at the moment any of that horror or dismay which, in connexion with the painful memory of recent atrocities of a similar nature, it could not have failed to produce in the Royal mind. The traitor was seized by a spectator, and the pistol taken from him, but from the unpardonable apathy or stupidity of the police constables, who were desired to take him into custody, he was permitted to escape. He was, however, subsequently apprehended, and taken before the Privy Council, who were hastily summoned for the occasion. After hearing the witnesses, who identified the prisoner, and brought home the charge to him, the Council adjourned until Monday, and the prisoner was sent to Tothill fields Prison for the night. From the evidence given, it appeared that there was nothing in the pistol but a small quantity of powder, a little paper wadding, and a piece of clay tobacco pipe. The police appeared to have acted in the most bungling manner throughout the whole affair, having in the first instance let the real delinquent escape, and afterwards apprehended several persons who were really innocent, merely because they were hunch-backed.

On Monday, the prisoner, John Bean, was conveyed in a hackney coach to the Home Office, where the Privy Council had again assembled at one o'clock. The following members were present:—Sir Robert Peel, the Duke of Wellington, the Lord Chancellor, the Earl of Jersey, the Earl of Liverpool, the Duke of Buccleuch, Sir Edward Knatchbull, Lord Fitzgerald and Vesey, Lord Stanley, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the Attorney-General.

Mr. Hall, the chief magistrate of Bow-street, with Mr. Maule, Solicitor to the Treasury, and Mr. Burnaby, assisted their lordships in the inquiry. As on former occasions, the utmost secrecy was observed, consequently it was impossible to state the nature of the evidence given. The prisoner was ultimately remanded to Wednesday.

During the day the police were actively employed in tracing out the former habits and conduct of the deformed miscreant who fired at the Queen on Sunday, and the result of Inspector Penny's inquiries are said to be of an important character.

Both Mr. Hilton, the newsvender, and the prisoner's father, agreed in their statements that the traitor was fond of reading about Oxford, and upon one occasion he said to his master, "How well Oxford is provided for," and on another he mentioned to his father that he had been reading that Oxford was allowed a pint of wine per day, and two masters to teach him French and English.

On Wednesday the prisoner was again brought up for final examination before the Privy Council.

At ten minutes to one o'clock the prisoner was removed in a hackney coach, between Lieutenant Tracey, governor of the Westminster Bridewell, and a turnkey of that gaol, to the Home Office, and placed in an ante-room adjoining the Council Chamber.

The prisoner was placed at half-past one o'clock before the Privy Council, and his examination was proceeded with. While the investigation was going on the witnesses were suddenly removed to a private room by order of the Privy Council, and no person under any pretence whatever was allowed to communicate with them. After they had given their evidence they were let out of a private entrance into the Park, that no question should be asked them. Lord Fitzgerald and Vesci, the Duke of Wellington, Lord Jersey, and Lord Liverpool took their departure at half-past three o'clock, and they were followed by Sir Henry Hardinge and Sir George Cockburn. The other ministers did not leave the Home Office until the council broke up at half-past four o'clock; when the reporter learned that the prisoner had been fully committed to Newgate to take his trial for a misdemeanour, in default of finding two sureties of £250 each.

The prisoner was conducted to Newgate in the most private manner, by Inspectors Hughes and Martin.

PROVINCIAL.

Worcester.—The London mail, which runs through Worcester to Ludlow, will shortly be taken off the road, and the letter-bags for that town, Ludlow, and the intermediate towns, will be sent on the Great Western and Birmingham Railways, and conveyed to such towns from the nearest stations by mail carts. Lord Lowther has determined to abolish mail coaches, where it is practicable to do so, and he has also intimated his intention to dispense with mail guards on railways.

The first stone of the Pauper Lunatic Asylum at Exeter was laid, on Monday last, by Earl Fortescue, Lord Lieutenant of the county of Devon.

Bristol and Exeter Railway.—Friday, July 1, having been appointed for the opening of that portion of the line of the Bristol and Exeter Railway which connects the towns of Bridgewater and Taunton, the first train, for the conveyance of passengers to Taunton, left the terminus at Temple Meads, Bristol, at about five minutes past nine. On arriving at Bridgewater, it was met by a large concourse of spectators, who lined the banks on either side of the rail; and at Taunton the whole population appeared to have come forth on the occasion; the importance of the event causing the day to be kept as a general holiday. The train arrived at Taunton at about eleven o'clock. The journey from Bridgewater (11¼ miles) occupied twenty minutes only.

Sudbury.—On Monday notices of disfranchisement were served by a messenger from the Commons on the following free burgesses resident in the borough:—Francis Sikes Gooday, William Warner, Thomas Goody, Charles Bell Johnson, Chas. King, James Brown, Thomas Brown, Francis Muking, Samuel Shelly, and Joseph Wheeler, jun.; and at Bury St. Edmund's on Richard Steed, innkeeper, a free burgess of Sudbury; the first three for giving, and the others for acknowledging, the receipt of various sums of money at the last election.—Bury Post

The arrangements for the meeting of the Royal Agricultural Society at Bristol are in a very forward state, and promise to be completed by the appointed time. The entries of stock are numerous, the exhibition of implements will be large, and, upon the whole, a most gratifying meeting is anticipated. The facilities afforded by railroad communication will induce many persons to attend, who would be averse to a long journey by coach. The excitement upon the subject in the western counties is very great. The grand day of exhibition, on which the dinner will take place in the grand pavilion erected for the purpose, is July 14th.

British Association.—On Thursday the members of the British Association, and others, pursuant to an invitation from Lord Francis Egerton, visited the Worsley tunnel and collieries, belonging to the trustees of the late Duke of Bridgewater. About eleven o'clock the parties entered the extraordinary tunnels, having been previously furnished with suitable dresses, and the appearance of many of them was ludicrous in the extreme. The tunnels are eight miles in length, nearly extending to the town of Bolton; and, taken together, there is no less than 37, cut out of coal and rock, which are now made subservient to the conveyance of coals in flat-bottom boats, by being converted into a subterranean canal. The entrance to the coal-pits are from the sides of the canal (the latter being about 80 yards below the surface), and in these awful looking places no less than about 2000 human beings are employed; the produce of their labours, when in full work, being the cutting, gathering, and shipping of 3000 tons of coal per week.

The Anti-corn-Law Conference.—The members of the London Anti-Corn-law Conference met on Tuesday morning, at Herbert's (late Brown's) Hotel, Palace-yard, for the purpose of taking into consideration the present distresses of the country, and the causes of that distress. Deputies from each of the associations forming the great Anti-Corn-law League, and from the numerous branches of he Metropolitan Anti-Corn-law Association, were present. Shortly before twelve o'clock, P. A. Taylor, Esq., of London, was called to the chair, when reports from various towns and districts throughout the kingdom were read by the deputies, and received. Several eloquent speeches were delivered; and an executive committee appointed, with power to add to their numbers.

The Revenue.—The quarter's revenue was made up to the 5th July; and the result is a decrease on the quarter as compared with the similar period for 1841, of £26,427, although the postage has increased during that time £35,000, and the miscellaneous £195,552.—The only deficiency (in the Excise) amounts to £426,395.—The total amount of the income for the quarter is £12,052,739, and £7,500,219 of Exchequer Bills will be required to meet the charge on the Consolidated Fund.

A Smoking Juryman.—Last week at the Southampton sessions, during the trial of fourteen men for a riot, one of the jurymen commenced smoking a cigar in the most cavalier and impudent manner. The Recorder (Mr. Cockburn) was so indignant that he stopped the proceedings of the court, gave the puffing juryman a severe lecture, declaring that his conduct was one of the grossest insults ever offered in an English court of justice, and fined him £10. On the re-assembling of the court the following morning, the juryman made an apology to the court, and was excused paying the fine.

THE OVERLAND MAIL.

CHINA AND INDIA.

We have this day the satisfaction of laying before our readers the latest intelligence from China, Affghanistan, and India, from which it will be seen that the supremacy of British arms and British valour continues triumphant amongst the unlucky Celestials, and has been at length vindicated and asserted amongst the base, treacherous, and perfidious Affghans. The public were already prepared for this gratifying news from the telegraphic despatch in anticipation of the overland mail, which appeared in the second edition of the last number of this paper; but although the accounts add little to our stock of information on the subject of our position and prospects in those remote regions—the seats of war—yet are we peculiarly gratified with the receipt of our despatches, as they enable us to redeem a pledge given by us to the public last week, to set forth in our present publication a number of views of the most important cities and outposts of the Celestial empire. The drawings with which our account of the events of the war are interspersed are faithful delineations of what they purport to represent; and as these places are at present invested with extraordinary interest, not only to this country, but to the whole of Europe, it is gratifying to us to be able so far to fulfil the promise with which we opened our career, "to spare neither trouble nor expense in bringing home to our readers, not only the literature, and customs, and dress, but the institutions and localities of other lands, with spirit and fidelity." The only regret which we experienced on perusing the accounts of the war in China is, that British arms can derive no increased lustre from being employed in fluttering these Celestial runaways; and we therefore think it high time that a bold and decisive effort should be made at once, to put an end to this bloody, but inglorious warfare. We hope, however, that by this time our British "barbarians" have paid the Emperor a morning visit at Pekin, and that such terms have been concluded as will at once vindicate the national honour and compensate the national loss. The mail which brought the intelligence annexed was despatched ten days earlier than usual, in order to avoid the monsoon which was about to set in, and therefore the news was not brought up to so late a date as might have been expected. In our first number we gave a map of the Affghan country, which will be found a useful and interesting companion as well as instructive guide to the details which we give to-day of the war in that country.

The dates of the despatches are—from Bombay, May 23; Calcutta, May 13; from Macao, April 1; Alexandria, June 20. The narrative of events at Jellalabad is brought down to the 2nd of May.

Our news from China is to the 4th of April. The preparations for the defence by the Chinese of the river between Whampoa and Canton were still in progress, although now nearly completed; and their officers were unremitting in their exertions to practise their artillerymen in use of the great guns.

Ningpo had been attacked on the 18th of March by a Chinese force, estimated at from 10,000 to 12,000 men. They were allowed to enter the town without opposition, but upon reaching the market-place were attacked on all sides by our troops, and instantly routed. About 250 are said to have been left dead on the field, while on our side not a single casualty took place.

This appears to have been only part of a concerted attack, as at the same time fire-boats were launched against our ships, and an attempt was made upon the garrison of Chinhae, but in each case with signal ill success.

Several skirmishes had also taken place along the coast, but with no decisive result, although in each the enemy had suffered considerable loss. More vigorous measures were, it is said, in contemplation; and a movement to the northward was intended upon the arrival of the expected reinforcements.

Trade appears to have been carried on as usual, but, with the exception of cotton, not upon remunerating prices. Barter was the only means of commercial intercourse.

VIEW OF THE CANTON RIVER.

CHINA.

CANTON, WHAMPOA, AND THE CANTON RIVER.—The defences of the river from Whampoa to Canton are now all nearly and some quite finished and fully armed; on every spot great activity is apparent, and the practice of great guns and small arms is incessant night and day.

It is reported in Canton, that a ship of about 350 tons has just been launched near the Fate (flower ground) gardens; she is said to be pierced for 26 guns; and has been built by some rich individuals for a present to the government.

One large boat, and one or two of smaller size, are propelled by paddle-wheels, in imitation of our steamers; they are frequently seen exercising both below and above Canton, and they make very good way against both wind and tide; we suppose they are worked by winches turned by hand at the bottom of the boat.

At Shameen a large and very strong fort has been built, in which about 35 guns are mounted; they were proved about a fortnight ago. The foundation of a fort on a smaller scale has been laid close by, and nearer the foreign factories. The small fort opposite, on Honam (Rouge fort), has been thoroughly repaired, as has also the old Dutch Folly. A new fort of great strength has been erected on the site of the French Folly. On the western side of the Salt River there is a formidable field work, flanked by two smaller ones, all completely armed and manned. The river assumes its most formidable appearance at the opening of the Whampoa passage. Junk river is strongly staked throughout its whole breadth, excepting a narrow passage for boats only, under the walls of a very extensive fort on the north shore; crates of stones and sand having been sunk between the stakes, the latter are then strongly bound together by branches of trees and iron clamps, the oxide of which metal combining with the sand, will soon consolidate the whole into one mass of rock.

CHINESE FORT.

(From the Bombay Courier.)

We have received vid Calcutta intelligence from Macao to the 4th of April, and from Singapore to the 10th of the same month. The news from China is both important and satisfactory. On the morning of the 10th of March the Chinese troops, estimated at from 10,000 to 12,000 men, attacked Ningpo. The enemy scaled the walls, and advanced to the market-place, in the centre of the city, before they met with any opposition from the British troops. This did not, however, arise from any neglect on the part of the garrison, all the necessary preparations having been made some time previously. Indeed, the arrangements appear to have been excellent, and reflect much credit on Sir Hugh Gough. It seems that his excellency was desirous of allowing the Chinese to advance a considerable distance unmolested, with the hope of punishing them severely for their temerity. Neither was the general deceived in his expectations. The enemy were quickly routed and compelled to quit the city, leaving 250 dead in the streets. The artillery rendered good service in the pursuit, the guns being drawn by a number of ponies which had been previously trained for that purpose. Her Majesty's 49th Regiment were sent a considerable distance after the Chinese, and had not returned to Ningpo on the 12th of March, the date of our latest intelligence from that place.

An attack was made on Chinhae simultaneously with that on Ningpo. This also proved a failure, the Chinese having been repulsed with great loss.

The mandarins also contemplated an attempt upon Chusan, for which purpose they had collected a considerable force on the island of Taisam. Their intentions were, however, frustrated, by the Nemesis having been sent to reconnoitre and ascertain the extent of their preparations. A boat having been despatched from this vessel, was fired on by the Chinese, when pulling into a creek. The steamer's crew were immediately landed. They succeeded, after killing many of the enemy, in capturing 30 junks, supposed to have been intended to convey troops to Chusan.

CHINESE SOLDIER.

It is remarked that all the Chinese soldiers left dead at Ningpo and Chinhae had a few dollars about them. It is supposed from this that a gratuity was issued to them immediately before they attacked the city, in order to induce them to advance. It is said that the Emperor has odered that the provinces which are the seat of war shall defray the whole of its expenses. We may conclude, therefore, that the Cabinet of Pekin do not conceive it necessary to make a great national effort against their foes. The inhabitants of the invaded provinces are naturally disinclined to bear the whole of the heavy pecuniary charges necessary for carrying on hostilities. The consequence is, that the Chinese army to the south of the Hangchow river is in want of pay and destitute of supplies, from which cause the troops were in such a state of insubordination, that it was expected they would shortly disband themselves.

The whole of the operations above referred to were effected without the loss of a man on the side of the British.

The following official notification of the success of the British forces has been promulgated by her Majesty's Plenipotentiary:—

"CIRCULAR TO HER BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S SUBJECTS IN CHINA.

"Her Britannic Majesty's Plenipotentiary in China has great pleasure in announcing to her Majesty's subjects the complete repulse of two bodies of Chinese troops, which attacked the British positions at Ningpo and Chinhae at daylight on the morning of the 10th of last month.

"During the whole of February almost daily intelligence reached the head-quarters of her Majesty's forces, showing that the Chinese high authorities contemplated some active operations; but they were from time to time deferred on such frivolous pretences, that it appears their excellencies the naval and military commanders-in-chief having gone over to Chusan to make arangements at that place preparatory to a forward movement of a portion, at least, of her Majesty's combined forces.

"In this state matters remained until the date and hour above mentioned, when a considerable body of Chinese, estimated at from 10,000 to 12,000 men, advanced upon the south and west gates of Ningpo, got over the walls, and penetrated to the market-place, in the centre of the city, where they were met by our troops, and instantly driven back with great loss; in fact, it would seem that the moment the Chinese troops found themselves so warmly received, their sole object was to get out of the city as fast as possible, and in their retreat to the south gate, the field-guns, drawn by ponies, came up and opened on the dense mass with grape and cannister, at a distance of less than 100 yards. Above 250 dead bodies were found inside the walls; and when the accounts came away, her Majesty's 49th Regiment had not returned from the pursuit of the discomfitted and flying enemy.

"Whilst these operations were progressing on shore, a number of fire-boats (sampans), lashed together with chains, were floated down the river, and were towed into the mud by the boats of the Sesostris steamer. In the mean time a gun was brought down a lane in the eastern suburb (across the river), and as the inhabitants had been previously warned that any such attempt would bring chastisement upon them, her Majesty's ship Modeste opened her guns, and did great execution in that quarter.

"The attack on Chinhae was much more feeble. The enemy advanced to the north gate, where they were driven off by the guard, and followed by one company (afterwards reinforced by three others) of her Majesty's 55th Regiment, who killed 30 men and two mandarins in the pursuit.

"Simultaneously with the attack on the city of Chinhae, firesam pans, chained together, were set adrift to burn the shipping, the anchorage; but they all went on shore above the ships of war and merchant vessels, and did no sort of harm.

"Shortly before these repulses occurred, the Nemesis steamer was sent from Chusan to reconnoitre the Island of Taisam, where it was understood Chinese troops were collecting with the purpose of attacking her Majesty's forces at Tinghae. The steamer sent her boats into a creek, where they were fired on; and in consequence Commander Collinson and Lieutenant Hall landed the steam-ship's company, when the Chinese fled with the loss of about 30 killed and a number wounded. The steamer's boats then set fire to a number of junks which had also fired on her, and returned to Chinhae.

"Their excellencies the naval and military commanders-in-chief had gone back to Ningpo, and proposed to follow up the repulses the enemy had experienced by active measures.

"It affords her Majesty's Plenipotentiary the highest satisfaction to close the circular by stating that in these attempts of the enemy, her Majesty's combined forces had not lost a man.

"The latest intelligence from the head-quarters of the Chinese army south of the Hangchow River speaks of the troops being in almost a state of insubordination, and in want of supplies, &c.

"The Emperor had ordered that the provinces which are the seat of the war should bear the expenses of it; and as the inhabitants seem resolved to make no further sacrifices, there appears every probability of the army dissolving itself, and becoming totally disorganised.

"God save the Queen.

"HENRY POTTINGER,

"Her Majesty's Plenipotentiary.

"Dated at Macao, on the 1st day of April, 1842."

(From the Canton Register of March 18.)

The quiet of Canton is again likely to be disturbed by an accident which occurred in Whampoa reach on the night of the 9th inst.; a well-known Chinese smuggler was approaching one of the opium-vessels in a tanka-boat, to make a purchase of the drug, he was hailed, but did not answer, and a person on deck of the English vessel fired his musket and shot him dead on the spot. This much-to-be lamented and censured proceeding happened just after the boat's crew of the English ship Autumnus had been seized, maltreated, wounded, and carried to Canton. The officer of the boat had mistaken the channel leading to Canton, and had gone through the Junk River; he was hailed and fired at, when he immediately turned his boat's head towards the shipping at Whampoa; he was chased by a number of Chinese boats, but still kept a-head of them, and was fast nearing the vessel lying ahead of Whampoa reach, when one of his oars broke, and he was overhauled and captured; the Chinese cut at the unresisting and unarmed crew with their swords, and wounded some of the men and a boy severely. They were taken to Canton, accompanied by a great number of Chinese, and carried before the kwangchowfoo. Their captors reported they had come to the spot where they had been hailed with hostile intentions. "Very well," said the kwangchowfoo, "as you have taken the boat, you have, of course, taken their arms, bring them hither." No arms were to be found, the boat was unarmed. The Chinese soldiers then changed their ground of accusation, and said the boat had come to sound the river, and "spy about." "Well," said the kwanchowfoo again, "they could not sound the depths of the river without a lead and line, bring those hither;" but none were forthcoming, for neither were on board the boat. The kwangchowfoo finding the charge was false, and his own people in the wrong, dismissed the Autumnus's officer and boat's crew, and returned the boat to them at about 11 p.m. the same evening.

VIEW OF NINGPO.

The following is a letter from Ningpo:—"A private of her Majesty's 55th has shot his corporal, and the latter has since died.—A most melancholy occurrence took place on the night of the 18th of February. The launch of the Ernaad transport was on shore at a small creek close above Chinghae, filling water-casks. Towards evening the boat grounded, and could not be got off, owing to the fall of the tide. The consequence was, that Mr. W——, the officer in charge, and 11 Lascars, forming the crew, had to remain with her during the first watch. When dark, two Chinamen and a boy came to the boat, and by signs intimated that they could procure some 'female society' for those who wished for it. Most unfortunately, Mr. W—— was tempted to accompany them, and took with him two Lascars. As has come out in evidence, the Chinese arranged their plans admirably. Mr. W—— went first, followed by a Chinaman carrying a lantern, then a Lascar, followed by the other Chinaman, then the other Lascar, and the boy bringing up the rear. When they had gone a little way the boy disappeared, and his place was supplied by a Chinaman, who made his appearance from some of the houses they had to pass. They all walked on for some distance, until they were beyond the village, which is close to the watering-place. The first Chinaman then handed his lantern to Mr. W——, as if to enable him to see the path more distinctly, and thus leaving his own hands free; and in answer to an exclamation of poor W——'s, pointed to a house surrounded by trees, as the place they were going to. Soon after, some signal was given, and about 40 or 50 Chinamen rushed from all sides on their victims. The Lascar, who made his escape, saw Mr. W—— holding out his pistol, when he was himself knocked down. He rose again, and in some way or other, he does not know how, made his escape to the boat. As soon as it was light, a party was sent ashore from the Blonde, to the place where the attack had taken place. Poor W——'s body was found in a small lake, without the head, and above 30 wounds on his body. He seems to have fought to the last, rather than be taken alive. However, some of the wounds seem to have been inflicted for the purpose of torture, the wrists and knee-joints being cut into, and cuts being made between each finger up to the wrist. The other Lascar seems also to have been wounded, but, from the traces for some distance, he has been carried off alive."

"We have heard that Corporal White, who came to Ningpo to intimate that a commissioner (Shoo) would make his appearance to treat, although fed from the general's table, and taken up in a man-of-war boat, close to Takee, made a report that he had been most cruelly treated, and just escaped with his Life.

"It is said that the only terms about which we will treat at present are the payment of 20,000,000 dollars, half to be paid before we leave Ningpo, and further, that Sir H. Pottinger is to be received at Pekin.

"The Chinese troops seem to be collecting round us. They are said to be in force at You-Yaou-Seikee and Fongahei; there has been also an appearance of some force on the right bank of the Tabseen, not far from Chinghae. There is also a report that soldiers have been embarked at Chapo, to be landed on Chusan; so that, if there is any truth in the above account of their movements, the Chinese seem to have a plan of attacking Ningpo, Chinghee, and Chusan, at one time.

"Yah-kin, the Emperor's nephew, and generalissimo of the Chinese forces, is said to have arrived in the neighbourhood.

VIEW OF AMOY.

AMOY.—A letter from Amoy, of the 15th March, gives the following proofs of the march of civilization:—"Amoy is very dull, as the troops are quartered on the island of Kolongsoo, which the inhabitants have deserted, and we are not allowed to land at the city. The officers all keep their ponies, and have levelled a tolerable race-course, where they meet three days a month. There is also a hunt, with no end of red coats, cords, and tops, in which the dog, instead of being the hunter, is actually hunted." What would not a jackal give to be there! He would feel himself quite at a premium, and make his own terms.

As upon our first page we have given a specimen of Chinese artillery, and, in other columns, a soldier and a fort, we will add to our illustrations a portrait of one of those formidable officers of the celestial empire ycleped mandarins.

MILITARY MANDARIN.

We now turn from our Chinese successes to the intelligence from Affghanistan,

INDIA.

The subjoined letter from our Bombay correspondent contains the cream of the India news.

BOMBAY, MAY 23rd.

SINCE the departure of the last mail on the 3rd instant, the intelligence from the north-west has been highly satisfactory, as far as it goes. General Pollock effected a junction with the troops composing the garrison of Jellalabad on the 16th of April, having met with no opposition or annoyance after passing Ali Musjid. General Elphinstone expired on the 24th April, and the Affgans had agreed to send his body to Jellalabad. On the 25th Captain Colin Mackenzie, of the Madras army, arrived at Jellalabad, on parole, from Akbkar Khan, with proposals for the surrender of the prisoners, the particulars of which have not yet transpired, nor is it known in what manner they have been entertained. The Delhi Gazette says:—

"Captain Mackenzie states that Mahomed Akhkar has only one hundred followers, as, after his defeat by Sale, his soldiers dropped off one after another, until reduced to their present scanty numbers.

"The prisoners, male and female, are confined in two separate forts within the valley of Tezeen; they are pretty well treated. Four reconcilements had taken place, and four more were shortly expected; one lady, Mrs. Waller, had to march, being allowed a litter, the day after her confinement.

"Captain C. Mackenzie brought in the intelligence of the death of General Elphinstone, who expired on the 23rd or 24th of April, and that Mahomed Akhbar had agreed to send his body to Jellalabad, where it was expected to arrive on the night of the 26th. It is very satisfactory to know that the day previous to his death he signed a document, containing full and authentic details of all the occurrences, from the commencement of the Cabul difficulties to the time of his being taken prisoners, and which, it is said, will, to a great degree, exonerate the general from the charges which have been brought against his personal character. Captain C. Mackenzie had been allowed several days' absence, by Mahomed Akhbar, but decided on returning forwith. His testimony regarding the murder of Sir W. M'Naghten, by the hand of Mahomed Akhbar, is most conclusive; 'he saw the ruffian perpetrate the murder;' while Shah Soojah is implicated deeply in the rebellion. General Elphinstone's report was brought in by Captain Mackenzie; and it is currently stated in the camp, that at the council of war held previous to the retreat, Major Pottinger's objections to such a step were overruled. Other narratives have also been prepared by the prisoners; one, it is said, by Captain Eyre, of the Artillery, which is reported to be very full and accurate.

"Much sickness, we regret to say prevails at Jellalabad, and the death of cornet A. Fraser, of her Majesty's 3rd Dragoons, followed that of Major Anderson on the evening of the 25th of April.

"We are glad to state that one of our correspondents, in allusion to the letter inquiring respecting the existence of Dr. John Forsyth, which appeared in our columns, says that that officer is alive and well at Jellalabad.

"A junction has been effected near the west end of the Khyberbetween Brigadier Monteath's and Colonel Bolton's brigades; and it was hoped they would be at Jellalabad sooner than we anticipated in our issue of yesterday, as the orders to Brigadier Monteath were to avail himself of the moonlight nights to hasten back.

"Provisions are being collected with increased rapidity at Jellalabad and every thing portends advanced preparations for a forward movement.

"The officers named in our last as on their way to the provinces had reached Peshawur; they are Major Frazer, Captain Younghusband, Lieutenant William and others.

"The Syce, noted as having reached Jellalabad from Ghuznee, mentions the following as the officers who have escaped:—Colonel Palmer, Captain Alston, Ensign Williams, Lieutenant Harris, a doctor, Lieutenant Barnes, Lieutenant Crawford, of the Bombay establishment, and another

"Captain Mackenzie returned on the 27th to the Affghan camp with the answer to the proposal of which he was the bearer, neither of which have transpired. It is said that no enormous ransom is demanded for the prisoners. Sickness, at our latest dates, had become very prevalent, occasioned by the extreme heat, the thermometer standing at 105 deg.; but more especially the half and quarter-ration system to which the troops are subjected."

JELLALABAD.—A notification from the Governor-General, bestowing rewards on the garrison of Jellalabad, for their noble and successful defence of that fortress, had been published and created great enthusiasm.

The Governor General was pleased to direct that the second company of the sixth battalion of Artillery should bear upon its appointments, and the 5th Regiment of Light Cavalry upon its standards and appointments, and the 35th Regiment of Native Infantry upon its colours and appointments, a mural crown, superscribed "Jellalabad," as a memorial of the fortitude, perseverance, and enterprise evinced by those several corps during the blockade of Jellalabad.

The Governor-General was further pleased to direct that a silver medal be made for every officer, non-commissioned officer, and private, European and Native, who belonged to the garrison of Jellalabad on the 7th of April, 1842, such medals to be all similar, to bear on one side a mural crown, superscribed "Jellalabad," and on the other side the words "April 7th, 1842."

CABUL.—The following narrative of the murder of Shah Soojah at Cabul, and of the events which succeeded his death, has appeared in the Calcutta Englishman. It is translated from a Persian letter and is the fullest, most circumstantial, and apparently the most authentic account that has yet been published.

"We have been favoured with the following translation of a Persian letter sent from an authentic source. There can be no doubt now of the murder of the Shah; for the circumstantial nature of the communication would of itself establish the fact, were there no other corroborative evidence to rely upon. The letter will, we are sure, be perused with the greatest interest by all classes of readers —

"'The following news is from Cabul. April 17:—Nawab Zaman Khan, and Jubar Khan (the Dost's brother), Osman Khan, and Ameen Oolla Khan, having agreed on a plan among themselves, went to the king, and having taken the holy word (the Koran) with them, satisfied the king by the agreement of both word and oath, inasmuch that he consented to go with an army, consisting of a general levy, towards Jellalabad; for which end it was settled that the king himself, having sent his tents out of Cabul and made a march to Seen Sung, should there muster and review his whole army, and then march on Jellalabad; but before this happened the king, in strict and absolute privacy, of his own authority, appointed the son of Ameen Oollah Khan commander of his army. The Barakzye Sirdars being much disgusted with the kings thus appointing the son of Ameen Oolah Khan to his post twice from it came to hand. They even proposed to the king that they should assemble 25,000 soldiers at Cabul, while he king went out to review his army and march on Jelalabad. The king accordingly took forth his tents and went down to Seea Sung; and the Barakzye Sirdars and the rest, with their forces, also went forth, for the purpose of being present at the muster of the army by the king, as agreed: so it was that on the first day the king mustered his army at the plain aforesaid, and at night returned to the Bala Hissar, leaving Prince Futteh Jung at Seea Sung; and the same night the king sent letters for the men of Koohistan about Jelalabad, and to Khyber, and the neighbourhood of Peshawur, addressed to the Shahzadahs.—[N.B. This sentence is very carelessly written, but a subsequent passage shows that Soshzadah Mahomed Kasim and others of the royal blood were the parties addressed.]

"In the morning the king, having made his preparations, and having put on his dress of ceremony, took his seat in his travelling chair of state (khasah), and went forth out of Cabul by the gate towards Seah Sangsed, to make his march to Seea Sung; but on read near Shirt Shahed, Sheah-sod-Dowlah, the son of Nuweb Zeman Khan, had placed himself with fifty Jezailchees. When the king's retinue reached the spot, those Jezailchees rose and fired on him; two balls struck him, one in the groin and one in the breast; five of the king's bearers were shot down by the volley; seven of the soldiers that formed the king's escort were also struck and fell; the king died almost immediately. Shoojah-sod-Dowlah coming up with a drawn sword, stood over the king's corpse. Whatever property in jewels was about the corpse—the crown, the girdle, and so on, the sword and dagger—was plundered by them. When Shahzadah Futty Jung heard of the catastrophe, he made his way back to the Bala Hissar. The body of horse with Shoojah sod-Dowlah pursued the prince at a smart pace, hoping to lay hands on him; but the prince, by presence of mind and resolution, made his way to the Bala Hissar: when finding the gates there guarded, and the troopers close behind him, he fled back to the city, and hid himself in the fort of Mahmood Khan Beygal. Zeman Khan and the other chiefs sent for Mahmood Khan Beygal. The king was our enemy, and we slew him; now give us over the prince as we are agreed to make him king,' to which Muhmood Khan answered, 'You Barakzye Sirdars, in swearing a solemn oath to the king, and afterwards killing him, have committed a heinous crime. We of the tribes (Oolcos) of Cabul were against the deed. Zeman Khan replied, 'My son killed the king without my wish or consent.' Muhmood Khan at night left Futeh Jung out of his own fort, and locked him with his women in the Bala Hissar; when Ameen Oolah Khan being in the Bab Hissar, with near 2000 soldiers there assembled, he placed Futty Jung on the throne, and declared him his king, writing letters to the Oolcos, his dependants, telling them to assemble about the Bala Hissar and throw in supplies, while he himself prepared for action, guarding the gates with artillery. Khan Sherin Khan, and Mahmood Khan, and the Kooz-bash faction form one faction, while the Barakzye Sirdars and the Nawabs, and the men of the Cabul tribes and the Kohistanees form the other.

"The news-writer goes on to say that preparations for hostilities are being made; women and children being sent towards Bameean, Bulkh, and Bokhara, and the property of merchants removed to places for safety. Some persons were declaring for the claims of Hyder, son of Shah Zeman, as the real heir to the throne. Reports were rife about the advance of the British troops, slaying every one in their way, and a march on Lughman to release the prisoners. The only other item of importance is the account of the king's letter with letters for Shah Zadah Mummmad Kasim, who states that Akbar Khan seized and imprisoned him, and destroyed his letters, releasing him only when he fled to Lughman. The king therefore was marching against him, and for the relief of Jellalabad. The chiefs being unable to attack the Bala Hissar with success, devised this truly Affghan scheme to inveigle the Shah from his stronghold and murder him.

"It would appear from subsequent accounts, that Futty Jung did not long retain possession of the throne, having been murdered by the opposing party; and Timour Shah, another son of the late king, and who has always been very friendly to our cause, set up in his stead. The prince, it appears, still holds the reins of government, and is said to be looking out eagerly for the advance of our army, no doubt expecting to be assisted by us in locating questions of the throne. The hostages, prisoners and sick and wounded (between 300 and 400 in number) who were left in Cabul at the time of the outbreak, are said to have received much ill treatment during the confusion which succeeded the murder of the Shah; but it is to be hoped that Timour Shah, if he really be on the throne, has taken them under his protection.

"It is unnecessary to point out to our readers, that should the above extracted account of the circumstances which preceded the assassination of Shah Soojah prove correct, there will not remain a doubt as to his Majesty's participation in the insurrectionary proceedings. His crime, however, if he has committed one, has brought with it its own punishment!

SCINDE.—We have no news of the slightest importance from this quarter, all remaining quiet and undisturbed. Major Reid, with his force, was to resume at Dadar till the 3rd or 4th of May, and then move up through the pass. He has, in all likelihood, by this time reached Quettah.

In pursuance of peremptory orders from General Nott, Brigadier England, with 2500 men, left Quettah on the 26th of April, for Candahar, a portion of the force at the latter place having been detached so as to meet General England, and aid him in getting the convoy through the Kojuck pass. On the 28th of April, the General reached the heights of Hykulzie, the scene of his late discomfiture, reported in our last summary. No time was lost in attacking the enemy's position, and, we are happy to say, the attempt was successful. A well-directed fire from the artillery compelled the insurgents to evacuate their outposts while the British infantry were ascending the hill. The enemy lost five standards, and had about fifty killed. The casualties on our side were very trifling, only five having been killed. Lieut. Ashburner of the 3rd Light Cavalry was severely wounded. The following letter from our correspondent at Sukkur, dated May the 8th, contains some further particulars:—

"The troops under Brigadier England left Quettah, agreeably to orders from General Nott, on the 26th ult., at ten for the purpose of joining the Candahar force, the place of their late retreat. I have only time to say that they were carried in the most gallant style, the enemy flying in all directions. They must have suffered very severely. Our troops marched in, taking five standards, sundry matchlocks, &c. The 41st are much pleased for the fair, on the previous occasion, of their brave comrades; the whole, both Europeans and natives, stuck to the fighting part of the business like bricks. Casualties are as follows:—

"Lieut. Ashburner, 3d Light Cavalry, severely wounded.

"Her Majesty's 41st Foot—2 privates wounded.

"3rd Light Cavalry—3 troopers and 3 horses wounded.

"Native Infantry—2 sepoys wounded."

BOONDELKUND.—The Boondela insurgents have been defeated by our troops and dispersed. This victory, however, was accompanied by some loss. Captain Raine, of the 3rd Native Infantry, and several men, having been killed in the conflict. There have subsequently been reports of a further rising, and a strong force is about to be thrown into the Saugur and Boondelkund provinces, with the view of restoring order.

BURMAH.—There is nothing of note from the Burman empire. All was perfectly quiet at the date of the last accounts (April 6) but a report prevailed that Thawaing would pay another visit to the coast after the rainy season. These visits will be expensive to us, if we have to fit out another expedition to protect our provinces. The force now at Moulmein consists of one European troops, of Artillery (Madras), with about fifty dismounted Native Horse Artillery, her Majesty's 51st Regiment, the 33rd and 44th Madras Native Infantry, and the Tulloch, a bad corps.

THE CABUL PRISONERS.—The following is an extract from a letter written by a political agent in India, whose information may be relied upon as accurate:—"I have received letters from you while Akbar lacked so gloomy, but now that I see every probability of the captives release, I at once send you the glad tidings. Captain Mackenzie their fellow-captive, arrived at Jellalabad on the 25th of April, in consequence of reports, and ventured to Mahomed Akbar on the 26th, with a proposal from General Pollock to guarantee the Ghilzie chiefs (in whose force the prisoners are) the possession of their estates and privileges, and a present of two lacs of rupees, on the arrival of the captives at the camp at Jellalabad. The bait will, I doubt not, take, and we shall soon see the captives. Mackenzie says, he has kept up his spirits capitally; and all who have written from their party have said the same, that all in the end will be well. All is prosperous with our troops at Jellalabad; at first there was a fear for grain, but it is now coming in fast, and I am sending it from Peshawur. The enemy are terrified, and divided among themselves; but it will not be without its carnage, we might have been at Cabul by this time. I am very busy, having ad led soldiering to my other duties I have only just returned from the other end of the Khyber Pass.

THE GARRISON OF JELLALABAD.—Some interesting information in reference to the affairs of Jellalabad will be read with interest. Towards the close of the siege, when the fortunate capture of 500 sheep relieved the garrison for a time from apprehension of starvation, the Sepoys of the 35th N. native infantry, in receiving their share, sent a deputation to her Majesty's 13th Light Infantry, stating that as native troops lived chiefly on vegetable diet, they requested that the European soldiers, to whom the work of unloading had been assigned, would accept of their share of the recently-acquired supplies. The European Sergeant-major of the 37th Native Infantry owes a most lucky escape of the sufferings of the men under him. When last mustered there were only 200 who could answer to the roll, and of these not one-fourth were able to bear arms. Their fingers and toes were frost-bitten and dropped off, their feet and hands more resembled stumps of charred and blackened wood than the limbs of living men. The insurgents required to do little more than leave the cold to do its work on the fateful 12th and 13th of Jan. Major General G. Pollock, the gallant officer, whose excellent arrangements in conducting an immense mass of stores, provisions, and baggage through the Khyber Pass, with a the loss of a single beast of burden, have excited an admiration only equalled by his cool and determined valour with which that formidable barrier was forced, notwithstanding the desperate manner in which it was defended, is a near kinsman the Bengal Artillery. He received his military education at the Royal Academy, Woolwich, and proceeded to India in 1805. He is a younger brother of Sir Frederick Pollock, her Majesty's Attorney-General.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We shall be glad to hear from "Censor" again

"E. H.—This correspondent is entitled to the Colosseum Print; and like others who have the same claim, shall in due time receive all particulars concerning it from our columns.

Every Body's Column omitted for want of room

We have not space this week to give a fac-simile of the beautiful piece of Berlin needlework submitted for our inspection by Mr. Owen of the German Repository of Art and Manufactures, Wigmore-street, Cavendish-square. It is really very elegant, and worthy the attention of the curious in those matters.

We have great pleasure in announcing that we have made arrangements with first-rate artists to produce a series of drawings of the proceedings of the Royal Agricultural Society of England, to be held at Bristol during the next week. All the subjects of interest, such as the Cattle Show, the Ploughing Match, Banquets, &c. which will be engraved in our Journal, with a spirit and fidelity hitherto unequalled within the range of newspaper illustration. The demand of the public for this paper will certainly be met; but if the orders are not given in time, as certainly cannot be met with punctuality.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 9, 1842.

It is rather surprising how long men will go on under an inconvenient, an oppressive, nay, even a glaringly unjust system; condemning it, but suffering its abuses still; lamenting it but seeking no remedy; as if such a thing was unattainable, as if the cure for human evils was to be brought from the stars by some process independent of human exertion. This lasts till the abuse becomes intolerable, a way is found to abolish it, and the world is startled by the apparent ease with which the remedy is applied. More especially is this the case where the evil pressed exclusively, or almost exclusively, on those classes of society which have not the power of immediately giving effect to what they must often wish to see secured to them. For many years the extensive powers given to Justices of the Peace in Quarter Sessions, and to the Recorders of Boroughs, have been considered excessive. A periodical assembly of rural magistrates had the power of trying prisoners for capital offences, and awarding capital punishment. From the education, station in life, and occupations of these gentlemen, no five of the very full "bench" we have known assembled could possess a fifth part of the legal knowledge of any one of the judges of the land, before whom the assize circuit must be held. Nor could they be expected to have that skill in sifting evidence often contradictory, frequently of the most dangerous kind, circumstantial, which practice combined with knowledge can alone bestow. It were useless, even if it were possible, to go over all the instances of hasty judgements, of partial decisions, where prejudice has turned the scale against the accused man, not, perhaps, guilty, merely because accused. It is sufficient to state that a long period has elapsed since "Justice's justice" had become the reproach of our criminal law, and passed into an expressive but degrading proverb. When we see injustice and oppression working unchecked if not unreproved, we are told in Scripture to "marvel not at the the matter," nor do we; when men have the power they will too often exercise it; the giant's strength will be used with the giant's will. But where the remedy was obvious, we may "marvel" at this—that it was not sooner applied to the evils we have hinted at rather than developed. An effectual cure has, we hope, been wrought by the bill introduced during the past week by the Lord Chancellor—the Justices Jurisdiction Bill. It it as remarkable an instance of brevity and dispatch in law-making, two qualities which it is to be wished were equally attainable in law administering. The bill itself consists of only six clauses, in four pages. It was introduced on the Wednesday, passed through all its stages the same day, and sent to the Commons; it was returned on Thursday, and at four o'clock that day received the royal assent by commission. Thus, almost within the compass of a natural day, was swept away an abuse which had existed for years. To talk of going "at a railroad pace" is nothing after this; nor should we wish to see this dispatch in every case, though the error is more frequently the other way than may be imagined. A good measure cannot pass too rapidly, and a good measure we certainly deem the present one to be. There will be more regularity, more method, more of certainty, if human efforts can ever positively attain it, in our criminal proceedings; and, above all, every suspicion of partiality or influence will be banished; for if ever any men deserved the full confidence of a nation, for integrity, honesty, and uprightness, those men are the Judges of England; to whom, and to whom alone, we would entrust the "issues of life and death," as long as the law makes such a fearful punishment possible. Whatever may be thought of the men and systems under which we live, the judicial ermine of England is at present pure and unstained; and so may it long continue.

It will be seen by our parliamentary report, that Colonel Dundas (a scion of the Melville family) has been dismissed from his appointment as side-de-camp to the Queen, for having spoken disrespectfully of her Majesty at the dinner table of the Earl of Erol. The ungallant officer also loses his regiment, and is obliged to retire on half-pay. As the punishment has been so summary and so speedy, we do not intend indulging in any severe observations with regard to his offence; but we cannot help congratulating the Government on their evident determination not to protect their political partizans at the expense of their loyalty.

THE DANGERS OF DEFORMITY.

The personal peculiarities of criminals are really a matter of some importance to the honest part of society. It is dangerous to be too like certain persons in anything; very lame and very respectable gentleman may be subjected to much personal inconvenience from a recent burglary, by some Bill Sykes with a halt. One cannot always squint with impunity, and at times such an involuntary distinction as red hair, may put your honest indignation in a still more flaming condition, when it introduces you to a select party of policemen in a station house. And it is really astonishing how much your prime scoundrels resemble the rest of mankind; they each seem the types of a class, and whenever they get into a scrape, involve all of that class in the preliminary consequences, which though they stop short of the debtor's door of Newgate, may be very disagreeable for all that. Every one must remember the number of persons arrested for Good, the murderer; his description was so delightfully general, that, as the old song says, there were

"Within the realm
Five hundred good as he!"

Indeed his partial baldness, and his combing his hair over the crown of his head, so perfectly identified him with the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, that we should have trembled for him during the "hue and cry," had we not understood from the papers, that he was confined by a lucky fit of gout at the time. This week the run has been against humpbacks; during the twelve hours for which the majesty of British justice was distanced by that crooked piece of malignity, whom we will not condescend to name (the wicked copyist at two removes of a vile original) —the number of little deformed men "detained," to use a mild phrase, was astonishing. Before one station a whole regiment of these unfortunate individuals was paraded. We pity them, and detest the act that led to the process; but there is an irresistible spice of the ludicrous in the whole affair. Notwithstanding the case of Richard the Third, a hunchback is is not inseparably connected in our minds with murder; still less does it suggest regicide. They soon, however, become synonymous terms and things with the police. Even dear old "Master Humphrey" could hardly have visited the "Old Curiosity Shop" in safety: fancy so kindly and gentle a being profaned by the touch of one of the K division! And who can tell how many hearts as good, and feelings as keen, may not have been outraged in the wholesale arrest of all who approached the description? Verily even the ludicrous may have its serious side, and if it were possible to reason with such soulless automatons as justice seems to delight to employ as her executive and detective power, we would try to infuse into them, under such circumstances, a little of this one quality—discrimination!

THE CAMBRIDGE INSTALLATION.

Forth from old Granta's College Halls
The tides of wisdom roll,
Their staid professors leave to-day
The cloisters of the soul:
The eye of learned philosophy
No more is stern and dun;
But like the eagle's, flings its glance
Full proudly on the sun!

They come—the venerable seers
Whom time has crowned with lore,
And wear the classic wreaths of years
Green laurels as of yore!
Beats a pulse within each breast,
Burns fire on each brow;
They cannot quell the pride to rest
That glows within them now!

It is their highest festival—
Their climax of renown;
A sort of glory circles them,
That will not brook a frown!
The pedant's sober soul is fled!
The scholar's joy is wild!
And old men feel such happiness,
As gushes on a child!

What impulse brings this golden joy,
So beautiful, so rare
What fine excitement drowns to-day,
The deep alloy of care?
Why is old Granta's silent life
So quickened into voice,
And what exultful passion bids
Her staidest sons rejoice?

The crown—the crown that worth must earn,
And wisdom must bestow;
The meed for which ambitions burn,
And noble spirits glow!
The honour for which some would die,
And all be proud to live;
This is old Granta's prize, and this She'll gloriously give!

To-day she tends her chancellor,
His guerdon of renown,
Makes him the king of all the fame,
To which a world bows down;
Instals him, to the wise and good,
The noble and the brave,
In such a worldly dignity,
As dies but in the grave!

Who come to see this festival?
Who come? a host in one!
The silver-haired old warrior duke,
Time-crested Wellington!
The soldier of the land, whose speed
Was most in glory's race,
To fold his heart, and sheath his sword
In learning's fond embrace!

Who come with him—the high, the grand,
The lofty and the low;
All shades, all ranks, all minds, all hearts,
Woo inspiration's glow!
The prince, the peer, the holy priest,
The statesman, prelate, judge—
All throng round Granta's throne, and none
Her gift of honour grudge!

Fling wide the gates of thought, for, lo,
Fair genius enters in;
And star-eyed poetry is there,
The sweetest of her kin!
And high ennobling strains break forth
From her angelic voice;
And fame is loud with her applause,
While raptured throngs rejoice!

Now music spreads its hallowed charm,
As from an angel's lute;
While ecstacy is wild and warm,
And wisdom still and mute!
Anon the feast, the song, the dance,
Come fleetly rushing by;
And learning quaffs to fond excess
The cup of luxury!

Why not? such recreation wins
Blame from no mortal tongue;
The pride that stimulates the old,
The love that crowns the young;
Both are the gems of life, and both
A warmth of soul impart,
That leaves sweet thoughts upon the brain,
And blessings in the heart!

INCREASE OF CRIME. On Saturday last there were no fewer than 820 prisoners in the House of Correction at Wakefield.—Sheffield Iris.

THE LATE FIRE IN BERMONDSEY.—As far as can be collected, the losses that will fall on the different insurance companies are as subjoined: British Fire-office, £2000; Phœnix, £1400; Sun, £2500; Royal Exchange, £1500; Globe, 500; Guardian, £500; Union, £300; County, £300: total, £15,000. During the confusion that prevailed upon the discovery of the fire, several daring depredations were committed by a gang of water-side thieves. They broke open several houses, and carried off with the greatest impunity, beds and furniture of all descriptions, under the pretence of assisting the sufferers. Unfortunately they have not yet been detected.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

COURT-MARTIAL, SHEERNESS.—A court-martial was held on board her Majesty's ship Camperdown on Friday, on Mr. James Bascombe, late master of the Larne, 18 guns, for alleged negligence of duties and incompetency—charges which have been brought against him by Captain P. T. Blake, of the Larne, which was paid off here on Monday.

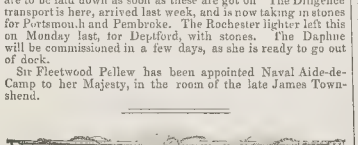
THE LATE GENERAL ELPHINSTONE. The late General William George Keith Elphinstone, C.B., was grandson of Charles, tenth Baron Elphinstone, and son of William Elphinstone, an East India Director, and previously commander of an Indiaman; he was brother-in-law of Vice-Admiral Sir Pulteney Malcolm, G.C.B.; was second cousin of the present Lord Elphinstone, and nephew of the celebrated Lord Keith. He had likewise a brother in the army, Lieut.-Colonel James Drummond Elphinstone. General Elphinstone served at Waterloo and Seringapatam.

ALBANY BARRACKS, ISLE OF WIGHT. The depot of the 20th Regiment marched into the barracks on Tuesday last. There are now there the depots of the 20th, 23rd, and 31st, and the full complement of the St. Helena Regiment, which is expected to embark in a few days.

The service companies of the 67th Regiment are under orders to return home from Canada. The 56th Regiment, from Canada, and the 69th and 76th Regiments, from Nova Scotia, will be home in a few weeks; the former, the 56th, from Quebec, may be expected to arrive at Cove, in the Resistance troop-ship, in the course of a few days.

CHATHAM. (From a Correspondent.)—It is intended to launch the Golian and Virago steamers on the 25th of this month. The greatest bustle and activity prevails. Workmen are constantly employed till after eight o'clock at night, in completing these vessels, as well as the Cumberland, a 70 gun ship. It is said that a number of steamers of large magnitude are to be laid down as soon as these are got off. The Diligence transport is here, arrived last week, and is now taking in stones for Portsmouth and Pembroke. The Rochester lighter left this on Monday last, for Deptford, with stones. The Daphne will be commissioned in a few days, as she is ready to go out of dock.

Sir Fleetwood Pellew has been appointed Naval Aide-de-Camp to her Majesty, in the room of the late James Townshend.



SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

ALEXANDRIA, June 20.—The British brig Ontario, Captain Smart, left this on the 17th for Falmouth, and on the morning of the 18th struck on a reef about 30 miles to the westward of the Arab's Tower, and became in the course of a few hours a total wreck. The captain and crew in consequence were obliged to take to their boats, and they arrived here this morning. Her cargo consists of bones. The Cyclops steams out to-morrow to see what can be recovered.

FALMOUTH, July 2. The royal mail-steamer Dee arrived here to-day at noon, and at once commenced filling up her coals and water, in preparation for starting to-morrow for the West Indies, with the usual mails. The Oriental Steam Company's ship Tagus received her coals and filled up water for her voyage to Gibraltar, Malta, and Alexandria. The Liverpool steamer arrived to-day, from Gibraltar, June 23, Cadiz 24, Lisbon 27, Oporto 28, Vigo 29. Mr. Witterburn, the mail inspector for this division, from Exeter, has been here some days awaiting the arrival of the Teviot mail steamer from the West Indies, to express on her bags, in case either of the mails is not about to start, and the hour of their arrival in London will be available for delivery. Passengers arrived by the Liverpool steamer—from Gibraltar, Messrs. Frampton and Ford—from Lisbon, Messrs. Alves, Faria, Emel, and Fellis—from Vigo, Mr. Sale.

The Duke of Rutland has purchased the schooner Resolution, now lying in Southampton-water, and his Grace and party intend to embark in her in a few days on a cruise in the Mediterranean.

THE LITTLE NILE STEAMER.—We have much pleasure in contradicting the rumour which has gone abroad respecting the alleged loss of this steamer off Cape Finisterre. Advices have been received from Gibraltar, which announce her arrival there the 17th ult. in perfect safety, and describe her as having made the passage out in the most satisfactory style. She is intended to ply up and down the Nile with passengers for India.

The mail-packet Giraffe arrived from Rotterdam on Sunday. Among her numerous passengers we observed Lord Athlone. The Rainbow, Capt. T. Fife, arrived on Monday morning at seven o'clock, from Antwerp, having had an excellent passage, and the passengers all delighted. The new ship, Princess Royal, occupied only forty-two hours each way in her passage from London to Edinburgh, and from Edinburgh to London.

On Tuesday last, at five o'clock, the royal mail steamer Acadia, commanded by Captain Ryrie, left Liverpool, and proceeded down the Mersey on her voyage to Halifax and Boston. She took out sixty passengers, including the lady of Sir Charles Bagot.

LAUNCH OF THE "PRINCE OF WALES."—This day (Saturday) at ten o'clock, a splendid ship will be launched at Blackwall. It is to be named after the heir-apparent. This noble vessel is above 1200 tons. Another, of like dimensions, will be launched at the end of the month, to be called "The Queen."

On Wednesday afternoon, at five o'clock, the Royal Victoria Leith steam-ship left the St. Katherine's-wharf, with 150 passengers on board, for Scotland, among whom were General Johnson, and several other members of parliament, exchanging the heated and close atmosphere of St. Stephen's for the more bracing air of the north.

HARWICH, July 5.—The Good Design, Senhouse, from Konigsberg to London, which sank on the Middle Sand, on the 30th ult., has been raised and brought in here a derelict, with loss of foremast, &c.

QUARANTINE REGULATIONS.—CADIZ, June 24.—Vessels arriving from places under the French dominion, will be admitted from pratique, if they have no susceptible goods on board, and their bills of health be endorsed by the Spanish Consul.

MARGATE, July 5.—The ship Herefordshire, from Calcutta the 12th of February; Madras, 4th of March; Cape of Good Hope, 27th of April; St. Helena, 16th of May, landed mails and despatches for the East India Company, with the following passengers, this afternoon:—Colonel Holbrook, Capt. Wilson, Messrs. Campbell, Maclean, &c., &c.

BLOWING UP A WRECK.—Within the last three or four days several attempts have been made, under the direction of Captain Fisher, the harbour-master, to blow up the wreck of a vessel sunk in the Thames, off Northfleet, but at present very little good has been effected. The wreck is that of a collier, a bark named the Vesper, and at low watermark part of her bows is visible. The owners having deserted her, the city authorities determined to remove the wreck by blowing it up. Several charges, varying from 20lb. to 60lb., have been fired in the wreck, without producing the least effect. However, in the course of a few days, a much heavier charge will be tried, and hopes are entertained of its complete success. Great precautions are taken to prevent accidents.

It is reported that the Hindoo was "libelled and duly seized," immediately after her arrival at New York, for carrying more emigrants than are allowed by the immigration laws of the United States. The passengers above the number are stated to be ninety; the penalty is 150 dollars per head for the first nineteen supernumeraries; but if these amount to twenty, the vessel is forfeited.—Carnarvon Herald.

RAMSGATE, July 4.—The Johannes Ottilie, Van Wyk, from Amsterdam to Nantes, was abandoned in a sinking state on the 2nd inst., about five leagues from the Galloper; crew saved.

POSTSCRIPT.

Friday Morning.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert, with the Prince of Wales and Princess Royal, took airings in the garden of Buckingham Palace on Thursday.

Their Serene Highnesses Prince and Princess of Saxe Coburg Gotha landed at Woolwich yesterday morning from Ostend. Their Serene Highnesses arrived at Buckingham Palace, on a visit to her Majesty, at half-past twelve o'clock.

Their Majesties the King and Queen of the Belgians arrived at Ostend at eight o'clock on Tuesday evening. The passage, although occupying only twelve hours, was exceedingly stormy; and their Majesties appeared to have suffered from it.

A meeting of some of the cabinet ministers took place on Thursday afternoon at the office of the Board of Trade. Sir R. Peel, the Duke of Wellington, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer attended.

Mr. Wickham, Chairman of the Stamps and Taxes, had an interview with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on Thursday, at his official residence in Downing street.

COMMON COUNCIL.—At a court held on Thursday, the Income-tax Commissioners were appointed. The subject of the ventilation of the city courts of law was referred to the committee; and the motion for £500 for the relief of the families of those who have suffered by the massacre in Affghanistan was adjourned until the arrival of more information by the next overland mail

LIGHT GOLD.—The following notice was posted at the Bank of England on Monday morning:—"The public are informed, that as the Rotunda will be required for the payment of dividends, no further amounts of light gold can be received in that office after the 6th inst.; but the receipt of amounts from £20 to £80 will be resumed at the earliest possible period. The Bank will continue to receive amounts from £80 to £500 in the Hall, and from £500 and upwards, either in the Bullion-office, or the late Post-bill-office, until further notice. N.B. The hours for receiving light gold are from ten o'clock till three."

The Bank of England has decided that all sovereigns on the balance shall be taken as of legal weight.—The new silver coinage is to be issued to-day, large supplies having been received from the Mint.

OLD BAILEY. Nicholas Suisse, the valet of the late Marquis of Hertford, was tried for embezzlement and larceny, on Wednesday and Thursday; and, after a protracted trial, was acquitted of the first charge. Several other indictments remain to be tried; but, in consequence of the absence of a material witness, they are postponed till the 24th of August.

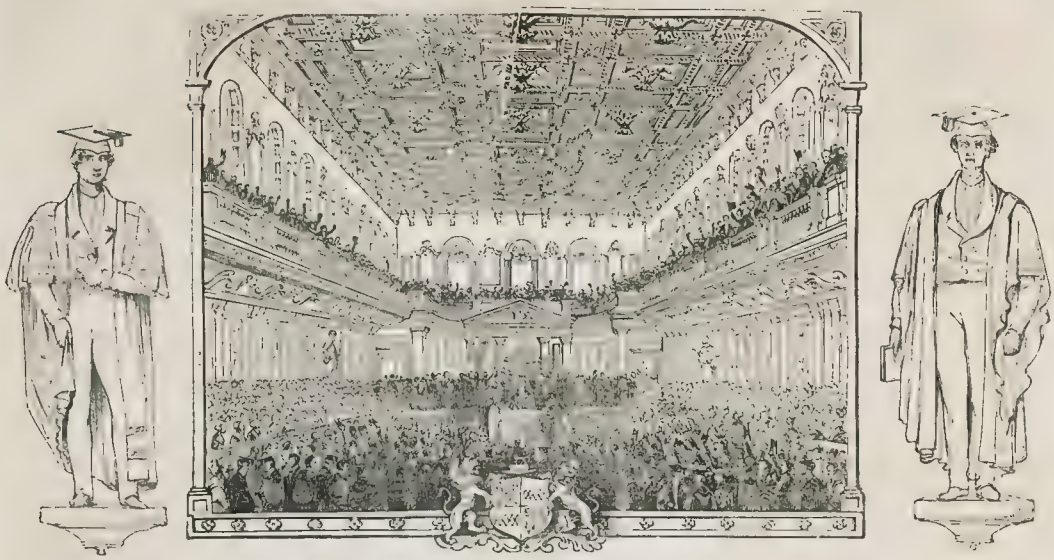
MARYLEBONE. Ellen Kelly was placed at the bar, charged with begging at several houses, when she told a most piteous story, and that she had not partaken of a morsel of food for more than three days. She was taken to the station, and, on being searched, nearly 13s. in money was found in her possession, together with a quantity of meat, bread, &c. Mr. Rawlinson told the prisoner she was a most wicked impostor, and that such persons as she did an infinite deal of mischief. She was committed to the House of Correction for a month.

FRANCE.—The French ministerial papers continue to publish, for the amusement of their readers, the enormous absurdities which are ushered into the world on the eve of the general election, as the addresses and confessions of the opposition. The burden of these patriotic diatribes, is "the consummation of the ruin of France," and "the yoke of the stranger." They also contain a long list of editors, sub-editors, and others connected with the press, as candidates in the election.—Of other news there is none, there is none of the least interest.

SPAIN.—The celebrated Carlist chief, Felip, has fallen into the hands of the Queen's troops. As a heavy price has long been laid on his head, he will doubtless be immediately shot. It was expected that the prorogation of the Cortes would take place the middle or end of the month. A Cadiz journal announces that the plague, or what is more properly called the bubo distemper, had manifested itself in Portugal. The Sanatory Junta of Seville had consequently adopted measures to prevent the contagion from extending to that city.

PORTUGAL. LISBON, JUNE 27. The scrutiny of the elections for Estremadura has this moment concluded, and the result is, that the Government has been defeated by a large majority, there being 16 of the coalition and only 6 of the Government candidates returned. This result is most perilous, and may prove fatal to the existing administration. Everything is quiet, but the enthusiasm of the Opposition is extreme.

THE INSTALLATION OF THE CHANCELLOR OF CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY



INSTALLATION ODE.—THE SENATE HOUSE.

It is one of the advantages of a journal like the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, that it is enabled, irrespective of political influences, and uncontaminated by party spirit—in a word, with truth, and without bias—to present to its readers pictorial records of all the high festivals of the nation. In doing this it is merely the illustrator of the history of the time; it does not seek to embody its own opinions among the details of events which the daily press pours forth, nor to tinge with the colour of party any of the circumstances of these great celebrations. It is therefore that in compiling the account of the Grand Cambridge Installation, which we now present in all its splendour, from its auspicious commencement up to the period of its brilliant close, we have sought to make its reflex perfect by selecting from the diurnal reports those passages of description which were most graphic in their character, most vivid in their spirit, most eloquent in their tone and language, and most faithful in their detail; and to these we have added such accessories of the ceremony as its festive, its literary, and its musical character have developed during the week.

It is impossible to deny that by men of all opinions those great university festivals must be regarded with high interest, if not with the same amount of enthusiasm and admiration. They cannot be looked upon as otherwise than national. The purpose of installing into the dignity of chancellor of one of the first seats of learning in the land, a nobleman selected for his rank, influence, accomplishments, or worth, to preside over a thousand destinies, to direct the channels of education, to promote the growth of human intelligence, to foster religion, and maintain genius upon her throne, is, in itself, a high and ennobling one. But it is only the keystone to the greatness of the whole ceremonial. We must remember that at that installation are congregated the rank, the learning, the nobility of the empire. Grave scholars and philosophers emerge from their solemn colleges to meet the statesmen, and warriors, and judges of the land, and in their train they bring with them young ambitious aspirants to the same order of human eminence—the embryo statesmen, and warriors, and judges of a future time. The honours of learning too are distributed to those who have earned them in the world, degrees and titles crown the labourers for civilization and the wealthy in classic lore. The rising students plunge into the tide of emulation—genius makes her enterprise, and the rewards of excellence are given amid the exulting cheers of thousands of congratulatory admirers and friends. Poetry wakes her inspiration, and sheds her brightest influences over the scene—Philosophy wisely approves it—Religion has a cheerful smile for it—Music folds around it her beautiful mantle of harmony—and in its enlivening spirit all the Charities and all the Arts rejoice. Moreover, it takes many forms of grace and grandeur. Now it is hallowed by a religious solemnity—now rendered imposing by a senatorial display—now it is the pride of learning—now the rich pomp of a boastful pageantry. Here it is warmed by the enthusiasm of political aspiration—there hallowed by the presence of genius pouring out amid the silence of multitudes its sweet and solitary voice. Now it is glorious with wisdom, and now loud with revelry, and wild with the gaiety of childhood's life. Now its whole spirit is stored and eloquent with lore of ages—and now it is away on ethin pinions to the halls of music and the dance. Nor is the festive forgotten—the luxuries of the age for once gave a zest to its learning, and the convivialities of friendship pour warmth and socialities into the academic heart. In all aspects it is pleasing in most exhilarating, in some sublime. It is just one of those celebrations when a people should take pleasure and pride in, and which should make the soul of our glorious old England rejoice.

On Saturday last the interesting ceremony of installing the Duke of Northumberland into the office of Chancellor of the University of Cambridge, to which he was elected on the death of the Marquis Camden, commenced. Great numbers of the clergy from various parts of the kingdom took this occasion to revisit alma mater; those who arrived on Saturday were nearly all accommodated in the various colleges, so that there were plenty of lodgings for disposal at very moderate prices. His grace the chancellor arrived Saturday after noon about four o'clock, without any procession, and in a very unostentatious manner, and took up his residence at St. John's College, where the same rooms he occupied when a student were prepared for him. The vice-chancellor and many heads of colleges paid their respects to the chancellor immediately after his arrival.

On Saturday morning the Bishop of Winchester preached for the benefit of Addenbrooke's Hospital. After this some degrees were conferred in the senate-house, and in the evening there was a concert in St. Mary's Church, which was attended by a fashionable, though not a very numerous, audience, including the Duchess of Northumberland and most of the nobility who had arrived. The concert was under the able management of Professor Walmisley, of the University, and the principal vocal performers were Madame Caradori Allan, Miss Birch, Miss Birch, Mr. Phillips, Mr. Machin, &c. It consisted of various selected pieces, chiefly from the "Requiem," by Mozart; Handel's "Samson," a prize anthem, by Professor Walmisley, and the 42nd psalm, by Mendelssohn,the whole of which, with the choruses, which are got up with great care, passed off with much éclat.

A considerable portion of the distinguished visitors, by whose presence the University was honoured on this occasion, arrived in the course of Saturday. His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge and suite were the guests of Dr. Proctor, the Master of Catherine Hall. His grace the Duke of Northumberland, in whose honour the festival was given, stayed, with the Duchess and other members of the family, at St. John's College, where the Duke of Buccleuch was also on a visit. Lord Lyndhurst and family were the guests of Dr. French, the Master of Jesus College. The Archbishop of Canterbury was on a visit to Emmanuel College, the master of which, Dr. Archdall, is the Vice-Chancellor of the University for the present year. The Bishop of London was at Trinity College, and almost every other in Cambridge had its batch of visitors of distinction, and contributed its daily share towards the entertainment of some portion of the company sojourning at this ancient seat of learning and good living.

On the occurrence of such events as the present it is the custom for the different members of the University to appear in their full dress robes, and as parties of them were seen promenading in the different walks, and in the beautiful and picturesque grounds of the various colleges and halls, the coup d'œil was occasionally peculiarly striking. Another telling feature, and perhaps the most ornamental one of all, was the noble assemblage of British beauty concentrated in Cambridge on the occasion.

The dawn of Sunday might be almost said to have been the commencement of a scarcely uninterrupted series of religious services in the churches and chapels of the University and the town; nor did the thousands of visitors fail eagerly to avail themselves of the opportunities thus afforded either of enjoying "the pealing anthem and the solemn chant," or of participating in the high intellectual gratification of hearing preachers such as the Master of Trinity and the Bishop of London. Every sacred edifice was crowded; imagination could not find a finer feast than while, in a building so sublime in its beauty as King's College Chapel, the eye and ear were alike impressed with unutterable feelings of the beautiful and the grand—

> "What time through massive arches towering high,
> Loud anthems pour their storm of melody,
> Or blent at vespers with the chanted prayer
> That floats around and fills the charmed air."

The rush to St. Mary's was prodigious to hear Mr. Whewell in the morning, about half the church being filled with university men, and all parts densely, nearly dangerously, crowded, for about a couple of hours ere the university authorities and their distinguished guests arrived. At 11 o'clock his grace the Chancellor, accompanied by the Vice-chancellor, the High Steward, the Duke of Cambridge, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Archbishop of Armagh, the Bishops of London and Winchester, several peers, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir R. Inglis, the heads of houses, &c., took their seats in the "Throne" (i. e., the lofty front gallery), and surely never did an audience assemble more eminent for learning, for talent, and for dignity.

At the close of his sermon the preacher read the customary commemoration of benefactors to the University, commencing with "Sigebert" and the Saxons; and comprising the long roll of regal founders or donors, from Alfred downwards, including also many of the most celebrated men ever produced in this country, such as Cecil, Lord Burghleigh, Lord Bacon, and Lord Hardwicke.

In the afternoon, when the same eminent personages were present, and the audience was, it possible, more densely crowded, the Bishop of London preached.

Nothing could exceed the deep attention manifested to both these discourses.

On Monday morning hundreds of horsemen, and numerous carriages, went out "two miles" towards Lord Delaware's seat, to meet and escort the Duke of Wellington, who on his arrival was greeted with the most deafening demonstrations of affectionate veneration, which were continued along the whole line of road (presenting as it did one mass of delighted spectators) passing in the rear of the lovely college grounds, while cannon salutes were fired, and music played, and bells rang cheerfully: thus, amidst the waving of innumbered laurel branches, and of handkerchiefs from fair hands at every window, he passed—thus did the venerable veteran enter Cambridge; and the enthusiasm of his reception was continued during the whole period of his stay. There seemed a general feeling, to which many gave utterance, that at his advanced age, healthy as he yet appears, it may be that this would prove the last of his visits (at least on so distinguished an occasion) to the University; and no bounds were given to the enthusiastic admiration of all classes, from the highest to the lowest.

His grace, who repeatedly bowed in answer to the plaudits of the enthusiastic multitude, was drawn to the gates of St. John's College, where he alighted, and immediately proceeded to attend the levee, which the Duke of Northumberland (the Chancellor of the University) was holding in that college.

The levee of the chancellor was an exceedingly brilliant one, and was not concluded until nearly twelve o'clock.

The senate-house, which had been opened for an hour or two previously, and was nearly full of eager expectants, within a few minutes of the Duke's arrival became densely crowded, and speedily presented the most imposing appearance. The dark masses of the graduates below, and of the undergraduates above, relieved by the brilliant dresses of the hundreds of ladies who occupied the raised seats, and the varied costumes of the university authorities on the platform, all formed a very beautiful and interesting picture. The patience of the vast multitude was destined to be most grievously taxed; for a whole hour they had to wait for the duke's entrance. The undergraduates, who were most dreadfully crowded, were so uneasy that they began to be noisy; but a judicious exhortation from the vice-chancellor restrained them. However, towards the end of the hour they relieved themselves by exercising their usual privilege of cheering most enthusiastically certain approved names. "The Queen" was again and again responded to with deafening thunders of applause. At length the cheering of the crowd without gave signal of the duke's approach. All were instantly still, in silence perfectly unbroken; the vice-chancellor walked down the avenue promptly formed for him in the densely-packed crowd of graduates, followed by the heads of houses, &c., to meet the great guest at the door. The moment they re-appeared, preceding the three dukes, there broke forth the most thundering cheers that could be excited by the deepest enthusiasm, till the noble building seemed positively to tremble. The duke was accompanied by the Duke of Cambridge and all the illustrious individuals we have named, along with the Duke of Buccleuch, Sir D. Brewster, Professors Sedgwick and Buckland, &c.

THE VASE ON THE LAWN OF THE SENATE-HOUSE.

On the platform were also a number of distinguished ladies, including the Duchess of Northumberland, Countess of Jersey, Lady Lyndhurst, &c.

When the Chancellor had taken the chair, on his right being the Duke of Cambridge, and on his left the Chancellor of Oxford and the Chancellor of England, there ensued a tedious interval of a couple of hours, which was occupied by unintelligible academical formalities connected with the conferring of honorary degrees.

The Duke of Cambridge at length went out, and returned in the scarlet robes of D.C.L., resuming his seat amidst very cordial cheering.

The public orator pronounced an elaborate complimentary composition in Latin, the elegance of which was exceedingly applauded, particularly the parts referring to the Duke and Lord Lyndhurst.

Through the remainder of the day the congregated thousands were enjoying the luxury of walking through the noble college grounds, forming together, as they do, at the back of the buildings, a beautiful succession of pleasing promenades; nor could the company easily be wearied of surveying those magnificent masses of architecture, half palatial, half cathedral in appearance, environed by the most enchanting scenes that ever linked the loveliness of nature with the attractions of art.

> "Umbra semis veneranda vale, dum flumine Camus > Lambit arquiines hac captus dulcedine turres"
> ("Where willowy Camus lingers with delight"—Gray.)
> "Scilicet hic primum meditans tentabitur carmen
> Dulcesonum lusit juvenilior optimus ille (Milton.)
> Cui dedit augustos natura excedere fines
> Non unquanda annui prætentus quisque (Gray) juventæ
> Delicas, ludesque breves, tegue, alma poesi,
> Fida lyre docuit resonare.
> Eia! adilta templa (Fitzwilliam Museum)
> Sperat castalium saxi sub imagine turba
> Cognata spirant artes."

The beauty of these college scenes, indeed, were enough to imbue the least classic mind with something of fondness for an academic life: the memories of those illustrious men who from the earliest times have received from the universities the germ of the greatness which subsequently shed lustre on their country, must have some charm for those least sensible to such associations. At night one, indeed, might "idly dream"—

> "——— That o'er you azure array
> The deathless spirits that have passed away;
> At least, in converse high, the mighty dead
> O'er the rapt soul their mystic influence shed,
> While fancy deems that Newton's radiant eye
> Is coldly piercing from the deep blue sky."

And while in those noble halls, which are hallowed by so many recollections,

> "We almost feel their influence o'er the soul
> Hark, through the massive pile deep voices roll!
> The air ye breathe, the very ground ye tread,
> Is monumental of the mighty dead!"

Nor could one avoid imagining something of those different feelings which must have animated the breasts of those who wandered pleasurably through those quadrangles and those grounds,

> "Where youthful faces and new forms are seen,
> Mixed with the older tenants of the scene."

One cannot help fancying the anticipations of the young student:—

> "Oh, who may tell what feelings undefined,
> What high misgivings fill the youthful mind,
> As fondly gazing with young hope around,
> Ornate, he treads at length the classic ground!"

And as to those who, from the proud eminences to which their talents have elevated them, look down upon a half century of retrospect, it is natural to imagine what must be their reminiscences of the past:—

> "Sadly the sire recals youth's joyous day,
> And each bright dream that long hath passed away."

It will be seen that some of the feelings delineated in these (not perhaps inappropriate) extracts from the two last prize poems (the Latin by H. M. Birch, of King's, the English by S. C. Conybeare, of Peter's), were expressed by one of the university's highest dignitaries in a spirit responded to by all present at the grand entertainment given this same evening by the vice-chancellor at Emmanuel-lodge. There never could have been a more attractive, and hardly a more illustrious assemblage, than of those eminent men who met on that occasion; comprising all the nobility in Cambridge, all the heads of houses, various peers (in addition to those we have named already), as the Marquis of Northampton, Lord Delaware, &c., and several members of the House of Commons, as Mr. Law, Mr. Milnes, together with many distinguished visitors from the sister university. The brilliant company—all academically attired—were, for about an hour, assembled on the lawn of the quadrangle, and the public were, to their great gratification, admitted meantime to the surrounding walks, the main attraction being, of course, the veteran duke who, however, after walking about and conversing with his usual simplicity and good-nature, went post to London before the entertainment commenced. It was no ordinarily pleasing sight, this assembly of men most eminent in every profession, and in every rank of life, with the most celebrated in every department of science and every branch of learning—warriors, princes, senators, judges, professors—enjoying the delights of a meeting which must have been one of unmingled and exalted gratification. Of course, the banquet being a private one, nothing like a report of speeches could be expected; but we have learned subsequently that the vice-chancellor, in very appropriate terms, proposed the health of the chancellor. His grace expressed himself, in return, most warmly sensible of the extreme delight he experienced on the occasion of such a meeting, and proposed the health of the vice-chancellor, who then, with great cordiality and many expressions of the highest esteem and regard, gave "The health of the Lord Steward!" and his lordship's speech in reply was described as one of the most eloquent ever delivered. He adverted, with strong emotion, to the sensations he experienced on his entrance into Cambridge; and in picturing the overpowering recollections that rushed upon his mind, his voice faltered, and his utterance betokened the deepest feeling. Nor did the chord he struck fail to vibrate powerfully in every heart; and the admiration expressed by that distinguished company was heightened into enthusiasm at the remembrance of that brilliant career and those surpassing talents to which the vice-chancellor had with great felicity adverted. His lordship also alluded to his election as steward, and expressed his deep gratitude for the voluntary kindness which had chosen him, when absent, to so exalted an office in the university where, forty years ago, he had received his education.

The Archbishop of Canterbury, referring to the great benefits conferred on the church by the universities, expressed his gratification at the thorough harmony subsisting between Cambridge and her venerable sister, and observed, in reference to the two London establishments, that the more learning was diffused, the more would be appreciated the sound and salutary instruction of the universities.

During the evening, thousands were again enjoying the calm summer evening in the delightful college grounds; the more select attending a grand concert in the senate-house, which presented a very brilliant appearance, and in which a high musical treat was provided by Professor Walmisley.

Tuesday commenced with the same eager rushing to the senate-house. So early as soon after eight o'clock ladies were going thitherwards; immense crowds were assembled round the doors an hour before opening, and very soon after that the vast edifice was completely crowded, there being at least 500 adies on the raised side seats; the graduates thronging the area below, the undergraduates the gallery above, and the "dons," doctors, heads of houses, noblemen, and ladies of rank, giving a very picturesque appearance to the platform.

His grace the chancellor entered the hall amidst the most enthusiastic cheering, attended by all the distinguished guests of the university who had attended the preceding day, except the duke and Lord Lyndhurst. An hour of tedious "doctor-making" then took place; after which the patient sufferers of four or five hours' intolerable expectancy were rewarded by the recitation of the prizes. Mr. H. J. Summer Mayne, scholar of Pembroke, who carried away no less than three prizes, read an English poem on the birth of the Prince of Wales, which obtained the chancellor's medal, whence we have pleasure in extracting some beautiful lines:—

> "Give him to gain the steep, and deep below
> Behold the swelling fount of knowledge flow,
> Wake every faculty, as early dew
> Makes unborn germs to struggle into view:
> Then shall ye bless, when all your task is done,
> His royal mother with a royal son.
> Then, gentle architects, your work shall stand,
> The strong supporting pillars of the land."

The poem, which was well read, elicited the most cordial and general applause, which was renewed when the young scholar walked up the hall and received the well-merited medal from the chancellor.

Similar applause attended the recitation of the Latin poem

> "Cæsar ad Rubiconem constit," and the Latin ode,

> "Navis ornata atque armata in aquam deducitur," both by Mr. Mayne.

The recitations of the Greek ode (Clarke, Trinity), of the Person poem, and of the Greek epigram (Druse), were much applauded.

Then came the Installation ode, by the Rev. T. Whytehead, M.A., and Fellow of St. John's, set to music by Professor Walmisley, M.A., Trinity. It was admirably performed, and the music was excellent. It opened with a chorus,

> "Fling the gates of music wide
> Pour forth in one triumphant tide
> The gathering burst from every side
> Of joy and gratulation and exulting pride."

The next stanza was a tenor recitative by Hobbs; the music accompanying the lines—

> "The river, as he stealeth by
> With soft pace and silently
> Lingering to listen to the chanted psalm,
> Duly from the chapel borne,
> Hears another strain this morn,
> And wonders at the unwonted minstrelsy."

was very expressive of the pealing organ and the swelling anthem. Another air—

> "Strangely the voice of music falls, > Startling these unworldly halls," and a scena—

> "But, Granta, at thy own command,"

(Phillips), and the chorus (addressed to the chancellor)—

> "Wear the wreath thy worth hath won thee," were well given. Miss Birch had a lovely air to noble words—

> "Names of old renown are these," alluding to the former chancellors; and Madame Caradori Allan one yet more magnificent

> "Granta, while gazing on that lordly line,
> What more than mother's joy is thine,
> To see how England's noblest ones,
> Glorying to be called thy sons,
> Have vied thy glorious wreath around their brows to twine."

This was sung with splendid effect, and was received with immense applause, as was also the concluding air of the same talented lady—

> "Here let Plato's holy chorus
> Still find another listening Academe,
> While from religion's ancient altar
> The soaring flames that never falter
> Far o'er the illumined land with steady radiance gleam."

Loud and long-continued cheering followed the close of the performance, and then arose a general call for the national anthem. [We should state that the intelligence of the third atrocious attempt on the Queen's life was received in town and university with the greatest indignation and sorrow.] The cry was cheerfully responded to by Madame Caradori Allan, Miss Birch, Miss Hawes, and Messrs Phillips and Hobbs. The anthem was sung with fine force and effect, and with prodigious cheering from the immense audience, all uprising and joining heartily—princes, dukes, lords, bishops, doctors, bachelors, masters, undergraduates, visitors, ladies, and all, in the choruses, especially the extra verse (now, unhappily, for the third time applicable), referring to the "assassin's blow."

Perhaps the most fascinating feature of the festival was, after all, the splendid fête at St. John's. There could not have been less than a thousand persons present. This may give an idea of the extent of the entertainment; while, as to its character, it may be imagined from the extreme exclusiveness which, notwithstanding that vast extent, was necessarily exercised in order to restrain the company within somewhat manageable limits, a ticket was the object of all-absorbing anxiety: many came from great distances mainly to enjoy this splendid treat, and numbers were disappointed, only to be consoled by finding that men more eminent by far than themselves were equally unsuccessful. As it was, the vast company had to partake of the elegant and plentiful cold collation in several parties of upwards of 300 each, such being the utmost capability of the spacious pavilion erected in the magnificent quadrangle of the new buildings. Every thing that could contribute to pleasurable feelings was enlisted in the entertainment.

The company comprised the élite of this, and many eminent visitors from the sister University. These were assembled in the lovely lawns of the college grounds, under a sky of cloudless clearness, amid scenery of exquisite beauty; the eye delighted now by views of magnificent architecture—now by glorious foliage pictures, on which opened many a vista of half magical charm through venerable groves, whose very air seemed solemn in its deep quietude—the willowy river gliding noiselessly along between banks of greenest verdure, on which grew flowers that lent liberally their fragrance to the air—the sun, which shone, though cheerfully, not too hotly, gleaming silvery illuminations on the stream—the coloured reflections of the company, grouped on the overhanging bridges, or walking along the river's margin, giving liveliness and animation to the calm water itself the breezes that were waving the trees into gentle music, loaded with richest perfumes from the hundred beds of flowers scattered all around; the eye attracted by the landscape loveliness of the scenery, or the picturesque appearance of the assembly, mingling together the scarlet-robed doctor, the dark-gowned bachelors and masters, the graceful figures of the ladies, and the military-looking dresses of the courtly guests—the ear, at the same time, regaled with choicest melodies, which seemed to linger in the air as if magic horns were sounded upon enchanted ground.

Among the company all was lively delight and gaiety. Under such fascinating circumstances, there could hardly have been more pleasurably blended the attractions of intellect—of rank—of beauty. There was the noble chancellor, pleasingly combining urbanity with dignity; and the royal duke, cheerful and chatung, the very beau ideal of a good-natured prince. There were prelates as eminent as Canterbury, London, Armagh, and Winchester; noblemen as distinguished as the Duke of Buccleuch, the Marquises of Northampton, Exeter, and Ormond; along with Earls Powis, Bandon, Ross, Beverley, and Nelson; Viscounts Clare and Fielding; Lords Strangford, Prudhoe, E. Bruce, Loftus, Ossulston, Clive, and a whole host of other eminent personages.

At the collations, the choicest wines flowed like water; and the spirits of the brilliant assemblage, which needed not indeed such artificial excitements, flagged not, nor wearied of enjoyment, till the evening stars began to shine in the beautiful blue firmament, and the cool fresh breezes, loaded with half-aromatic odours, accompanied the twilight shades.

Most of the company then proceeded to the grounds of Jesus College, and lovely as they were by day, there was an exquisite charm in the deep repose—the solemn stillness—the dim beauty of venerable groves surrounding the grand old buildings, amidst flower-gardens whose scents yet enriched the refreshing breeze of night. The pale moonlight, however, that so beautifully illumined those antique towers, was obscured by the brilliancy of splendid displays of fire-works, startling the ancient halls of Granta with most unacademic noise, but immeasurably delighting the vast multitude beholding them.

The professor of music had provided another grand concert at the senate-house, which was not so well attended as from the excellence of the performances might have been expected.

On Wednesday morning Professor Walmisley presided at a grand performance of the Messiah at Great St. Mary's Church; and the opportunity thus afforded of hearing that sublime composition was thoroughly appreciated by an immense multitude who thronged the edifice, and were highly gratified.

The numbers of eminent personages in Cambridge may be inferred from the fact, that the large body of 1000 or 1200 guests at the fête of John's, were but selections from the general body of visiters—selections, among which numerous very distinguished individuals endeavoured unsuccessfully to be included.

In all parts of the town private gaiety corresponded with public festivities. From the earliest hour the college gardens and the public buildings were ceaselessly admired.

Thursday.—The dinner at Trinity College on Wednesday was a truly magnificent affair. The company assembled at five o'clock, and dispersed at about ten o'clock, after one of the most splendid entertainments ever given within the walls of old Trinity.

By the time that the party at Trinity broke up, the rooms of that magnificent building—the Fitzwilliam museum—began to fill for the ball, to be given for the benefit of Addenbrooke Hospital, near to which it is situated. This building is by far the handsomest object of modern architecture in Cambridge. Dancing commenced at about ten o'clock in the evening, and continued almost without intermission until six the next morning, soon after which the last of the company departed.

On Thursday there was a promenade in the rooms for those who chose to pay 2s. 6d. each, to view the scene of the previous night's festivity, and this was taken advantage of by many hundreds of the town's people and persons from the surrounding villages.

Thus closed the festivities consequent on the installation of his Grace the Duke of Northumberland.

THE UNIVERSITIES.

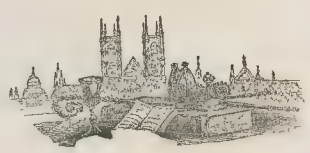
Oxford, July 2.—At the annual election at Exeter College, on Thursday last, there were no less than five vacancies. The following gentlemen were chosen:—The Rev. Matthew Anstis, of Exeter College; R. C. Powles, Scholar, Exeter; G. Butler, Scholar, Exeter; J. E Froud, Oriel; and F. Fanshawe, Scholar. Balliol.

Messrs, Austen, R. W. Gilbert, and E. V. L. Houlton, have been admitted actual Fellows of St. John's College, as founder's kindred; and Messrs. T. Podmore and C. Cookson, as Probationary Fellows.

Mr. E. J. Smith, from Bromgrove School, has been elected a Scholar of Worcester College.

The Rev. Charles Thomas Whitley, M.A., and the Rev. Edward Massie, M.A., were nominated by the Warden, on the part of the Dean and Chapter, to the office of Proctor for the ensuing year.

University College, London.—On Saturday the annual meeting of the council and professors took place, for the purpose of distributing prizes to the youths who had distinguished themselves in the faculty of arts. Lord John Russell took the chair amid general applause. There was an unusally numerous attendance of ladies and gentlemen, who were anxious to hear and see a nobleman whose name has long been associated with the progress of education on the principle of freedom of conscience. His lordship, in presenting the prizes, congratulated the deserving alumni in a very cordial manner; but it was painful to observe that some of the victors had injured their health by the severity of their studies.



THE CHURCH.

For some time past measures have been in progress for establishing bishoprics at Gibraltar and Tasmania (Van Dieman s Laud), and we have now the satisfaction of stating that the Rev. F. R. Nixon, one of the six preachers of Canterbury Cathedral has been appointed to the see of Tasmania. The salary is £1000 per annum.

The Rev. Thomas Parry, M.A., late Fellow of Balliol College, Oxford, has been appointed to the bishopric of Barbadoes.

The Rev. J. Davies, M.A., has been appointed Bishop of Antigua.

The Rev. Wm. Piercy Austin, M.A., has been appointed to the bishopric of Guiana.

The Marquis of Hertford has been pleased to appoint the Rev. John Maynard, M.A., Curate of Dursley, Gloucestershire, to be one of his Lordship's domestic chaplains.

The joint Livings of Stanground and Farcet, vacant by the death of the Rev. H. W. Smithies, have been presented by the Masters and Fellows of Emanuel College, to the Rev. Robert Cory, B.D., Senior Fellow of that society.

The Archbishop of Canterbury has been pleased to appoint the Rev. Dr. John Griffiths, Prebendary of Rochester, to the rural deanery of Sutton, vacant by the resignation of the Rev. P. Le Geyt, M.A.

The Rev. James Kendall, M.A., has been instituted to the Rectory of Lantiglor, by Fawey, in the diocese of Exeter, on the presentation of James Kendall, Esq.. of Helston.

Ordinations will be holden next Sunday, by the Bishop of Durham, at Durham; by the Bishop of Winchester, at Farnham; and by the Bishop of Worcester, at Worcester. On the Sunday following the Bishop of Hereford will hold an ordination for the diocese of Lichfield. It may be well to state that the examination of candidates will not be held at Eccles Hall, as stated by some of the church papers, but at Hereford, by the Bishop of Lichfield's chaplain, on the Thursday and Friday preceding the ordination.

The total annual cost of the ecclesiastical establishment in the West Indies is £30,300; and the aggregate amount, since the passing of the act 6th George IV., £311,261.

Obituary.—At Stoke, near Colsterworth, aged 65, the Rev. Henry Taylor, Rector of that parish, and Vicar of Ashley, near Partney, in the county of Lincoln. The Rev. John Ball, Incumbent of Carleton Rhode, Norfolk. At Wrington, Somerset at an advanced age, the Rev. Edward Spencer, M.A., Rector. The Rev. John Beales, 32 years Rector of Helperton, Wilts. At Worcester, the Rev. Edward Green, M.A., Rector of Burford, Salop, and of Edwin Ralph, Hereford.

PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS.

Licensed Victualler's Asylum.—On Tuesday, the half-yearly meeting of the donors of this charity was held at the Bridge House Hotel, London-bridge, Mr. Larby in the chair. From the report it appeared that at the anniversary dinner on the 10th of May, £1490 was collected, including £105 from Mr. Lettsom Elliott, the chairman, who contributes twenty guineas annually, which was also done by many other brewers; and, with a view to increase the funds of the institution, a fancy fair is to be held in the grounds of the Asylum, on Monday and Tuesday next. At present there were four houses vacant out of the 101; and the inmates of the asylum were 130. A new trustee was elected in the place of Mr. W. M. Davis, and the meeting separated.

South Sea House.—On Tuesday a quarterly General Court of proprietors of South Sea stock was held at the company's house, in Threadneedle-street, to consider a dividend, &c.; Mr. Charles Franks, the sub-governor, in the chair. The minutes of the last court having been read and confirmed, the Chairman moved that the dividend for the half-year be one and three quarters per cent., and stated that the warrants would be payable on the same day with the government annuities.

The motion was unanimously agreed to. The Chairman said, in obedience to a request made on a former day, that the proprietors should be informed of the amounts of the guarantee fund at the quarterly meetings, he had to state that the present amount of the guarantee fund was £348,856 9s. 1d. in the Three per Cents.

KING'S COLLEGE.—On Saturday, Sir Robert Inglis distributed the prizes at King's College School, with appropriate addresses to each boy on receiving them. He expressed particular satisfaction to Mr. Wilson with the manner in which he had delivered his recitations from Shakspere, and highly complimented Mr. Barry on having received so many prizes. He bestowed similar commendations on Mr. Capper and Mr. Stephen, and several others, especially approving the poetic feeling and style of Stephen's lines on the Royal Baptism, and the truth of Fineham's delivery of Milton.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH—MONDAY.

(Sittings at Guildhall, before Mr. Justice Wightman and a Special Jury.)

THE QUEEN V. BOYD.

Mr. Platt, Mr Sergeant Shee, Mr. E. James, and Mr. Lush appeared for the prosecution, and Mr Andrews and Mr Barstow, for the defendant.

This was an indictment in which the defendant was charged with having committed perjury in several answers which he had given before the commissioners of bankrupts on the occasion of his examination under a fiat of bankruptcy issued against a person named Carson. There were certain goods in the house of the defendant which were claimed by the assignees of the bankrupt; but the defendant stated that they were his own property.

As the property of the bankrupt. This statement formed the ground of the alleged perjury. Evidence was given to show that, in fact, these goods did belong to the bankrupt, and not to the defendant, but the jury, on the whole, not being satisfied on this point, returned, after a quarter of an hour's consultation, a verdict of NOT GUILTY.

TUESDAY.

ROSE V. THE DIRECTORS OF THE EAST INDIA COMPANY

This was an action on an agreement by which the defendants hired the ship John Fleming, belonging to the plaintiff, in order to carry out a certain number of troops to India. The troops went on board, and it was then discovered that a number of locomotives, amounting to twenty-eight couples, had been put on board, and put into a place on the main-deck, between the fore and main hatchways, and just at the spot where the ship's boat was usually kept. Representations of the offensiveness of the smell made by these animals were made from the surgeon and the colonel to Sir W. Warre, and by that officer the ship was detained for forty-eight hours, till the proper nautical officers had examined into the matter, and reported upon it. The report of the gentlemen was that it was advisable to allow the ship to proceed with the dogs on board. The ship, however, did set sail during the negociations which had been opened on the subject, but was brought into Falmouth, and there the alternative being presented of the dogs or the soldiers being removed, the question was decided by the landing of the soldiers. The plaintiff, who was the owner of the John Fleming, now brought his action on the agreement. The defence was, that the carrying of the dogs would, in the warm latitudes, become dangerous to the health of the troops, and that the refusal to put the dogs on shore afforded, therefore, sufficient ground for breaking the agreement.

Lord Denman having summed up, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff.

COURT OF CONSISTORY TUESDAY.

(Before Dr. Lushington.

BANNISTER V. BANNISTER.

This was a suit promoted by the husband against the wife for a divorce, on the ground of adultery. The case was an unfeelended one, and the learned judge, being satisfied with the evidence, pronounced for the prayer of the husband

DILLON V. DILLON.

Dr. Dillon appeared in person, and read three affidavits in proof that she had obeyed the assumption made upon him by the court to take his wife home and treat her with conjugal affection.

Mr. Dyke, the proctor for Mrs Dillon, prayed to be heard on his act, as opposed to his affidavits, and he was accordingly to bring it in next court day.

SECONDARIES COURT—TUESDAY.

(Before Mr. Secondary James, and a Common Jury.)

BREACH OF PROMISE OF MARRIAGE—HOCKING V. PRICE

This was a writ of inquiry, calling upon the jury to assess the damages in an action brought by the plaintiff, Elizabeth Hocking, the daughter of a respectable shoemaker at Dover, against the defendant, William John Price, a shipwright, as compensation for breach of promise of marriage.

Mr. Henderson appeared as counsel for the plaintiff, and Mr. Cleasson for the defendant; and damages were laid at £300.

The defendant, although a trade a shipwright, was in expectation of receiving, shortly, by the will of a lady named Mott, to whom he was related, at Brighton, a sum amounting to £20,000.

It appeared that an improper intimacy had existed between the parties, and that the plaintiff had given birth to a child about six month since.

The Learned Secondary took the jury were merely to confine their damages for the breach of promise, and leave the seduction altogether out of the question.

After some deliberation, the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff—Damages, £100.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

The ninth session during the present mayoralty commenced on Monday morning, before the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor; Aldermen Sir Chapman Marshall and Lawson; the Common Sergeant; the Sheriffs, Under-Sheriffs, and usual civic authorities. In consequence of the very short interval which has elapsed since the termination of the last sessions, the calendar is comparatively light. There were only 97 prisoners for trial, of whom there were charged with burglary, 2; uttering counterfeit coin, 5; setting and stealing, 3, embezzlement, 6; forgery, 1; housebreaking, 1; larceny, 45; larceny in a dwelling house, 3; larceny from the person, 7; larceny by servants, 11, letter-stealing from the Post office; 1; misdemeanour, 3; revolt on board a ship, 3; rape, 1; receiving stolen goods, 3; robbery, 1. The Common Sergeant, in the absence of the Recorder, briefly charged the grand jury.

Edward Munn, Henry Reece, and William Barton, surrendered to take their trials, upon an indictment charging them with forgery and uttering a forged instrument, and for conspiring together to defraud, by means of the said instrument—James Timewell.—Mr. Erle, Queen's Counsel, Mr. Carkson, and Mr. Ouall conducted the prosecution; Messrs. Philips, Bodkin, and Dowse defended the prisoners.—To prove the case the prosecutor was called, who distinctly swore that he never indorsed the document, nor heard of it till it was produced at the time at the Court of Exchequer. He denied that any partnership ever existed, or was even thought of. In his cross-examination, however, he admitted that the prisoner Munn was still carrying on his business in Stanhope-terrace; that he had obtained several of his (prosecutor's) customers from him, and that it would be very convenient to get him out of the way by convicting him of perjury or forgery. A number of witnesses were called to prove that the signature of the document was not in the handwriting of the prosecutor, but their evidence as is almost always the case where handwriting is to be proved, was rather contradictory. The prisoner underwent a very long cross-examination in order to test the knowledge with respect to his own handwriting; a number of folded documents were handed to him, and upon looking at the signatures he said they were not in his writing, but upon being requested to look at the entire document, he admitted that he was mistaken. Upwards of thirty witnesses were called for the defence, a number of which were examined their belief that the signature to the agreement was in the handwriting of the prosecutor.—The Common Sergeant, in summing up observed that the evidence adduced was certainly very contradictory. If they were of opinion that the agreement was a forgery, then the charge against all the prisoners was made out, and in arriving at such a conclusion they must say what weight they attached to the evidence of the prosecutor, who had distinctly sworn that he never signed any such agreement.—The jury, after about ten minutes deliberation, returned a verdict of guilty against all the prisoners.—The Common sergeant, after remarking upon the enormity of the prisoners offence, sentenced Munn to two years, and Reece and Barton to eighteen months imprisonment in the Penitentiary.

The above trial occupied the entire day, and did not terminate until ten o'clock at night.

TUESDAY.

[Before the Common Sergeant.]

Several prisoners pleaded guilty to the charges for which they stood indicted, and the court itself throughout the day were of minor consequence.

On that relief, named Thomas Depaw, was convicted of a daring robbery. He was then charged with being formerly convicted. The policeman said that the Governor of the Westminster prison stated that the prisoner had been there for different offences.—The Common Sergeant sentenced him to transported for fourteen years.

NEW COURT

[Before Mr. Commissioner Bullock.]

David Crane, aged 19, labourer, was placed at the bar, charged with stealing a watch, a chain, a seal, and a key, value £3, and other property to the value in all of £24 10s., the property of Charles Steedman, in his dwelling-house.—The prisoner was found guilty, and sentenced to ten years transportation.—The prosecutor applied to the court for permission to see and converse with Crane, for the purpose of endeavouring to induce him to discover what had been done with the remainder of the property, of which no trace could be obtained.—The learned Commissioner referred him to the Sheriffs.

POLICE.

GUILDHALL.—On Monday, William Henderson, one of the principal shop men at Messrs. Moxon's, Dilke, and Co.'s, was fully committed to Newgate to take his trial on a charge of robbing his employers.

Colonel Draper, of the Lumber Troop, appeared for a summons against Mr Beck, the landlord of the Dr Johnson, in Bolt-court, who was recently the company's victualler, for detaining their cannons, flags, pictures, &c., of the value of £300. The company were willing to pay every farthing, but Mr. Beck would not say what was due, and yet detained their property for non-payment.—Sir Peter Laurie asked how all the troop was?—The Colonel said about 200 years

Sir P. Laurie asked the quality and duration of the liquor?—The Colonel said he must be excused by a member, and pay an entrance fee of a few shillings.—Sir P. Laurie inquired if he must not drink a pint of beer at a draught?—The Colonel admitted that was the custom.—Sir P. Laurie asked what were their principles?—The Colonel's answer was a mysterious—Sir P. Laurie: "very appropriate for such a troop of deep drinkers."—The Colonel said the pictures expressed likenesses of Cobbett and Waithman.—The troop had removed their headquarters to the Fleece, in Petty-lane.—A summons was granted, returnable on Saturday.

DOINGS AT THE EXECUTION.—John Prideaux was brought up before Sir Peter Laurie, charged with picking a gentleman's pocket of his handkerchief at the Old Bailey, on Monday morning.—Mr. Cook, a gentleman living at Stoke Newington, said he was also at the execution, and while in the crowd he felt a person's hand near his pocket; he put out his hand and caught the prisoner, who was attempting to secrete something. A scuffle ensued, and prisoner escaped. He waited for about half an hour, when he found him and gave him in custody. He properly was not found. The prisoner said he was there, but was there out of curiosity, as a respectable man, who proved it at the time a master came to Sir Peter for Mr Cook.—I think you are mistaken—Mr. Cook I am sure is a gentleman.—I have lost my handkerchief, Sir Peter; I wish every one else who has lost theirs had such a handkerchief also; it is an important piece of property.—Prideaux, you are a rum one, I see.—An old fellow was stopping a coalpit out of a gentleman's breast, but a prosecutor was obliged to leave town that day for Leicester.—Sir Peter: I shall not part with you so easily. You are well known.—I shall remind you

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.—On Monday the celebrated Tom Steele, O'Connell's head pugilist, appeared at the office for the purpose of answering the charge magistrate had upon him two months ago, of having committed a most unprovoked assault upon Temple Bar, that former Majesty ought to be made away with.—Mr Jardine thanked the honest Tom for his information, and promised to see about it.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.—On Monday, John Patterson, a private in the 1st battalion of the Scotch Fusileer Guards, was placed at the bar, before Mr. Mauley, on a charge of having stood guard on his post on Sunday, contrary to his orders. A gentleman of the name of Loghead, residing very near the Queen's Palace, Hyde park, about the o'clock, on Tuesday night last, he was roused by a private soldier, and knocked down with considerable violence. He made his way out of the park, and on feeling his watch, it was not there—discovered that the watch had been broken, and that his watch (the one produced) had been stolen. The prisoner, on being asked what he had to say in answer to the charge, admitted that he was in possession of the watch, but was innocent of the robbery. He found it in the road, and he had no intention to make off with it. He was about to return it to the owner, but was prevented by the prosecutor. He made off to the barracks, and showed him a gold watch, which Patterson was the next morning seen to take out of Robertson's cap, where it had been left on the previous night. Robertson said he had found the watch near Hyde park gates, and, seeing a number of persons about, supposed the owner to be in the crowd. He then left the place, and on his return found the watch gone. Both prisoners were committed for trial—Robertson as the thief, and Patterson as the receiver.

SHOCKING STATE OF FURNISHED APARTMENTS.—During the last week a great number of respectable persons have been plundered of plate, jewellery, money, &c., to the extent of several thousand pounds, by a well-dressed young man, who had engaged apartments of the plundered parties, and who was supposed to be assisted by a female who passed as his wife, but to whom he was only a passing intimate, and, but recently. The police were apprised of the robberies, and a description of the offenders lodged at the station-houses. The constable being on the look out for plain clothes, police-sergeant Gray accidentally met the prisoners in Shoreditch, on Sunday evening, when he observing an outward disposition to run away, and he was about to take them into custody, when the female, who was dressed in the height of fashion, and carrying a reticule, struck the sergeant a violent blow on the face with her fist, and the prisoners made off. The sergeant pursued them, and succeeded in apprehending the female, but the man escaped. On searching her pocket-books, a reticule, two gold watches, &c., were found. Another female property was found. One of the pocket-books contained a letter addressed to Miss Rushell, who was lodging at 18, New Burlington street, on Wednesday night, on which day a considerable quantity of plate and jewellery had been stolen from the premises, who had occupied apartments above for a few days. The prisoner was brought on Monday afternoon before Mr. Mauley, at which time a number of ladies were in attendance to identify him, and to put some questions to the captive. While the investigation was going on Inspector Baker received two persons, in the neighbourhood of the court, who were anxiously waiting the proceedings. The superior immediately sent a sergeant to watch them, having received some intelligence from the prisoner, which he was afraid these parties would screen by giving information to certain others; and then secured a warrant, and Wind and Gray to No. 5, Warwick-street, to execute it. On entering the house they found a woman named Sarah Ann Hunt within, and the only person there. The police requested to be allowed to examine the front attic, in addition to the goods enumerated, found a quantity of valuable wearing apparel of all kinds. On examining the contents of a house-reaking instruments, jemmies, crowbars, files, life-preservers, &c. In the room large quantities of valuable property were found, some song-books, names with a direction, and about £200 worth of Brussels lace. Property. What also discovered two books which have been stolen from New Burlington-street, one of which had the name of the owner, Miss Russell, in it. While the police were looked at the door, and was let in by Gray. The prisoner was one of Edward Gilford, and he was taken into custody. The police on searching the front attic, in addition to the goods enumerated, found a quantity of valuable wearing apparel of all kinds. On examining the contents of a trunk brought before Mr. Mauley, who having heard the charge, remanded both till Monday next.

CLERKENWELL.—On Monday a respectable-looking man, accompanied by his wife, who stated that they resided at No 91, Leather-lane, Holborn, applied to Mr Combe for advice under the following extraordinary circumstances.—It appeared from their statement that the female applicant, prior to her marriage, was acquainted with an Irish barrister-at-law, to whom she bore a child. On Sunday last she went to Gravesend for a day's pleasure, leaving her husband in charge with her two children and cooking for them. The woman she alluded to came to and in the temporary absence of her husband, took away both children and received a letter from Mr. Sharpe, written by the gentleman himself, in which he would send back the two children, but that he should never speak to [illegible] having threatened to murder the children, she should not. [illegible] Mr. Combe has given information to the police, who had not, as yet, been successful in finding every inquiry, but they could trace no tidings of the gentleman or the children, and also wished to know how she was to proceed. Mr. Combe questioned the applicant, who replied, that the gentleman possessed an estate in Kilkenny, in Ireland, and their impression was, that he had gone to the Continent, and that something wrong had happened to the children. Mr. Combe inquired at what time the children were taken away? Mrs. Ayre: At five o'clock on Sunday evening. My husband left him sitting in the dining-room, and he slipped out with the children. [The wife was very much affected, and shed tears.] Mr. Combe advised her to allay her fears, and she could make inquiries at the London Bridge Wharf. The latter stated, that he would send back "Tommy" by the Hermes steamer, and in all probability he might do so by one of the vessels which came in at three or four o'clock in the afternoon.

UNION-HALL.—On Tuesday Martha James, a young woman, wife of a greengrocer in the Borough market, was brought before Mr. Traill, charged with stabbing her husband and inflicting a serious wound with a knife in his side. Fortunately, Mr. M produced a medical certificate from Guy's Hospital, where the prisoner's husband is confined, describing the nature of the wound, and further stating that he was unable to attend the examination.

QUEEN'S-SQUARE.—Mr. John Grier, who is at present residing at the Burlington Hotel, Cork-street, was charged upon a summons with assaulting the toll-collector at the bar, Vauxhall-bridge-road. William Pearce, the toll-collector, stated that on that day week the defendant, who was in his cab, drove through the bar on his way, as witness thought, to the bridge, and, consequently, he did not demand any toll, but after the defendant had proceeded a few yards he turned back, and was passing through the bar, when complainant stopped the horse and demanded the toll, defendant refused to give any or a card and insisted the complainant across the shoulder to make him leave the horse, which he did, and defendant drove on; complainant, however, detained his footboy, and defendant, seeing this, returned and paid the toll, and gave his card.—A witness corroborated the latter part of the statement which relates to the assault.—Defendant denied that he ever went through the bar. On the occasion alluded to he was going to make a call in Warwick street, and there was no occasion to go through the bar, though there was to go near it. The complainant got on to the step of his cab, and demanded toll of him. He knew there was no toll due, and as the conductor of the collector was such as most likely would frighten his horse, a very spirited one, he pushed him off with the butt-end of his whip. When he found the man with his servant he paid the toll rather than lose his services.—Mr. Gregorie: Is the law in attendance?—He is. Mr. Gregorie: Will you have him called? I shall pay him any thing he may be to you please.—Mr Gregorie: I do not sit here to conduct your defence, sir. I am here to decide upon its merits. I have asked you if you would like your servant to be called. You seem careless about it, and I consequently infer that you do not desire its evidence. I consider the assault complained of fully proved, and you will pay a fine of 50s. Defendant: I don't know why I was punished in the absence of my witness.—Mr. Gregorie: I have given you ample opportunities during your witness, sir; and allow me to tell you that I think you are wanting in courtesy to the bench. Defendant: I hold a commission in her Majesty's service, as well as yourself, sir, and I think myself I know how to behave [illegible] was examined, and he swore his master never [illegible] pushed the collector away with his whip. Mr. Gregorie: I have heard the evidence attentively, and considered he had no malice done him. The evidence of the first witness had not altered his opinion, and he should therefore inflict the penalty previously imposed upon him.—The defendant turned round and paid the fine.—So he would appear that Mr. Oliver was fined 50s., not for the assault on the toll collector, but because he did not demean himself with sufficient courtesy towards the Bench. Many of the visitors were probably not aware of the circumstances in question, and calculated impair the usefulness of their office. A magistrate should be possessed of more dignity than to descend to such petty altercations

ED. I. N.]

Alexander Barr, the man who has been in custody for this last week, charged with having murdered his wife, was placed at the bar, charged with having violently threatened her witnesses, who had given evidence against him, and who had interfered to protect the unfortunate woman when he was brutally beating her. Defendant said he was drunk at the time, and did not know what occurred. His widow were prepared to shed tears, and said there was no poor dear wife at home living now, and the children.—Mr. Gregorie intimated, that if he were to attempt to follow his wife to the grave, the populace, incensed at his indecent conduct, would rent their indignation. As regarded the charge of murder, no one's jury had given it the most mature consideration, and were of opinion that there was not sufficient to send him for trial for the manslaughter. He was now called upon to answer the charge of threatening the witnesses, and for that he must find good bail, himself in £100, and two sureties in £50 each

SPORTING INTELLIGENCE.

ROYAL THAMES YACHT CLUB.

The yearly match at the close of the season for the grand challenge cup came off on Tuesday, and a series of 11 o'clock, produced by worse seasonable p—if we may use such a term for it we per—our readers will have of river navigation gave the most varied theatre of any which we have seen rend this season. Seven boats were entered to have contested the prize, but of these five only started. The vessels which sailed were as follows —

Names.	Tons.	Owners.	Colours.
Champion. . .	25 . .	H. Gir stun, Esq. . . .	Whi.
Mystery.	25 ..	Lord Alfred Paget. .	Blue pierced White, Maltese Cross
Ada.	25 ..	Hon H Upton	Bk before Red, White Cross.
Mary	25 ..	G. Keen, Esq.	White quartered with Red.
Phantom	30 ..	J. F. Solly, Esq. . . .	Red and Blue.

The wind was from the south-west, and tolerably brisk, but in pulling during the morning, with occasional smart showers. At noon o'clock the signal for sailing was given, and the yachts started, the Mystery being decidedly the favourite, and the Champion being backed by those who knew the qualities of the boats, with little less confidence. The Ada, we believe, first got up her gaff-topsail, and her example was followed by the remaining boats. After which the Mystery and Champion, in succession, passed the Phantom, which however, by means of her build, was enabled to keep close in shore, and continue the struggle for the second place with the Champion. On rounding Erith point, the Mystery was so far ahead that all the doubt existed in most minds of her success, and when all the buoy beyond Gravesend, her distance in advance of the Champion must have been, at least, a mile. Here the latter ran on board the steamer, a yeomanry one (somewhat premature, by, as it afterwards turned out), which spoke to "See the conquering Hero comes," for it was to be followed by the remainder of the friends. The first of these being the Champion off Coalhouse Point, where the jaws of the gaff gave way, and the mainsail fell, she was immediately taken in tow by the steamer. Next came the turn of the Mystery, who, in crowding on too much sail, carried away mast and rigging about two feet from the cleek, clearing herself down to the hull as promptly as might be wished. All now but her (as the Phantom's was during the early part of the race) decent steamship—we beg Neptune to forgive us—river-ship, been showing but her close to rise to four feet water, and naturally suffering ran aground. We therefore had pleasure in finding the Ada victor at about seven o'clock, subsequently the Phantom, struggled in, having managed to float off with the tide. Next appeared the Mary, her sails covered hands with a neat and appropriate speech, and became the property, for the next year, of the Hon. H. Upton. Sun fly beating were obtain out of it. Lord Alfred Paget, and Mr. Gunston, the masters of the unfortunate Mystery and Champion respectively, looking marvellously discomfortable, and so ended the day's sport.

ROWING MATCH BETWEEN THE ETONIANS AND THE WESTMINSTER SCHOLARS.—It is now some years since the cricket matches of the two schools were matched against each other. Arrangements, however, have just been made for an eight-oared match to come off on the Thames on Tuesday the 2nd of August, the distance to be rowed being from Kew Bridge to Putney. The last match was won by the Westminster scholars, beating the Etonians after a sharp struggle for the victory.

A LARGE CRAB.—It is stated, in the neighbourhood of Plymouth, that a very heavily on the late derby race for which Coldcreek, Mr Freshwater's horse was the favourite. His lost several thousand pounds and he has since taken to [illegible] Pits for the satisfaction of his creditors, but it is said he came so [illegible] that he is now insane, and in a madhouse near Plymouth.

EXTRAORDINARY RACE.—Yesterday morning, at five minutes past five o'clock, 32 pigeons, belonging to different persons at Brussels, were let loose in Liverpool, and started off with the swiftness of the wind, on a race of the English channel. They had been brought over to the place covered up in a basket, for a grand trial of their swiftness and sagacity in returning to their homes, and the winner of the race will carry off a handsome sweepstakes. They were set at liberty in the neighbourhood of St. Luke's Church, and immediately rose to at least double the height of its tower, after which they all started off to the south-east, the direct route to Brussels, with admirable rapidity. When they were set loose, the morning was bright and beautiful, but if the rain should have been as heavy in the south-east during the day as it was here, their flight will have been greatly impeded, and some of them will be likely to lose their way across the Channel. We shall be curious to hear the result of this extraordinary race.—Liverpool Times, Tuesday.

THE MAGISTRACY OF MIDDLESEX.—The Marquis of Salisbury, as Lord Lieutenant of Middlesex, has established a rule that he will not put into the commission of the peace any gentleman who is engaged in business.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

ROSSINI'S "STABAT MATER."

BUST OF ROSSINI.

The eccentric Dantan, after whose bust we here present to our readers the likeness of Rossini, has chosen to individualize that great master as the composer of "William Tell." The beauty and the popularity of that fine opera are readily admitted; but it is only one, parmi les autres, of his famous compositions—it cannot be regarded as his chef d'œuvre. At the present moment, his sacred production, Stabat Mater, is creating as great a sensation as any of his dramatic works; and the splendid scale on which it has been produced during the past week at her Majesty's Theatre, will tend to give it an enduring place in public estimation, as well as to swell the measure of Rossini's fame.

The whole of this glorious production was brought out on Wednesday morning, the following artistes assisting on the occasion, viz.:—Signors Lablache, F. Lablache, G. Ronconi, Poggi, Guasco, Rubini; and Mesdames Persiani, Moltini, Graziani, and Grammaglia. The choruses were sung by upwards of a hundred voices, and the orchestra was composed of all the instrumentalists of her Majesty's Theatre, including Messrs. Dragonetti, Lindley, Anfossi, Tolbecque, Nadaud, Baumann, Barret, Harper, Platt, Ribas, and Rousselet; the whole under the direction of Signor Costa, who conducted the performance.

The interior of the theatre presented a most effective spectacle, an illuminated transparency being exhibited at the back of the stage, descriptive of the Gothic arches and painted windows of a Roman Catholic cathedral, the effect of which was greatly increased by the half-natural semi-artificial light by which the threatre was illumined.

The performance of the Stabat Mater went off with the greatest success, nearly one-half of the pieces being enthusiastically encored; indeed there is hardly one of them the repetition of which does not discover some new beauties some previously latent gems which are not always brought to light on a first performance. It may also be said, with equal truth, that the Stabat Mater itself improves on each successive occasion; and we may imagine that the performance of Wednesday morning will only have the effect of giving the public an additional zest for, and a better appreciation of, its exalted merits. Speaking individually, those portions of the Stabat Mater, the beauties of which appeared more fully developed, were the introduction and chorus, "Stabat Mater dolorosa," and the grand chorus and finale, "In sempiterna secula." In the first the instrumentation is magnificent, the gloomy "muffled drum" opening, of which we have before had occasion to speak, being strikingly appropriate to the mournful and sombre sadness of the subject. In the grand final chorus there is a fugue of the most sublime character, not unworthy of being compared with many compositions of a far more exalted rank; and we feel bound to bear our testimony to the general precision and admirable effect with which it was executed, both by the vocalists and by the orchestra; to the exertions of the latter the highest praise may with justice be awarded; for, unless the fine accompaniments which Rossini has composed are played by the most skilful performers, his Stabat Mater can hardly fail to suffer in a greater or less degree.

Signor Rubini gave the air "Cujus animam" in his best style, and was honoured with an enthusiastic encore.

Signor Lablache was encored in the recitative (with chorus) "Eia Mater;" his powerful voice and correct judgment render him, of course, fully equal to sustain the most difficult portion of a sacred performance, and on this occasion he was eminently successful: we wish he had also been selected to sing the beautiful solo "Pro Peccatis."

Madame Persiani thrilled the audience by her very exquisite execution of the grand aria (with chorus), "Inflammatus et accensus:" this air and chorus were loudly encored, as was also the quartet, "Quando Corpus," sung by Persiani, Grammaglia, Rubini, and Lablache. Madamoiselle Moltini's rich and full-toned voice was heard to the greatest advantage in the duet, "Quis est homo?" the notes of which she warbled forth in a most delightful manner; Mademoiselle Moltini bids fair, in our estimation, to attain a high rank in her profession. The other principal singers, consisting of Guasco, F. Lablache, and Mesdames Graziani and Grammaglia, acquitted themselves very creditably.

The house was very fully attended, considering its immense dimensions; and Rossini's Stabat Mater is likely, we think, to derive additional fame from the manner in which it has been performed at Her Majesty's Theatre. The performance was, we understand, honoured by the immediate patronage of His Royal Highness Prince Albert.

We ought to mention that an entirely new translation of the Stabat Mater was submitted to the audience. We quote from it the words of the "Pro Peccatis" and the "Eia Mater." This of the Holy Mother:—

> She beheld the purple streaming
> Of his blood—for others flow!
> Jesus, for the world's redeeming
> Bearing torture, gibe, and blow!
> Saw his sweet I fe's sad outpouring,
> Ere he sought th' eternal throne;
> Saw him—in his spirit-soaring,
> Dying, desolate, alone!
> Mother! then—in thy despairing—
> (Of all love, dear source divine!)
> Thy strong woe let me be sharing—
> Let me blend my tears with thine!
> On my heart fond ardour pouring,
> Mother! as my race I run,
> Teach me, while in awe adoring,
> How to love and please thy Son!

The part in the Stabat Mater, which Lablache sustains at the Italian Opera, is, at the St. James's Theatre, supported by Herr Staudigl, whose refined taste, deep voice, and energetic solemnity of style, are altogether calculated to inspire his audience with feelings akin to the sacred character of the composition. Herr Staudigl is one of the most accomplished bass singers of the day. From his first arrival in England he created a sensation in the musical circles, though his concert singing by no means equals his dramatic. It is in German opera that he is heard to the greatest advantage.

COLLINET.

PORTRAIT OF COLLINET—(AFTER DANTAN.)

> On Collinet,
> To hear you play
> Your flageolet, from day to day
> Enchanted maids might hearken;
> But in what fit
> Did Dantan's wit
> High mount you on that perch to sit,
> Your gentle brow to darken?
> Why look you down
> On all the town,
> With something very like a frown—
> Whose sweet strains could make few sick?
> Dear Collinet,
> Way don't you, eh!
> Look very blithe and very gay
> On that high pole of music?
> Your fame, my boy,
> Is some alloy,
> We wish you every earthly joy,
> For being great and clever,
> So do not pout,
> Since none can flout,
> But your most brilliant pipe pull out,
> And play away for ever!

Signor Lardelli's morning concert took place on Wednesday last, when the admirers of Thalberg were gratified by witnessing his brilliant performance for the last time this season. The selection both vocal and instrumental, was highly judicious, and the artistes comprising the elite of the musical world did justice to the various morceaux assigned to them. The vocal performers consisted of Madme. Ronconi, Mlle. Ostergaard, Signors Rubini, Ronconi, Lardelli, &c. The instrumental corps comprised Mlle. Bertucat, M. Thalberg, Signor Puzzi, Signor Giulio Regondi, &c., &c. The concert was most numerously and fashionably attended.

THE THEATRES.

THE HAYMARKET.

It is the custom to crowd this house on the nights of the new play, the Rose of Arragon, and we are certainly far from finding fault with those who do so; but considering the attractions of what are called the "off nights," we feel surprised that a single seat is left unoccupied; for nothing can exceed the exquisite taste and finished excellence with which genteel comedy is produced and played here twice a-week. Murphy's comedy of The Way to Keep Him was played on Tuesday evening; and we have never left a theatre more thoroughly pleased with a performance than we were with this. All the characters were well sustained. Some of them, those by Farren, Mrs. Glover, and Mrs. Nisbet, for instance, were perfect studies. The perfection of acting is to make the beholder imagine he is looking on at an identity of the actor with the character he represents. We are nowhere more apt to merge into this feeling than at the Haymarket; and we witnessed on Tuesday night an amusing instance of this forgetfulness on the part of a gentleman in the pit, who registered a loud disclaimer against the conduct of Mrs. Quickfidget, (Mrs. Glover), in the piece My Wife's Mother, when she was turning her son-in-law's house out of window. This little incident was genuine compliment. Of the "stars" illuminating this hemisphere just now, and the old favourites who have won their laurels well and worn them long, we do not deem it necessary to say one word at present; but we are bound in justice to notice a new comer in the person of a Mr. Widdicomb, from some provincial theatre: he is a clever actor, and a decided acquisition to the metropolitan boards.

ST. JAMES'S THEATRE.

Mr. Mitchell, the spirited "Entrepreneur" of the French plays, took his benefit on Wednesday evening. Bouffé appeared in three pieces—the Gamin de Paris, his chef-d'œuvre, according to the Parisian, Le Père Turlututu, and Les Vieux Péchés. In addition to this attraction Herr Staudigl sang Benedict's "Rage, thou angry Storm," accompanied by the composer, which was encored; Madame Schodel, a song, with a horn accompaniment, very tastefully executed; and with Herr Staudigl the duet from the Zauberflote. Louis Dobler also exhibited his clever deception of Flora's Gifts. The house was fully and fashionably attended. Mr. Mitchell justly deserves the patronage that has attended his speculation. We have never before had an opportunity of seeing, in London, so many talented and celebrated French artists.

ENGLISH OPERA HOUSE.

The Lone Hut; or a Legend of Mont St. Blanc, produced on Monday evening, belongs to that class of melo-dramas denominated "domestic," and may certainly rank with the successful productions of the same class. The plot is interesting, and the dialogue well written, with much tact. The author has avoided making it too lengthy for melo-dramatic effect. In the acting of the piece, Miss Faucit made a great impression in the hut scene: the struggle to master her feelings, and assume an appearance of resignation, while the steel of the assassin, which he struck into the table, quivered and glittered before her eyes, was faithfully, almost painfully, depicted. O. Smith, as the Hungarian Gipsy, was a perfect picture; and, though a repulsive one, the fidelity of the representation greatly added to the effect of the most interesting scene in the drama. Diddear made a very disagreeable part effective, and Miss Murray played with archness and spirit. Harley had not much opportunity for display, but he evidently lent his best efforts to the cause. The manner in which he received a kick, and exclaimed, "that's one way of getting a footing in the house," was irresistible. At the fall of the curtain, the applause was long and loud. The author (who, we understand, is a gentleman of the name of Raymond, a barrister) was called for, but Mr. Vining having stated that he had left the house at the termination of the first act, Miss Faucit was summoned to receive the congratulations of the audience, who were evidently much pleased with the unequivocal success of the new piece.

NEW STRAND THEATRE.

A burletta, entitled Lucky Stars, by Mr. G. Dance, was produced here on Monday evening with complete success. It is founded on the story of "The Turkey and the Ring." Barnaby Bristles (Keeley), an honest cobbler in Cripplegate, has a very clever, but positive, helpmate, Barbara Bristles, who having a soul above a trade that is trampled on, determines to exalt her husband to the highest sphere of professional employment—to raise him to the stars; in other words, although not intended by nature for a conjurer, to make him one. By a series of lucky contingencies he recovers a valuable ring lost by a lady, and a pearl lost by a jeweller, intended for the Lady Mayoress. His reputation rises to such a height that it alarms the real wizard, Jargonaster, who denounces him as an impostor. His doom is certain—Justice is deaf as well as blind—he has ascended the topmost round of Fortune's ladder, and is to be "turned off!"—The city treasury is broken open; there has been a run for gold; four valuable caskets have been stolen—who are the thieves? A respite of five minutes is given to Barnaby to discover them; when the clock chimes three the officers of justice will return, and, if unsuccessful, lead him to execution. The fatal chime is heard, but the stars still protect the noviciate; he discovers the thieves, the principal one being the rival astrologer; and Barnaby's reputation as a conjuror is firmly established. The acting in this clever burletta is capital: Keeley's astonishment at the benign aspect of the stars, and his gradually increasing confidence in their influence and assistance, till he boldly ventured to address them in the mysterious language of "Abracadabra," set the house in a roar. As to Mrs. Keeley, there is a "laughing devil" in her eye that proves she has "spells" at command, with which to "witch" her audience. Mr. Younge played Sir Peter Portsoken, knight and alderman, with much humour and effect. There can be no doubt of the attraction of Lucky Stars.

THE SURREY.

Assuredly Mrs. Davidge has just reason to bless her stars, for this house is crowded nightly; the "opera company," and the style of pieces produced, in addition to operas, have raised the character of the audience here, which is now as quiet, respectable, and well-ordered as need be. Fra Diavolo has been brought out this week, and was well supported in all its parts. The comic force appears to be centred for the present in Mr. George Wild and Mr. J. Webster, with whom Miss E. Terry, a very young, but very promising actress, justly divides the laurels; this lady has a pleasing voice, an agreeable person, and a good conception of character, and with these requisits she must rise.

LANCASTER SANDS.—On the evening of Monday week two men lost their lives in attempting to cross Lancaster Sands. The two unfortunate strangers were observed in the channel making the best of their way towards Hest Bank, but evidently too late to accomplish their object before the tide would render the sands impassible. On seeing the danger with which they were beset, the good people at Hest Bank ran down to the sands, and having procured a boat pushed off to the help of the unfortunate men. Gestures were made with the view of inducing the poor fellows to fall back (as the sand banked higher in their rear) and wait for succour, but either mistaking these instructions, or being over anxious to reach the boat, they made towards it and unhappily sank amid deep water never to rise again in life.

POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No. IV.

COLONEL SIBTHORP, M.P.

The diligent reader of the parliamentary debates, must often have had his eye arrested, while travelling down the columns of type, by parenthetical breaks, which inform him at such a point, there ensued "laughter," or "much laughter," or "roars of laughter;" according to the intensity of the joke, or of that which was meant to be one. He naturally peruses the passage again, and is surprised to find that what has so shaken the sides of the House, has no perceptible effect on his own—that the period is neither sharp nor brilliant—that it neither cuts nor shines—that it is, in fact, rather dull than otherwise, and induces a feeling of wonder as to what wit of alchemy than can be, which, in one assembly at least, has extracted from it the materials for a laugh. The mystery is explained by this—that the fun of what Sydney Smith calls "a House of Commonism," frequently consists more in manner than matter. Where the first is tolerably absurd or passably awkward, there may be something to laugh at, though all else be as dull as the "fat weed of Lethe's wharf." It is no new principle; the gods of Homer, even over their ambrosia, found the lameness of Vulcan a source of "inextinguishable" mirth. How much more excusable, then, are those who, in the absence of everything ambrosial or immortal, can find a little relaxation from the occasional exhibitions of the pompous insanity of a Sibthorpe. The hon. and gallant member represents the City of Lincoln, and was for a considerable period the colleague of Sir Edward Bulwer, with whom he might be said to be paired, and not matched; for a more perfect contrast than the Baronet and the Colonel, the literary man and the soldier, the one possessing fame and the other only notoriety, could scarcely be conceived. They always sat, spoke, and voted on different sides of the House and question, and appeared to have nothing in common but a certain elaborate attention to costume, which might be traced in both of them. The Colonel, or Sib, as he is shortly and familiarly called, has a great penchant for the brilliant in dress, and in attaining it he is much more successful than in infusing it into his oratory. His fancy waistcoat is crossed and recrossed by festoons of chains; and altogether he has the air of a man with a tolerable good opinion of his personal appearance, and very fair credit with the tailor and goldsmith. But what is any dress or ornament compared with the man himself? Let no one wonder that his rising is considered the prelude to a side shaking. As he walks up the floor from the bar he is a burlesque at once of the gravity of a statesman and the carriage of the soldier, both which he industriously affects, and, of course, caricatures. He has generally a bundle of papers under his arm, the contents of which very seldom, that we are aware of, transpire; our charity shall give him credit for a full acquaintance with them, and if he produces that impression on others, it is, we suspect, all he wishes for; his looks and gait are those of a man, with the learning of the Chancellor in his head and the weight of an empire on his shoulders. He dabbles not a little in legislation, generally bringing forward three or four motions every session, the greater number of which fall to the ground for want of a seconder, or are laughed out of the House for their impracticable absurdity. But as the most blundering marksman may chance to hit if he tries often enough, so even Sib has carried his point, and in one memorable instance triumphed over the whole Whig government—the object of his special antipathy. It was on his motion for the reduction of Prince Albert's proposed allowance from fifty thousand a year to thirty thousand. It was supported by Sir R. Peel, and carried against the then ministers. What language could do justice to the accession of importance which Sib derived from that move on the chessboard of politics? George Cruikshank's pencil might do justice to him as he appeared on that occasion, but we must confess our words cannot. A still richer scene, if it be possible, when he took offence at some expression that fell from Mr. Fox Maule, and stalked out of the House, with pistols and Chalk-farm in every gesture; the storm, however, was allayed by the Speaker and Sir R. Peel, and passed off in the most satisfactory and parliamentary manner. The accession of his party to power has shorn him of much of his importance; his energies are confined to motions, in which, as his party do not join, he is unsuccessful: a certain amount of unscrupulous buffoonery may be tolerated in opposition, but becomes damaging when exhibited by one of a party in office. His latest exertions have been connected with the Income-tax and the Poor-laws: on the first he endeavoured to include the gains of the artistes of the Opera, and the last he tried to throw out altogether; we need not add that both attempts were failures. His lament that the Income-tax Bill did not extend to Ireland drew on him a happy hit from O'Connell, who reminded him that, by the statute law, he was an Irishman—an old statute of Henry VIII. enacting, that every man having his upper lip unshaven was to be deemed a "mere" Irishman, and treated accordingly. Though not very witty himself, the gallant colonel may boast of frequently having been the cause of wit in others. He has represented Lincoln in several Parliaments, having sat for it previous to 1832, when the reform excitement threw him out of it. His influence, however, regained it for him in 1835, and he has represented it ever since. It is not unlikely that the good folks of that city look on him as combining, in his own proper person, the military talents of Wellington and the oratory of Peel. May they continue in a delusion that contributes so much to the amusement of the Legislature. May the devil, who is said to look over Lincoln, never inspire them with doubts of his fitness for the position he occupies. He would be as great a lose as ever was Bully Bottom to the stage-struck craftsmen of Athens. No man wears the asses head with a better grace, or is more perfectly the simpleton, while imagining that he is a perfect Solomon. In these days of distress and Income-tax, who would deprive a single human being of the chance of a laugh? What would be the crime of a constituency who should inflict the same deprivation upon a whole Senate?

THE LICENSED VICTUALLERS' SCHOOL,

KENNINGTON-LANE.

We redeem our promise of presenting to our readers an engraving of the Licensed Victuallers' School, executed after the beautiful publication of Mr. Moore, of St. Martin's-lane, who has produced pictorial illustrations of nearly all the Licensed Victuallers' institutions. The charity in question is in all respects a most deserving one, and its directors have pursued the plan so properly in vogue, of making our temples of benevolence so many embellishments to the architecture of the metropolis, by erecting a building every way worthy of the great cause in hand, and yielding to few in the design of its large and handsome exterior. The work of human-kindness that is worked within is, however, still more worthy of public regard.

With reference to the constitution of the school, and of the means by which it is supported, a correspondent sends us the following communication:—

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS."

Licensed Victuallers' School.

SIR,—As you advertise your intention in next Sunday's paper of illustrating the Licensed Victuallers' School, I beg to draw your attention to an extract subjoined, from a work which has reference to the subject. I beg to observe (a fact not generally known), that the original projector and founder of the Morning Advertiser paper and Licensed Victuallers' School, was Mr. W. R. H. Brown, the present Warden of the Fleet Prison, and Keeper of Westminster Hall. That gentleman originally engaged the house in Kennington-lane for the school recently rebuilt, and presenting a very handsome elevation. In consideration of the same the Board of Management recorded the fact, by placing the portrait of that gentleman conspicuously in the principal room of the establishment, and his name at the head of the donors of the institution. The following is the extract referred to:—"The Morning Advertiser is an old-established paper, having made its daily appearance as regularly as the sun has risen for nearly half a century. It was established in 1794. It was instituted by the body of Licensed Victuallers, whose property it still is. Its finances are managed by a committee of Licensed Victuallers, chosen at certain periods by the subscribers. A certain portion of its profits generally go to the support of an institution for the education and maintenance of the children —boys and girls of deceased members of the society—and a part is always applied to the support of unfortunate members themselves. The profits of the Advertiser have in this way done incalculable good." Having thus referred to the peculiar features and resources of these establishments, I will for the present conclude my communication, and remain,

A CORRESPONDENT AND SUBSCRIBER.

Unquestionably the statement of our correspondent, that the Advertiser contributes much to the support of the Licensed Victuallers' School, is correct. The annual sum, we believe, exceeds nine thousand pounds. Two thousand and upwards were also, it will be remembered, collected at the festival which we recorded last week. Long may the institution thus flourish as it deserves.

A PROPHECY.—WAR TO THE KNIFE!—A ridiculous prophecy resembling that which lately frightened or amused the people of London, and which threatened an awful earthquake to the metropolis, is now rife in the neighbourhood of Inverness. War is to be the medium of destruction in the present case. "The sword, the sword is coming upon Scotland;" and, according to the Highland seer, the enemy will, in August next, land upon that side of the sea, or Cromarty Frith, on which the sun rises. Houses and villages are to be burned, and the last battle is to be fought on the mountain opposite Lochassie. The enemies, it is said, are to be "clothed in drab-coloured dresses"—an army of Quakers? This nonsensical farrago, which seems to proceed from a disordered intellect, and not from a cunning impostor, has been transmitted from Canada, by an old Highlander, who left this neighbourhood thirty-seven years ago, under the impression that the event now predicted would one day take place. Some persons think that Donald has been engaged by an emigrant agent in Canada to practise on the ignorant and superstitious of his countrymen, to induce them to fly from this danger, and seek a shelter on the other side of the Atlantic. The prophecy has been widely circulated, and is believed by hundreds—we might almost say thousands, of the country people. Meetings are held on the subject, and the utmost consternation is evinced.

THE FASHIONS.

Rue de la Chaussé d'Antin, Paris, July.

Mon cher Monsieur,—The gallantry of your sex has decided, that of all things lovely in creation, woman is the loveliest; but from henceforth there will not be one of us unwilling to share the palm of beauty with the really charming flowers which our ever-inventive artistes have recently produced—flowers that never from the lack of heat or of moisture, will suffer that evanescence which destroys the beauty and brilliancy of Flora's choicest parterres. The bouquet de camails, which, in the hand of a fair demoiselle, blooms to-day in its native loveliness, is forgotten on the morrow, and, no longer possessing its freshness and attraction, is heedlessly cast aside; but the flowers of which I write, when arranged with gout upon a summer ball-dress of organdie or barege, will last a whole season, and attract by their freshness, beauty, and novelty, an endless throng of admirers. They are worn in wreaths, to border the flounces and ends of the sleeves, which must be short. The most elegant that have appeared are the blossoms of reseda, geranium, and mysotis. The flowers of the coiffure should correspond with those of the dress. Robes continue to be worn considerably fuller, and the most prevailing skirts are made to consist entirely, as it were, of four or five large tucks; the first commencing about six or eight inches from the waist, and each succeeding one increasing considerably in size to the bottom of the dress. I must not omit telling you of a very pretty style of wreath I have lately observed in my promenades to the Tuileries. It is formed of wild roses, interspersed with sprigs of moss, and is large and full in the centre, decreasing towards the ends. This worn upon a chapeau de paille, has a delightful appearance. Au plaisir mon cher Monsieur, FELICIE.

ANGLING.

THE BARBEL.

To the Editor of the Illustrated London News.

The barbel is a comely, beautiful fish, handsome in shape, and his scales are placed in a most exact and curious manner; he is long like the pike, though not quite so long, will grow to be very large, and then his proportioned parts best show themselves. He is called a barbel from the barb, beard, or whatties that hang about his mouth and nose. He is one of the leather-mouthed fish, and seldom breaks his hold if he be once hooked; but he is so strong that he will often break both rod and line, if he have to be a big one, and is not properly managed. He delights in rivers and running waters, and will not live in a pond; like the chub he sorts with his own kind, and they love to live together. I like to a gar place in a river they seldom or ever leave it; and I have known a barbel hole, be a barbel hole in one particular river for twenty years together. They generally choose a gravelly shoal, and lie at one end of it; and if it is near the shore, they get under the bank, where rooting with their noses like a hog, if there was not a hollow shelf before they will soon make it so, and under cover of it they lie sucking the earth of the bank, and the finest of the gravel, upon which it is said they in part subsist, especially in the winter.

The best and most general modes of fishing for barbel are with a float, and with the ledger bait or lodging plumm. He bites well in the night, and some fish for him with a little bell at the end of the rod, and having a spike at the butt-end, stick it into the ground and wait for the tinkling of the bell.

The biting of the barbel is to be nicely watched by daylight, for if you are not very careful, he will get the bait off the hook, and never come in danger of the hook itself; and therefore you must be particular in putting your bait on, so that he cannot, by taking the top of it in his mouth, draw it off the hook, for he will suck it so strongly, and pull so cautiously, and yet so hard, that he will have it off if possible. In the night you have no remedy but by often taking up your lines to see if the bait remain on the hook. In the day you must let him nibble and suck, and when he does so, you may gently draw with your hand, as if the worm was going to hide himself to get from him—then he will be a little more eager, and when you find he has it, strike, the sooner the better.

The nicest bait for a barbel is a well scoured dew worm, and not kept in sour or musty moss. He will bite as boldly at this as at any bait you can offer him, especially if you have a night or two before baited the place you intend to fish, with large worms, cut in pieces. In fact, the chief success in barbel fishing depends upon having the place well baited beforehand with the same bait you intend to use. In July and August they will take cheese made of old milk, which is true dure, and must not be kept too dry, so that it will not easily wash off, and also greaves (or tallow chandler's scratchings). They should be chopped in small pieces, put into an earthen pan, and have as much boiling water poured over them as will cover them; but they must not be boiled over the fire, as that would make the skins too soft and tender. For your bait select a bit of clean whitish tough skin, twist it well on your hook, and avoid having too large a bait. You will often take chub as well as barbel when fishing in this manner. The most approved hours are from day-light until ten in the morning, and from four in the afternoon until dark. The line should be strong, and the bait should swim about half an inch from the bottom. Fish with a long gut tackle, not too thick, as the finer your tackle the greater your chance of the fish biting. For the ledger bait, a strong rod with a stiff top must be used; about sixteen inches above the hook is placed a flat piece of lead with a no e through it, and immediately below the lead a large shot to prevent it from slipping down. Never throw in the bait further than can be done by a gentle cast of the rod, letting the plumb fall gently into the water with the least possible noise—it is an error to think that large fish are in the middle of the river, experience teaches the fallacy of this opinion; they naturally seek their food near the banks, and disturbing the water by throwing in the plumb too far, will frighten them away.

Barbel spawn in April or May, and are in season again almost directly. Often after a little rain, when there is a fresh on the water, you may have good sport in the latter end of June. If you take a barbel with roe or spawn, be careful it is not cocked, as it is said, by many writers, that the spawn, and also the liver of barbel, is unwholesome.

SUMMER ASSIZES, HERTFORD, JULY 6.—The Commission of Assize for the county of Herts was opened this day at Hertford by Mr. Justice Coltman, with the usual formalities. There are only 13 prisoners for trial, and the cause list is also very light; and it is expected that the whole of the business will be finished by Friday evening. Lord Abinger will preside at Nisi Prius, and Mr. Justice Coltman will sit in the Crown Court.

CORONERS' INQUESTS.

Fatal Omnibus Accident.—On Monday an inquest was held before Mr. Wakley, at the Dispensary, New-road, on the body of Charlotte Maria Reeve, aged five years, who lost her life whilst playing with some other children, by being run over by a Paddington omnibus called the Dart. The evidence of the several witnesses tended to show that no blame attached to Payne, who drove the omnibus, and the jury returned a verdict of "Accidental Death."

Melancholy Case of Seduction and Suicide.—An inquest was held last week at the Nine Elms Tavern, South Lambeth, before William Carter, Esq., the coroner for Surrey, on the body of Elizabeth Began, aged nineteen years. It appeared from the evidence that the deceased had neither father, mother, nor relative living, but had been for several months past in service in a respectable family in Westminster, where she was much liked for her conduct. Monday week she went out for a holiday, having stated to her mistress that she was going to a friend of her mother, a little way out of town. She, however, did not return at night, and the following morning, on coming back, she was dismissed from her situation, and left without taking her box of clothes with her. A private soldier of the 1st or Grenadier Guards, stated that he had been a sweetheart of the deceased, and that she had remained in his company during Monday, and until the following morning, when he left her, advising her to go back to her situation. On being closely questioned by the coroner, he admitted that he had inveigled her into the Almonry, Westminster, one of the lowest sinks of vice and infamy in the metropolis, where she had passed the night with him. Nothing more was heard of the wretched girl until Thursday morning last, when she was seen wandering across Battersea-fields, her hair dishevelled about her face, and her dress dirty and disordered, and she was evidently in a desponding state of mind, her eyes being swollen and red with weeping, and so sorely did she appear to be affected by fatigue, that she staggered as she walked. In six hours afterwards her lifeless body was found in the river, near the steam-boat pier of the London and Southampton Railroad. There were no marks of violence about her, nor had she any money in her pockets. The coroner severely censured the heartless villany of her seducer, in which the jury acquiesced. After a very lengthened deliberation, the jury returned a verdict, "That the deceased was found drowned, but how she came into the water there was no evidence to show."

On Wednesday evening an inquest was held before Mr. Higgs, at the Black Horse, Haymarket, on the body of Mr. Ball, landlord of the White Bear Tavern, Piccadilly, the particulars of whose sudden death will be found elsewhere. The coroner briefly remarked on the melancholy nature of the case, and suggested it as very probable that the deceased came by his death from undue excitement, in endeavouring to preserve peace in his establishment—a conclusion the jury immediately coincided in by returning a verdict of "Died by the visitation of God." The inquiry, which lasted upwards of two hours, excited much interest, from the prevalence of the report that violence had been used by James, who is at present imprisoned for an assault on Mr. Holt, but the result clearly acquits him from this charge.

Death from Suffocation in a Station-house.—On Tuesday evening an inquest, adjourned from Saturday last, was resumed and concluded before Mr. Payne, the coroner, at the Bakers' Hall, Harp-lane, Great Tower-street, on the body of John Regan, aged 37, who died in a cell at the Tower Ward station-house. From the evidence given before the jury it appeared that he had been an excise officer, and lived upon a pension of £4 5s. per month. At four o'clock on Friday a policeman found him in a state of intoxication in Crutched Friars, and took him to the station-house in Great Tower-street, where he placed him in a state of insensibility upon a bench in one of the cells appropriated to the reception of drunk and disorderly persons. The clerk of the station-house visited him at eight o'clock, and found him in the same position, apparently asleep, and saw him again at a quarter before nine. Deceased had then fallen from the seat, and was lying on the ground in such a position that his head touched his knees. A surgeon was sent for, who came and pronounced him to be dead. When the jury met on Tuesday evening, Mr. Smith, surgeon, who was instructed by the coroner to make a post mortem examination, said he was of opinion that deceased died from suffocation, which could be accounted for by the position in which he was found, together with the close atmosphere of the cell. By the Coroner: The cell is not sufficiently ventilated, and its confined state would probably induce suffocation to a man found in the position in which deceased was. There is no free current of air. Verdict, "That the deceased was accidentally suffocated, and the jury recommend the police for the future to lay intoxicated persons on the floor, with their heads raised by a pillow." An inspector of police present said that he would report the verdict of the jury in the proper quarter. [We sincerely trust that the melancholy fate of this unfortunate man will have the effect of drawing the attention of the proper authorities to this subject. The station houses of the metropolis, we are informed, are the filthiest dens imaginable, and have been productive of fatal consequences on more occasions than have ever met the public eye to the unfortunate wretches immured within their walls. The Black Hole at Calcutta is a conservatory compared with a London police station-house.—Ed. I. L. N.]

IRELAND.

Dublin, July 3. The Marchioness of Waterford.—There is now every reason to be sanguine of the early restoration to perfect health of this amiable Marchioness—an event that will be the source of unmixed pleasure to all classes of the community. The latest account from Curraghmore is to the effect that her Ladyship had passed another good night, and was free from pain or fever.

It would appear by the Waterford Chronicle of the 5th inst., which contains the latest accounts from Curraghmore, that the noble Marchioness's health is sufficiently restored to banish the painful anxiety felt by the public since the occurrence of the calamity. The Marchioness's mother, Lady Stuart De Rothesay, accompanied by Mr. William Villiers Stuart, M.P., arrived there on Saturday by the Osprey steamer. The Marchioness appeared quite cheered, and in excellent spirits, after the interview with her mother.

The Ennis Riots.—Thirty-nine indictments for wilful murder have been framed by the Crown in the police case for the Ennis Assizes, in which each man of the 38 committed, is severally charged as a principal—the rest aiding and abetting.

Dublin, July 4.

General Bustamente in Dublin.—The ex-President of Mexico is expected to arrive at the Gresham Hotel, in this city, to-morrow. In compliance with the express wishes of the gallant general, there will be a review on a grand scale of all the troops in garrison shortly after his arrival.

The Ennis Riots.—The assizes for the county of Clare opened on Saturday before Baron Richards and Justice Ball; and public attention, now that the special commission has terminated, is directed to the result of the trials of the policemen and others implicated in the late disastrous riots at Ennis. Three of the wounded persons have been discharged from the County Hospital, as well as one of the constabulary, who has been completely deprived of the sight of one of his eyes by the blow of a stone from one of the rioters. On Monday Baron Richards charged the grand jury. After recapitulating the circumstances of the collision between the police and the people, his lordship went on to say that the jury should bear in mind that extreme measures should not be resorted to, unless under circumstances which calm, cool, and courageous men would deem justifiable provocation in defence of the public weal; but if they were of opinion that the people had assembled for an unlawful purpose, and had been guilty of a riot, then they ought to ignore the bills, whether against officers or constables.

Tipperary Special Commission, Clonmel, July 3.—The commission closed last night at 12 o'clock, and it is deserving of observation, that a conviction was had in every case, with the exception of that of William Kent, charged with conspiring to murder Mr. Hall; the actual perpetrator, however, of that foul crime will suffer the penalty due to it, by forfeiting his life on the 16th inst. After seven o'clock last evening the following proceedings took place in the court:—Michael Hayes was found guilty of firing at John Ryan on the 2nd of May last, at Rahernagar, with intent to murder him. Thomas Stapleton and Thomas Gleeson were convicted of shooting and badly wounding Patrick Gleeson. The Attorney-General rose at 11 o'clock, and proceeded in passing judgment on the prisoners who had been convicted, but not sentenced, intimated that he did not intend to submit any further cases for trial. He said he entertained a fervent hope that the exemplary administration of the justice of the country which had taken place would realize the object of the government in issuing this special commission, and that they should all see its fruits in the restoration of peace, tranquility and subordination to the laws of the land. The prisoners having been placed at the bar, the Lord Chief Justice Pennefather proceeded to pass sentence on them, after some prefatory observations on the enormity of the crimes of which they had been convicted—crimes which, he said, in moral guilt, were equal to murder—that it was not committed was not to be attributed to the forbearance of any one of them. After remarking at length upon the offences of each criminal, he concluded by sentencing John Pound, Michael Hayes, Cornelius Flynn, Patrick Dwyer, Thomas Stapleton, and Thomas Gleeson, to transportation for the term of their natural lives. Wm. Kent was discharged from custody this morning, and the town is resuming its ordinary appearance.

Wit in Humble Life.—A lady, anxious to get the sure direction to a particular place, asked a cabman her best way, and was answered, "Why ma'am, I think the best way is to take a cab."

TRUTH.

BY J. OATE LA MONT.

The highest reflective enjoyment that possibly can be culled from temporal causes is derived from the contemplation, by contrite heart, of an aged pair, surrounded with an upgrown family of children, in kneeling posture, adoring their Creator, and mutually performing duties by offers of prayer and praise, tendered at the foot of the only throne where the sincere Christian can worship, and, in the pure spirit of elevating humility, petitioning the author of their being on bended knee. Even a sceptic or an unbeliever cannot refuse to award his meed of admiration, when it is ascertained that the prostate forms yield only at the command of hearts deeply imbued with hope and faith, gathered from the noblest and purest source—a knowledge of the attribute and object of eternal truth. The newly-plucked lily, fresh by sipping the morning dew, ne'er decked the fair unfurrowed brow of dark-haired girl with more celestial loveliness than does truthful integrity adorn the character of man. In whatever rank the individual may be placed—whether superintending or subordinate, the ruler or the ruled—truth is ever a component feature in the formation of that character, which Bacon emphatically pictured as

"The noblest work of God!"

It is the purest gem in the patriot's cabinet. It is the most prominent feature, the innermost throb in the philanthropic heart. Its possession is the moral strength of the sincere Christian. It is inflexible in its being. It is eternal in its existence. Without it, principle, whether in ethics or in politics, is a nonentity. The conscience is luxuriously furnished that embodies truth within its pale.

Look at yon heartless, selfish, political cheat. To the purse-proud timorous fool—he professeth himself a Conservative. O, yes! There is a danger in change—there is certain wreck involved in plebeian innovation—the people are ignorant—reform is only a prelude to confusion, anarchy, and spoliation!

Hear him again with yon poor worldling, whose whole soul is warped up in lucrative speculation, whose day ideas are full of markets, probable returns, and sure profits; his night thoughts teem with visions of gold; and his dreams are composed of riches, power, and honour. Here he is a moderate Reformer, and now he is favourable to partial measures, which would benefit portions of the community. These now deserve and obtain his sanction and approval.

Then, again, to that frank brave fellow, whose earthly pilgrimage, whose past career, is marked by a continual succession of acts which bespeak the possession of a heart bursting with generous benevolence. To him—he is a Radical, and now he seeth no utility in the practical adoption of political expediency. There is no rational medium betwixt right and wrong; therefore he demands justice, and will not rest satisfied with less. Drawing close to the patriot's ear, he whispers that he has no objection to Republicanism. Honest, real, and efficient reform cannot stop short of such a consummation; and therefore he is a Republican! and when the approving smile lights up the face of the virtuous Reformer—while yet the hand of the wretch retains the grasped palm of one who seeks no reward save that of gratitude, for labouring to regenerate the whole human family—who hath spent his means, his youth, and his intellect, that he might justly earn the title of a benefactor of his fellow-creatures; with such a man, and at such a moment, the treacherous villain is inwardly calculating how much he might obtain for the betrayal of his too-confiding auditor to the bloodhounds of royal despotism. Does this wretch feel the balmy influence of truth in his secret moments? Has he one spark of principle about him? No, no: He only professeth an opinion, that he may discover a market where he may sell his politics to the highest bidder.

And he is a metaphysician! The world believes he is; but the traitor knows he is not. He knows that the labour that gained him a scholar's dignity, was stolen from the manuscripts of a poor literary gentleman, who lived in poverty and neglect, and died of pulmonary consumption, caught by excessive study and necessitous confinement.

And he is religious, too! No; the impious wretch only gives his presence to a private meeting, that he may be enabled to dupe some doted but kind-hearted old lady out of her only means of subsistance, a small pittance derived from an annuity which former friends, long buried, had provided for her support in the "sear and yellow leaf" of her existence. Religion! No; for nightly will you see him enter the fashionable "hell," and, 'mid his blackguard associates, scoffand imprecate, till even the ruined reprobate lifts up his eyes from the gaming table to scowl at the reckless blasphemer. And, twice in seven days, you may see him take his seat at the regular meetings of the " Institute," where the existence of Divinity is mocked at by the "theorists," and belief in a governing Deity is the perpetual subject of their obscene jokes.

Look at his oblique, timid glance; is it a token of his modesty? Hear his whimpering, half-decided answer to an ordinary question; is he unsophisticated? Mark his stealthy, creeping step; does he loath the sound of his own footsteps? Address him—he equivocates. Speak to him—he lies. Ha! the blackguard! beware of him!

Moral rectitude is productive of more durable happiness to its claimant than would the ownership of the wealth of Cræsus, or the power of a Julius Cæsar be to the mind panting for the realization of ambitious schemes. Place an honest man in a perilous position—does his heart quail? At sea, let the combined elements waste their fury of the frail bark—let the certainty of immediate destruction become evident to every eye; all may drink despair from the sight of approaching doom but him—the honest solitary; for he knows that his lifetime hath been spent in promoting the welfare of his fellow beings, and now he hath his reward; for he feels that his last glimpse of life is free from curse or stain, and his last moments are free from the upbraidings of a guilty conscience. Whatever his fate, he at all times, and under all circumstances, hath ever been impelled by the noblest motives that actuate humanity, and peace is the reward, for he can place his hand on an unblemished heart, and while his thoughts review the past, he raises his eyes to heaven, and in the frailty of humanity he murmurs, I have attempted to do my duty—

Let thy will be done!

Who, for dominion over slaves, or the power of saying this trash is mine, would sacrifice such a prospect—would destroy such a celestial hope?—No one; none other than the infatuated fool.

Go, seek your enjoyment in acquiring knowledge of every change society hath borne during the existence of our globe—since the first day of creation. Feast thy memory with the history of man since the first dawn of "light"—distinguish with thy learning the varied intricacies which stamp good and evil. Let the arts, sciences, painting, poetry, or philosophy, excite your ambition—'tis well; the reward is heaven if your heart be pure. Your purpose is gained if your acts are regulated by principles of rectitude; and the greatest possible amount of happiness is yours, if truth has been your companion, your adviser, and your guide. There are no terrors awaiting the mind embellished with the stern principles of moral rectitude—a hearty love of truth.

Yet with our present legislative institutions, where is the most limited indication of free scope to truthful integrity? The pulpit, the bar, the senate, and the press, each bear tokens of the unhallowed obstacles which fetter the due expression and purposes of truth. To the press especially we should look for evidence of truthfulness—where do we find it? A metropolitan journal paints in glowing colours the reponse:—"The press of this country might be omnipotent were it not hired out to the highest bidder. Pay, we fear, not principle, superintends and directs its movements. There is nothing so base which it will not oppose for the sake of pecuniary profit. The trickery, the low craft, of the newspaper press of this country, is the worst feature of the present times. Perpetually descanting upon the hollowness of our rulers, it is itself the hollowest of all public things. To suppress what is not popular—to put forth statements which have been refuted a thousand times—to cater for the prevailing taste—to feed, even to repletion, the prejudices of subscribers—to tickle them—to foster class antipathies—to mistake, to conceal, to brag, to vilify, just as it may seem most expedient for the occasion—constitute unhappily the staple practice of modern journalism."

And this is the character of the British press! Alas! the painting is too correct. The facts stated, though somewhat coarse and bitterly divulged, are perfectly true Yet the remedy is simple and effective. It is not to the press, but to the people, that this criminality is traceable. To the people only are we indebted for this press. Let the sovereign people refuse to sanction the creation of such unnatural deformity, and this press will cease to be. Let all classes support with their patronage that journal that dares to be free—that dares to inculcate the principles of justice and truth in its advocacy—and the columns of the British press will cease to poison their readers with partisan impurity. The man who refuseth to perform this duty, is more culpable than is the most criminal amongst the directors of the British press. In the fulfilment of this task—this moral duty—by the people, crime would fail to become a marketable commodity.

It is to an impure source that the abuses visible in governments owe their origin. Were it not for the passive toleration of state crimes by the people, royal government would not exist as a nursery for tyrants, and the worst features of legislative blackguardism.

Where that conduct, which constitutes what is denominated private character, lives in practical contradiction to verbal profession, there can be no confidence reposed in the individual, however frequent the reforming protestation may be sounded either in public or private. There is no integrity at the fountain source, and the stream that flows must consequently share of the original corruption. To confide with such a knowledge of existing impurity would be to evince, with fearful obliquity, the infatuated faith of idiocy. He is a fool who gives, and a knave who would accept of, besotted adulation; and where idolatry is erected on a basis of ignorance, the crime is dyed yet deeper on the part of the guilty recipient. Talk of social perfection with living evidence of such self-blinded bigotry! Why, the thing is monstrous. Yet we must not cower at the prospect of difficulty in the execution of our enterprise; still, let us aid the onward rolling progress of intelligence. The dissemination of useful knowledge universally is the best moral lever whereby reform may be accomplished, and the desired equilibrium attained and established on sure foundation. It is, indeed, time that human character had its due elevation—that the seeker should find the supremacy of the rational governing the animal man. The first step towards gaining this desideratum, is to render the lot of the humblest being comfortable—supplying every unit composing universal community with a necessary quantum of physical, domestic, intellectual, moral, and social appliances. The great mass of mankind desire such a change as this.

Where the character of man is bereft of poisonous influences, then will enfranchised nature prove the integral dignity of my axiom,

That EVERY HUMAN BEING IS MORALLY PURE BY NATURE, which may be proved by application of the following CRITERIA to discoverable facts, and solved by simple inquiry:—

I. That all mankind love virtue.

II. That humanity becomes vicious only through the instrumentality of acquired causes.

A knowledge of these facts and their proper results would regenerate the rational character of man from the imputations thrown out by false teachers of every classification of "belief." Reaction of the nobler faculties would ensue, and the world might be rendered so virtuously efficient, by the creation and adoption of simple moral stimulants, that every human being, in individual and associative capacity, would be so positioned that to desire would be to partake and to enjoy COMFORT, FREEDOM, VIRTUE, and HAPPINESS.

I assert till this after the most careful and ample study of the character of these facts and their probable bearings—after the hazardous experience of years in pursuit of the objects contemplated by the application of the proper remedy or remedies, which I believe would establish the object desired, and would force the redemption of man's real character, and thus attain the moral elevation of the entire human race.

I have buried the knowledge of these facts—I have curbed my opinions—I have held my Republicanism in abeyance, that the attempts of my oppressed fellow-countrymen, of the productive classes, might not be distracted in the pursuit of their inalienable claims to equality of right and of privilege. It is no befitting time, when a nation is struggling for political freedom, that the people should be disturbed by the blazoning of hypothetical principles; therefore, as a sincere Republican, bent on aiding the oppressed against the oppressor, my opinions are voluntarily buried until fitting times demand their advocacy. It is necessary that peculiar opinions should be held in embryo, that united efforts for a national object may be crowned with complete success

Truth can never be crushed. In vain may the satellites of ignorance scheme to coerce, or to hurl their fanatic weapons at the daring leveller. He is bent on razing the infamous structures built by craft and cruelty, and no result but their downtal will stem his reforming progress. In vain does the merciless vindictive spirit evince its hateful enmity—in vain is murder enlisted into infamous service, seeking the destruction of the moral reformer. Truth cannot be murdered. Probity can well bear the spoiler's hatred, and the mortal is safe who can shroud his principles within its folds. The efforts of guile will not unhinge his confidence in the utility of righteous change. In vain may the assassin be employed to rob the victim of the vitality of his corporeal being, his thoughts are immortal, and his opinions are fixed on immutable decrees, with eternity for their limits. The new faith will spring into renewed strength, by the nurturing sap of his life's blood.

Murder is the most durable channel through which truth may flow. The doctrines taught by the martyr are established for ever; and the oppressed desciples are inspirited with that confidence in the virtues of the original propounder, which is essential to the zealous prosecution of their reforming labours. Thus the whole world may be inoculated with the desire to know and to test the real beauty and benevolent working of the new doctrines Inspiration springs from confidence in divine origin: and when tyranny is employed to supress, the enthusiastic advocates gather courage from their associated sympathies, and see no obstacle to the realization of their purposes. Therefore, it is insanity for rulers to employ force to put down opinions. No earthly power can trample on the liberty of thought, nor shackle the freedom of opinion. Truth will have unbridled sway.

Active obstruction to motion may end in absolute annihilation; but the obstacle most difficult to surmount in human movement is not so much the result of opposition, but of obstruction. It is possible that the amount of inertia may altogether wear out, and thus destroy, progressive influence; yet the perception of the cause ought only to incite to the adoption of more effective means towards the removal. Truth is restricted to no one individual party, or nation; but is common to all.

How justly do we complain of the injury done to the furtherance of Truth's purposes by the intervention of ignorance? How justly do we grieve at the evil done to a movement having for its object the melioration of our fellow-beings, by the barriers erected at the will of prejudice and folly? And how justly do we complain of apathy in those whose station and whose interests are allied with our own? Still we must bear with the obstruction—still we must labour to convince—still we must enlighten and encourage, that our efforts may not want that numerical aid essential to the ultimate triumph of our holy design. Though our burdens are weighty, yet our hearts must sustain the load that relief may be the more certain, speedy, and effective.

"What do you think of the speech?" inquired a gentleman at a tolerated blockhead of the middle class. "The speech—the speech! why there's not a word of grammar in't!" responded Sop-pate.

This, of course was a poser; and the learned critic had the pleasure of putting down discussion on the subject during the remainder of the company's sitting. Now, the illiterate fool, being suddenly startled with the question, did not intend to utter a falsehood, and therefore sought to evade its direct solution by a cunning manœuvre; and, in utter ignorance of the matter he had decided upon—though to interpret his meaning by his words would be a difficult problem for an educated man to solve—yet he actually told a lie according to his own fashion of deciphering what his answer indicated. The poor cipher unable to answer "aye" or "no" to the question, had permitted the only feature in his quarter-of-an-ounce of brain—low cunning—to betray a feeling of brute malignity, and to allow this venom to creep into his criticism. There are numbers of these "intelligent lads" in the middle class; but to believe that such samples are at all characteristic of that class, would be tantamount to libelling the educational qualifications of the middle class; and would be by no means justified by other evidences of their fitness to think, to speak and act as rational creatures. Such a blockhead as the critic would prove a serious bar to the furtherance of mercinary or benevolent objects—a serious clog to the efforts of the good and true, and a weighty drawback to any impetus that might be given to the progress of universal enlightenment.

The fall of Carthage was less the result of Roman bravery than the natural effect pertaining to want of decision in generalship, the employment of mercenaries fighting only for a butcher's fee, and the cowardice of the Carthagenians themselves. Had history told another tale—had facts borne other evidence—Carthage might have held her pompuous court in Africa to this day; and the waters of the Tiber might be rolling over the only vestige left of Roman greatness. Let us derive a lesson from this example, and work our own freedom. Should the task demand exertion, the greater will be the share of glory to those who win the victory; and by their philanthrophic efforts they will earn a wreath of laurel, and a page in the annals of their country. Who could ask a nobler fee? But the improvements visible in the rational character of man holds out sufficiently powerful inducements to the patriot and the scholar to forward their several objects. Truth will accomplish the rest.

National Institutions, political and social, might be so constituted that physical comfort would be within reach of the feeblest arm, and the humblest effort might reach its obtainment. A wisely-governed Democratic Republic—open to those reforms which the revolutions of time demand, and those legislative changes to which a truly free government ought ever to be open—would accomplish this object, and confer this blessing on its citizens; however intimately ramified it might be in its provisoinal operation. I assert that many of the evils which we perceive existing in society are wholly occasioned by imperfect and bad government. And I likewise assert, that much of the misery and crime evident amongst us would be entirely removed by the establishment of good government.

To destroy peace, property, and life, is not a desire natural to any human being; but is—in the fact of its existence—common to bad government, and would be remedied by the adoption of a moral and rational system of legislation. It is only because certain natural laws, have been trampled upon that any human being lives in crime and misery; and it is only by the restoration of these natural laws, through the medium of efficient and good government, that every human being can be rendered comfortable, moral and happy. The cause is evident, and the effect is certain. Both will cease by the restoration of the natural laws to their simple, fair, and full operation. When prejudice warps the judgement, the decision is unfair. There partiality guides an opinion, the determination must feel the corresponding effets of limited justice. Truth cannot acknowledge the authority of either.

Examine the pages of a journal conducted by a coarse unfeeling, illiterate man—mark the critque—is there token of generous sentiment there? Is there not a bitter, crushing, unqualified severity in the opinions vomited, with all the "insolence of office," regarding the poor, sickly, timid poet's labours? Poor fellow! In purity of thought how infinitely higher he is above the callous blockhead who would ape the scholar by the weight of his denunciations. It is, indeed, humbling that the world should permit so sensitive a flower to be trodden upon by such a graceless animal. The ill-spun stuff headed "criticisms," is truly a type of the inner man who sits in judgment at a tribunal where nature never designed that such a fleshy-minded worm should sit and play the umpire. Merit should ever obtain its reward; and ignorant presumption ever should be humbled. Legislative offices ought always to be filled with men whose qualifications are mental capability and moral fitness, without respect of perons or age. Truth demands the instant fulfilment of such a law as this, that benevolence may adorn our courts of justice and of equity.

Charity hath no existence unless the healing influence be extended over the whole creation. Men who concentrate their feelings within a prescribed circle, have no claim upon society as philantrophic members. An honest man extends his sympathies to all men, and refuses to smother the blessed boon within a given limit. By extension, charity loseth not its power; but like the mountain stream, gathers additional strength in its progress: and the greater the distance over which its waters rush, the greater the probability of its assuming the noble river's majesty.

Truth has no resting-place in the selfish heart. Integrity can have no freedom in the miser's soul. The hawthorn blossom soon looseth its bloom when torn—from a wild bed or the field—it is compelled to minister, by its sweet odour, to the will of some indolent lounger in the drawing-room, or the family parlour. The song of the mavis tells more touchingly on the ear of a lover of freedom when its wild voice is heard enlivining the wilder wood, than, when encaged, the poor thing strains its little throat to give a note to its sadness in the voice of the mourner. Look at the little fellow in its mother's arms. Hear his delightful screams—a language not to be misunderstood—expressive of present felicity—the happiness he feels on being denuded of his binding habiliments. Do you not mark the vigorous springs he is making, as it bent on leaping from his mother's lap. Watch the unsettled purpose of his outstretched arms. How free! and how happy! God bless the little freeman!—he has inspired new life into an old man's heart! I wonder with what feeling his father can look upon so much unsullied enjoyment, without partaking of the little fellow's joys, and their occasion. Does his father deny that liberty is natural to man?—Having seen the happiness resulting from the enjoyment of freedom in his own sweet boy, will he retain slaves in bondage? Will he wear, even though made of purest gold, the shackles of a slave? Let the future tell! That man is not himself free who is not prepared to grant freedom to others as heartily as he demands it for himself. This is the particular hold that truth legitimately claims on the heart of a freeman.

Some minds yield free scope to their opinions upon peculiar points: but exert despotic sway on other matters. For example, we find freedom of conscience in religous belief argued rationally, sometimes eloquently, by voluntary churchmen, who may be the veriest tyrants in their secular opinions. Some political economists seek all that an ultra would ask, in items, who would reject a sweeping measure of economy. Some will loquaciously enlist your ear with tales illustrative of the superiority of Republican over Monarchical systems of goverament; and when asked to lend their aid in practically forwarding their own views, they dumfounder you with—I am only a Republican in theory! I do not see the present practicability of working out a Republican change! Society, in this country, is not yet prepared to adopt such a revolution in legislation at once,—it must be gradual to be safe! And, again, some object to the present progress of democracy on like grounds; they cannot perceive the immediate necessity of conceding an act of expedient justice; because convulsion might ensue from the suddenness of the grant, and the world might thus be rendered a scene of anarchy! Every one of these doubters, possibly will be found conscientious in nursing these their peculiar opinions, their crotchets; because they may naturally spring from insanity, or ignorance, and until you remove the cause you will never banish the effect. Ever, and for ever, they must harp on the same dull monotonous string; and their crotchets will be eternally adduced in defiance of the certain and evident ruin that will ensue, by adhering to such threadbare nostrums. But in some cases these diseased opinions originate through deficiency in the personal amount of moral courage, and, consequently, a want of truthfulness in proclaiming opinions; a playing with time and circumstances, so that real sentiments may be held in abeyance, and thus delay the publication of intentions until fitting and proper opportunity level the danger and compel the avowal of real opinions. This is sheer cowardice, yet there is much caution and prudence involved in the determination, although viewed in its best phasis, it is virtually tampering with Truth. Men of narrow mind and limited education, especially, will be found to cloak the truth by some cunning, yet eternally erroneous, opinion. Hence there is danger in the intimacy of nobler minds with those where cunning marks a grovelling disposition; familiarity would lead to presumptuous daring, and when the impudence is summarily checked by the withdrawal of friendly connexion, a spirit of envious malignity is engendered, and the new-born hatred is nursed in secret, like the tiger's leap, awaiting the moment when the victim may be destroyed; or, like the fowler reserving his deadly ball until the "mark" may ensure the murderer's success. There is no spirit of rectitude here.

Truth cannot be tested by a selfish standard; and yet this test is universally applied. In proof, witness the notions of "capability" expressed by musicians, numerical calculators, painters, and poets, in relation to a particular forte. They will deny the existence of soul where their peculiar notions are not embraced in the intellectual character of the individual of whom they judge. So it was with matters of belief—the selfish standard is ever the criterion upon which an opinion is based: hence Christianity suffers by the comparison, and instead of a religion teeming with benefit to man we have a corrupted faith converted into a weapon of policy in the hands of a priesthood to accomplish their own aggrandizing purposes; and blasting that priest-craft and priest-ism may wallow in power. Christianity is not an exclusive faith; and yet the sectary disciplinarian has so rendered it. But Truth, in all native purity will yet establish her supremacy. Heaven speed her reign! Man should suffer no dictatory power to cramp the religious mind. Every sane-minded human being possesses sufficient intellect to comprehend plain language, and to form a rational opinion upon revealed facts. Had this right of conscience been practised, instead of subserviency to the will of headstrong blockheads, wearing the garb of teachers, Scotland would not point to Dunbar and Bothwell-Brig, as fields staining her historical escutcheon, and sad testimonials of her vain efforts to protect the privelege of opinion and the rights of conscience.

Truth cannot be restricted to particular ranks, and in proof, I may cite that many of the most pathetic and heart-stirring appeals in favour of truth, justice, liberty, and humanity, were honest outpourings from the hearts of women of ranks of life. Yes; many of the permanently-brilliant effusions which appear in radical journals, and startle readers with their glowing fervour, are the offspring of pens weilded by ladies, with hands as delicate as their hearts are pure. Unnatural deformity of feeling is not common to any human being; and when we glance at the upper circles, the evidence in favour of benevolence of heart amongst the ladies of Britain—where interest ambition, and avarice hold not their cursed abode—beareth out, in broad and palpable distinctness, the fact that Truth cannot be restricted to any particular rank.

Designed corruptions in very many instances are intended to blind and to restrict the operation of Truth. Hence technical terms have been introduced into science; in general, with no other object than that of veiling the truth. But let me not be misunderstood. While I say say generally, I do not mean invariably; for I am well aware that many terms are used in the elucidation of science, scientific objects, and in the diffusion of knowledge that are absulutele indispensible, having no synonymous words, signyfying the the same object or thing, in the English language. Moral philosophy is crowded with these technical terms, consequently its purposes are buried from those of our fellow beings who, unfortunately, have not been duly and legally initiated. The governing laws which regulate external nature may be perceived and noted by the inpuiring mind; but the nicety of their application, each to each, require attention and time to reflect, to weigh, and to understand. That attention and that time essential to the study cometh not within reach of the British operative; and indeed it would be cruelty refined to incite the ardour of his mind to the prosecution of a study so useful as that of moral philosophy; for his days are eaten up with toil, his evenings are lost in domestic cares, and his night hours are consumed in slumber. What a position for a rational man! Did the Divine author of his being contemplate such a restriction of moral law in breathing life and intellect into his frame? Was he formed by the Creator only to fulfil an animal destiny, and to perform animal duties at the expense of every nobler gift with which nature has so bounteously supplied him? For what purpose has he been endowed with senses, feelings and mental organs? Surely it is not to fulfil an animal destiny; for then certain reflective organs are unneccesary, except with the object of accumulating the means of support neccesary to animal existence. Look at the mason, the blacksmith, the joiner, the cotton-spinner, and the weaver; what is human existence to them? Have they spare time for recreation, instruction, or reflection? Where is their means of procuring, instruments suitable to such-indulgence? Talk to them about the vital neccesity of procuring, for themselves and their wives and children, free air, warm clothing, wholesome diet, and comfortable homes; you but mock at their wants, and impiously heap burning lava on their toil-devoted heads. Is it possible that Christian reformer patriot can contemplate the condition of the careworn operative without pledging heart and soul for his redemption from a state of existence so enslaved, so unnatural, so horrible? Can the moral philosopher know his wants and refuse his aid? No; humanity revolts at the continuance of a system so diabolical. Morality shudders at the frightful spectacle; and Truth, eternal Truth—by all that's sacred on the earth—Truth, eternal Truth, shall yet prevail; and the humblest human being will yet enjoy peace, comfort, freedom, and happiness on earth.—Amen.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—Our market, since this day se'nnight has been again very scantily supplied with wheat of home produce, yet the general quality of it has proved extremely fine, both as relates to the red and white parcels The finest descriptions have commanded a firm inquiry, at, in some instances, an advance of 1s. per quarter; but, in the middling and inferior kinds, a limited amount of business has been transacted, at unaltered rates. Foreign wheat, both free and in bond, has gone off heavily, at unaltered currencies. Grinding barley has declined 1s. per quarter; but malting and distilling sorts have remained about stationary. In other grain next to nothing has been passing.

Wheat Essex and Suffolk, Red, 53s 57s 54s 60s; fine, 54s 56s 60s; old 56s 58s 60s 63s, White, new, 54s 56s 58s, fine, 60s 63s, superfine, new, 64 66s 68s 72s; Talavera, 57s 60s 74s; old, 66s 64s 71s; Foreign, free, 51s 54 56s 60s; fine, 56s 60s 62s; superfine, 65s 68s 73s.

REPRINT.

BRITISH AGRICULTURE.

The grand Agricultural Meeting at Bristol—of which the details and illustrations this week occupy so large a portion of our space—naturally induces us to a contemplation of the fine subject which it involves—the condition, prospects, and influences of British Agriculture. The tone of this journal has, we hope, hitherto been a marked and determined one. We trust we have proved to our readers a strong and honest impartiality of purpose in our treatment of every political discussion; and that the social happiness and moral condition of the Empire have been studied by us with all our considerations of the means of national greatness—or the remedies for national distress. It is plain, we hope, to the wide community which has so largely patronised us, that we are wedded to none of its parties—not biassed towards any of its monopolies not the advocates of any of its individual influences—but only the general supporters of a general public good. It will never, therefore, be expected of us, that we shall set up the great Commercial and Manufacturing interests of England against the equally great Agricultural; or that, on the other hand, we shall crush the energies of invention, and bow down the loom unto the plough. We look upon both of these sections of the national grandeur of our country with an eye of pride that will gather no jealousy within its beautiful vision: philosophy weds rather than severs them in our mind—we make them contingent in our mental speculations, upon each other's welfare—we refuse to regard them as antagonist and we believe their union in peace capable of achieving, only in a happier direction, as much as the union of our glorious navy with our invincible army amid the wilder strifes and contingencies of war.

This is the spirit in which we are determined to survey the two interests—not indeed without respect to the present condition and sufferings of the country, although certainly without consideration—except for the relief of the people—for any of their rival claims for political sympathy and support.

With this preliminary we can draw no odium upon our principles; we need invent no excuse for our pride, when we confess to an exulting approval of the value, the importance, and the social benefit of such a distinguished celebration as that which the Royal Agricultural Society has been all the week displaying in the bosom of the ancient city of Bristol; and thence communicating its energies, its spirit, and its power through a thousand warm and cheerful ramifications of the national heart.

The mighty spirit of English commerce has made its giant strides up to the gates of the garner-house and among the furrows of the plough; and thither we bear it company with honour so long as the tide is allowed to ebb, and prosperity to roll its golden flood, in equal measure, over the farmer's freehold, the merchant's city, and the manufacturer's home. We are content, too, that their adversities—when adversity cannot be averted—shall be borne alike; and it is only a false struggle for power that we would reprobate, and a flimsy political economy that we abjure.

But in such a meeting as that of the Bristol Association we see neither of these; we see only the fine old agricultural spirit of the land breaking out in its purity and strength. We recognise the attachment to the soil—a feeling identical with the love of country—asserting its mastery over the yeoman-heart of England. The farmer-gentlemen assemble in the farmer-spirit of a more innocent and less advanced age, in the manly open-heartedness of a noble calling, in the pride and purpose of a truly English pursuit. Their politics are left at home; their jealousies are discarded; they have one cherished ambition to blazon before the world, and that is the elevating, the improving, the strengthening of the glorious agriculture of their native land. They repair to the rendezvous with a feeling as glowing as the seal of glory upon a sunset landscape—and yet as gentle and affectionate as the emotion of a mother who greets her child at school. With all this they mix up the emulations of science—the enterprise over new discovery—the contentions of personal skill—the honourable strife for prizes—the noble pursuit of perfection through every vein and artery of their manly craft. And in their great gathering they are countenanced by the high, the noble, the estimable of all classes in the state. The great leaders of legislative power, the commercialist, the free trader, the oppositionist, and the minister, fling away party distinctions and personal predilection, and go "to lend a hand unto the plough." Toryism becomes liberal, liberalism is grown tory, and yet the consistency of each remains unscathed.

There is something especially exhilarating, interesting, English, in the whole exhibition. In almost every section of the great display, some national superiority is indicated. In the implements of husbandry, the qualities of grass and grain, the splendid breeds of quadrupedal animals, the improving principles of general cultivation, and the domestic produce of the field and farm—in and by all these there is a gratifying conviction brought home to us, that our ambition is brighter, our domestic industry more toilful and enduring of spirit, our labour more productive, and our enterprise more full of reward, than the similar attributes of any other country in which commerce asserts her rivalship, and manufacture is a rushing river that has an overflowing torrent for every tributary stream. In such meetings, and on such occasions as our journal this week illustrates and describes, the genius of British agriculture is triumphant and alive, and it is impossible that it should have presence in any part of an empire like this without greetings of cordiality, and the enthusiasm of a true and national admiration.

After all, however, these great demonstrations—no matter in what sections of society they may occur—are, when divested of politics, only the landmarks of example—the example of doing good in the immediate sphere of interest in which they are worked out. But as they thus lead to benefit in one way, we may have fond anxieties that the spirit which they engender will also much provoke it in many others—that it will tend to allay jealousies and promote the common-sense welfare of each particular class—that every new improvement suggested, and every powerful result achieved, may be directed towards the amelioration of the present distresses of the land, and that a communicative spirit may be engendered by speculation between the poverty of the humble and the purses of the rich. Nor, while the theme now flashes upon us in another aspect, can we forbear from including the state of many of our agricultural districts, in our contemplation of the acts of this very Association, for enlarging their general influences, and aiding their capabilities of wealth. We hope most faithfully that the labourer, in all the contingencies of his present destiny, may be benefited equally with the farmer, and that the genius of invention may never be too powerfully marshalled against the genius of the soil. We earnestly desire a speedy amelioration of the suffering of all classes of the population; and, as we believe those of many of the agricultural peasants are not among the least, we cannot pour out our praises upon any celebration of interest among the lords of the soil, without anxious aspirations for its children too—we must, while lending our support to the best interests of agriculture, find a sympathising voice also for its depression and distress.

GROUP OF CIRCASSIANS.

We present to our readers another of our characteristic sketches of the people of distant lands. In the bold grouping of the armed mounted militia of the Caucasus which embodied the first page of one of our former numbers, we enlisted the interest of many of our subscribers who had affixed their eyes upon the Eden-like allurements of that fertile territory, and whose curiosity—newly awakened by the pencil of our artist—appealed to us for information with no small eagerness, and asked our advice and guidance regarding the selection of the new soil as the emigrant's home. The subject of the present sketch is of character similar to that of the former one, but its aspect of interest is quite of another kind. Circassia, does not, like Texas, afford any lure of advantage to the oppressed and over-abounding population of these realms; but yet we regard its destinies as a country with no small sympathy, and its people have many claims upon our peculiar regard. In a political sense, we may regard the land as one of the hardiest barriers against the ambition of Russia; in a social sense, we have possessed to an extraordinary degree the respect and affections of its entire people. The deep reverence which the Circassians have taught themselves to entertain towards the name and character of Great Britain has become proverbial among travellers. They have appreciated, and even magnified, our power; they have courted our alliance with the warmest protestations of regard; they have looked to England as their giant-arm of protection against aggressive Russia; and have, we lament to say, bestowed upon us a much larger amount of good feeling than we have ever had the gratitude to return. They are honest, hardy, brave, and powerful, and deserved better treatment at our hands. Russian ambition is now pouring into their territory large armies of barbarian troops, and the persecution which Circassia hoped to have seen averted by England is hot and vengeful in its pursuit of her sons. In the group which our artist has depicted, a Circassian woman is supposed to have escaped from the invading enemy, and is bringing intelligence to her countrymen in arms.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.—The intelligence received by the Paris papers of Friday and Saturday, turned principally on the elections which were to take place on Sunday, and which were expected to be favourable to ministers.

The National refers to the judgments pronounced by the tribunals of St. Omar and Tarascon, confirming the right of British journalists to convey despatches by special courier, and observes that "those decisions are conformable in the letter as well as in the spirit of the law. It is evident that those couriers are acknowledged by the post-office authorities, because passports are delivered to them in their character of courier, nor can they be said to interfere with the transport of letters, as they are paid on the parcels they carry."

The Journal des Debats publishes a report from Admiral Duperre to the King, stating that whilst his Majesty's cutter Aube was stationed off Port Jackson, New South Wales, thirteen of her crew having eaten some poisonous fruit which they found on shore, would have perished in the absence of the medical officer of the Aube, but for the humane attention of Dr. William Davies, an English physician, who happened to be on the spot. The Admiral concludes by proposing that a gold medal should be presented to Dr. Davies, which his Majesty has been graciously pleased to command.

The French express of Monday was entirely taken up with details of the general elections on the preceding day.

The pigeon express received on Wednesday morning from Paris, gives the election returns at a gross majority of seventy-five in favour of the present ministers.

DEATH OF THE DUKE OF ORLEANS.—An express dated Wednesday evening at six o'clock, has brought the distressing intelligence of the sudden death of the Duke of Orleans. In the attempt to assassinate the King on the 28th of July, 1835, the Dukes of Orleans, Nemours, and the Prince de Joinville, rode together; the young duke, however, escaped; Nemours' horse and that of the prince were both wounded, but not severely. The duke married on the 30th of Jan., 1837, a princess of the house of Mecklenburgh Schwerin. The marriage was celebrated at Fontainbleau. By this lady, his Royal Highness has left two sons, the Count of Paris, born August 24th, 1838, and the Duke of Chartres, born Nov. 9, 1840.

The Paris papers give the details of the above melancholy affair. The Duke of Orleans, who was to have set out for Plombières, where the Duchess is at present, was returning from Neuilly, after taking leave of his family, when his horses ran away with his carriage, near the Porte Maillot, and the Prince, having by some overturned, jumped out, but in so doing his spurs, others say his sword, caught in his cloak, and occasioned him to fall to the ground with violence. The consequence was, a congestion of the brain, which terminated fatally. The Prince was taken up senseless, and conveyed into the nearest house, where he was immediately attended by Dr. Bauny, assisted by Dr. Pasquier, the Prince's physician. He never, however, recovered the use of his senses. The King, Queen, and Duke D'Aumale arrived at the spot almost immediately. The rector of St. Philippe de Roule administered the Sacrament of the Extreme Unction to the Prince, who expired shortly after three o clock. The Prince was about to take the command of a camp of 40,000 men; but, alas! who can reckon upon to-morrow?

PORTUGAL.—By advices from Lisbon to the 4th instant, by the Braganza steamer, we are acquainted with the gratifying fact, that both the commercial and slave-trade treaties had been signed by the two Plenipotentiaries on the previous day, and were forwarded by this packet.

The Duke of Palmella would not immediately enter the Administration. His grace's resolution on this subject had taken the Government by surprise, but it was expected that after the division on the first stormy debate in the Cortes, which were to be opened by the Queen in person on Sunday, the 10th inst., that his grace would enter the Administration as Secretary for Foreign Affairs. A large majority for the Ministry on the opening address was anticipated, every single deputy beyond the Lisbon district being a pledged supporter of Costa Cabral.

The British officers who have claims on the Portuguese Government for services performed during the Peninsular campaigns, and to the payment of the first instalment of whose claims the Finance Minister allocated the proceeds back, have not yet had a farthing paid to them of that amount. The delay is partly owing to negligence at the War-office, and partly to disputes as to the nature of the payment. The Foreign-office,sets up the absurd pretentension of paying these claims in the nominal value which fairly represents the amount of the Government paper, but in the aforesaid paper itself—a very questionable sort of "flimsy," and perhaps an entirely unmarketable commodity

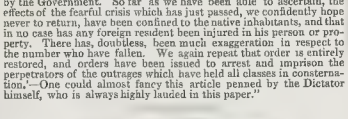
TURKEY.—Letters have been received, viâ Vienna, from a correspondent in the Turkish capital, dated the 22nd ult., five days later than the advices published in our columns through the Levant mail of the 1st instant. Our present communication chiefly refers to some misunderstandings between Russia and the Ottoman Porte, evincing the disposition of the latter to assert its full independence, and to prove that "the integrity of the empire" is not mere verbiage.

UNITED STATES.—By the Quebec Liverpool mail-ship we have accounts from New York to the 21st of June inclusive. Political party strife seems to have cooled down completely in America, which gives us reason to hope that the pending negotiations with Lord Ashburton will lead to a favourable result. Credit was still at a very low ebb in all the commercial cities of the Union, and only first-rate securities could be negotiated; but for these money was offered freely, and prices were on the advance. There was much doubt about the alteration of the tariff, and people were afraid to act until it was fixed. The quantity of cotton shipped off since the 1st of September amounted to 1,302,040 bags, against 1,131,209 bags in the same time last year.

EMIGRANTS, &c.—Over 3000 people landed in the city of New York in the last two days, including agriculturists, and all kinds of mechanics. In the city they cannot remain. We have 4000 persons off our own already out of employ, and the number lately thrown adrift by the navy orders has added to the calamity. To the country then they must go, and there is room enough for all if they will but follow good advice. To these people we say, go to the mountainous parts of Delaware and Ulster, and see the Scotch and Welsh settlement in the vicinity of Delhi. The lands recommended may be reached in two days. It is fully to go to the far west, away from all kindred, friends, and connexions.—New York Herald.

There arrived at Quebec this year 16,292 emigrants; last year, 13,509: increase so far, 2783.

The following horrifying details of a massacre at Buenos Ayres are extracted from the city article of the Times of Wednesday last:—"Letters from Buenos Ayres dated the 22nd and 25th of April, give an account of the terrible atrocities that have been recently committed, and which seem only to have just terminated at that date. The 'Mashorguers,' so well known as fanatical partisans of Rosas, have massacred 500 or 600 of the 'Unitarians,' the work of destruction being carried on night and day with a fury which seemed only to increase as the bloodshed progressed. The victims were hurried from place to place, and slaughtered like cattle. There was no distinction made between young and old, rich and poor, but the mere suspicion that a man was a 'Unitarian' was sufficient to act was required, sufficient to mark him as a victim. The hatred against the unfortunate 'Unitarians' does not seem to have ended with their lives, but their bodies were denied the ordinary rites of burial, the mass of victims being thrown into a trench without shroud or coffin. All those who could make their escape fled to Monte Video; but numbers have concealed themselves, and have been protected by the foreign residents at Buenos Ayres. The French officers of the brig Tactique and schooner L'Echiv, are spoken of in terms of the highest commendation, having carried off hundreds, and thus saved them from being put to the sword. At the same time surprise is expressed, that although the massacre was carried on for upwards of three weeks, there was no assistance during the whole time from any British man-of-war. It is true that in general the British residents seem to have been secure, but even their security does not appear to be without exception, for in one instance certain members of the Government called on an influential British merchant to request a loan of money, and on receiving a refusal threatened his life. Mr. Mandeville, the English Consul, had sent to Rio for assistance, and it is said that he was seen in the streets escorted by two soldiers. The atrocities thus narrated are perhaps scarcely less remarkable than the enslaved state of the press, which is most forcibly exhibited on the present occasion. The British Packet, the Buenos Ayres journal, which is published in the English language, contains no other account of a massacre of hundreds of persons than the following, which is scarcely intelligible to those who have not derived information from some private source:—'We are most happy to be able to announce, that the authority of the laws, momentarily disowned, is now at other times proverbially well ordered and quiet city, has been again acknowledged, and that order is now entirely restored through the energetic, effective measures, adopted by the Government. So far as we have been able to ascertain, the effects of the fearful crisis which has just passed, we confidently hope never to return, have been confined to the native inhabitants, and that in no case has any foreign resident been injured in his person or property. There has, doubtless, been much exaggeration in respect to the number who have fallen. We again repeat that order is entirely restored, and orders have been issued to arrest and imprison the perpetrators of the outrages which have held all classes in consternation.'—One could almost fancy this article penned by the Dictator himself, who is always highly lauded in this paper."



IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The Duke of BUCCLEUCH reported from the select committee that the house might proceed with the consideration of the Mines and Collieries Bill.

Lord BROUGHAM, pursuant to notice, brought forward his motion on the subject of distress, and concluded a very long speech by moving the appointment of a committee of inquiry.—The Earl of RIPON opposed the motion, on the ground that it would be unwise to create expectations, by the appointment of a committee, which could not be realized by that measure.—The debate was protracted to a late hour, but consisted of little more than a repetition of the statements and arguments advanced during the often-adjourned discussion of the same subject in the other house of Parliament.

On the division the numbers were—

Contents	.. ..	14
Non-contents	.. ..	61
Majority against the motion	.. ..	—47

Their lordships then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS. MONDAY.

Several bills were advanced a stage.

Sir R PEEL gave notice of his intention to move on Tuesday for leave to bring in a bill for the more effectual protection and security of her Majesty's person.

Mr. O'CONNELL brought up the report of the Belfast magistrates committee, with the minutes of evidence, which were ordered to be printed

In reply to Mr. Hume, the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER stated that the Mint was at work upon silver coin, and was supplying the Bank as fast as possible. The Bank had recently issued £200,000 in silver.

In moving the order of the day for the house to resolve itself into committee of supply, Sir R. PEEL took occasion to advert to the statement made by Lord Palmerston a few evenings ago, to the effect that Lord Auckland had been requested by the present Government to retain the office of Governor-General of India, and to the inference drawn by the noble lord from that fact, viz., that the present Government had expressed its approbation of the policy pursued with respect to Afghanistan. The right hon. baronet denied the statements of the noble lord.

Mr. WILLIAMS, as an amendment to the motion for going into a committee of supply, moved the going into committee on a reconsideration of the corn-laws, with a view to their total repeal.—The debate on this motion was exceedingly long. The principal speakers were Sir R. Peel, Lord J. Russell, Mr. Cobden, Lord Howick, and Sir J. Hammer. The latter gentleman, who is a Conservative member, supported the motion.

On the division the numbers were—

For the motion	.. ..	117
Against it	.. ..	231
Major.ty	..	—114

The motion was then put that "the Speaker do leave the chair, which being carried, the house resolved itself into a committee of supply.

Sir G. CLERK moved the sum of £806 368 for the expenses of the war in China. After some discussion, the vote was passed

Sir G. CLERK next moved a grant of £108,000 for militia and other expences in Canada, which was also agreed to.

After another vote had been taken, the opposition members, who demanded time, and complained of voting away public money at that late hour, moved adjournment after adjournment, to which, at length, Sir R. Peel yielded.—The resolutions were reported, and the house resumed

Sir J. GRAHAM announced the intention of taking the committee on the Poor-law Bill at half-past four o'clock to-morrow (Tuesday).

The house then adjourned at three o clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

Several petitions were presented against certain clauses of the Mines and Collieries Bill.

On the motion of the Marquis of CLANRICARDE, the Witnesses Indemnity Bill was read a second time, went through committee, was reported, read a third time, and passed, the standing orders having been suspended in order to allow the bill to be passed through the several stages.

The Marquis of LONDONDERRY, in presenting petitions against the Mines and Collieries Bill, read several documents and communications calculated to elucidate the subject

Lord WHARNCLIFFE, after laying on the table the Minutes of the Council of Education, for the years 1841 and 1842, presented a petition, signed by above 1400 persons who had received instruction in the elements of music in the classes at Exeter Hall, which prayed that means might be given to the Committee of the Privy Council for Education, to render assistance to those classes. The noble lord detailed at considerable length the advantages which had arisen, and the further advantages which were promised by the system; and expressed a decided opinion in favour of the object the petitioners had in view. The Marquis of LANSDOWNE and Lord BROUGHAM corroborated the statements, and concurred in the views of the Lord President: the latter expressing an especial interest in the extension of the system among the Dissenters of Scotland.—Lord WHARNCLIFFE observed that if the Dissenters of Scotland undertook to build a normal school, as those of England had done, they would then have the same claim to assistance.—The petition was then laid on the table.

The Drainage Bill was read a third time

Their lordships then adjourned unto Thursday

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY

Sir R. PEEL presented a petition from the music classes at Exeter Hall, similar to that presented by the Lord President to the House of Peers, and expressed his entire approbation of its prayer

Sir R. PEEL then rose to make the motion of which he had given notice, for leave to bring in a bill for the better protection and security of her Majesty's person. He took a brief review of the statutes respecting treason, of which he declared his reluctance to increase the number. In the case of Francis, who had been indicted as a traitor, it had been found expedient after conference with the judges who tried and the law officers who prosecuted him, to remit the extreme penalties of treason, and in compliance with their unanimous opinion, to deal with the criminal upon the same principles which would have guided the exercise of mercy in a case where the attack had been upon the life of a subject. But it was felt that, without treating those miscreants as guilty of high treason, some law was requisite for deterring them from the repetition of their base attempts—some law, which, instead of encouraging a false and stupid sympathy in their behalf, should contain them in that contempt and that sort of punishment which befitted their disgraceful practice. The bill, therefore, which he sought leave to introduce would inflict for the offences of presenting firearms at her Majesty, or striking or attempting to strike her person with missiles, and for various other acts of violence intended to alarm her Majesty or disturb the public peace, the penalty of seven years' transportation, with previous imprisonment and bodily chastisement.—Lord J. RUSSELL, Mr. HUME, Mr. O'CONNELL, and Col. SIBTHORP, severally expressed their approbation of the measure.—Leave having been given by an unanimous vote Sir R. PEEL brought in the bill, which was then read a first and second time, and was ordered to be committed on Wednesday.

On the order of the day being read for the commitment of the POOR LAW Amendment Bill, some explanations were given by Sir JAMES GRAHAM, in answer to a question from Mr. LIDDELL, respecting the Irish Poor Law Commissioners

Mr T. DUNCOMBE asked whether, at this period of the session, within a few days of the expiration of the existing Poor-law, the Ministers were serious in their intention to press the now pending Poor-law Amendment Bill, which it was obviously impossible that the Legislature could get through in time. He observed upon the great inconvenience which would occur if the existing law should expire before the new bill could pass, and urged the Government to content itself with a short and temporary act.—Sir JAMES GRAHAM answered that he should persevere, unless the house should intimate an adverse opinion. An act continuing the commission for only a single year would, he was convinced, so damage its character as materially to impair its usefulness.—Captain BERNAL decried the friends of this bill to remember that to such a measure as this there might be a factious support, as well as a fair one opposition. He feared there was some connexion between the Poor-law and the Corn-law, for when bread was dear gentlemen dreaded high poor rates. He objected to the existing law peculiarly on account of the bastardy clauses. He reminded Sir Robert Peel of having, throughout the general election, connived at the declarations of his supporters against that law which he now called on them to uphold; and he appealed certain members as having given pledges to their constituents which they were now very far from being inclined to redeem.—After some conversation between several members, Sir R. PEEL pressed the house to go into committee, declaring all desire to force a measure unduly, by dint of a majority, but protesting also against the right of a minority to go on obstructing the measures which a majority might approve. Such habit of obstruction would furnish a formidable argument against popular discussion. If, when the bill should arrive at a third reading, it should not meet the approval of members, they would then have the opportunity of opposing it in toto.—Many members successively rose, and pressed the Government to concede a temporary continuation of the commission, so as to give time for a full discussion of the whole subject in a future year. At length, on a very urgent though temperate appeal from Lord SANDON, Sir J. GRAHAM assured the house that Ministers did not intend to proceed with the bill when the lateness of the session should have thinned the attendance. If members should be leaving town by the time when the house should have assented to the prolongation of the powers of the commission for five years, he would postpone the other clauses to the next session, at an early period whereof the Government, he pledged himself, would introduce a bill, embodying the suggestions contained in the present measure, with such other relaxations as the experience of the interval should have been found to warrant. In proof of the spirit in which Government was prepared to act, he would appeal to many of the improvements proposed in the present measure, and to all the general orders which had recently been promulged by the commissioners. But, considering the arduousness of the duty which, under the circumstances of present distress, the commissioners would now have to discharge, he could not consent to disparage their authority by limiting their term of office to a single year.—Leave house then resolved itself into committee.

On the first clause, which proposes to continue the commission until 1847, Mr. SHARMAN CRAWFORD moved, as an amendment, that the commission should be only until 1843, resting his argument, not only on grounds of humanity, but on the principles of constitutional liberty.—Mr. FERRAND seconded the motion, reentering largely into the subject of the Keighly Union, and Mr. Mott's report.—The amendment was supported by Mr. Aglionby, Mr. Hardy, Sir C. Napier, Mr. Liddell, Mr. Borthwick, and Lord Sandon.—Mr. C WOOD thought that, instead of shortening the proposed duration of the commission, it would be wiser to make it perpetual.—Sir JAMES GRAHAM supported the clause in its present form.—Mr. THOTTER was not in favour of agitating this question from year to year. General Johnson, Mr. Bucke, Captain Pechell, Mr. Semble, and Mr. Muntz, severally supported the amendment.—The committee then divided—

For the original motion	.. .. ..	104
Against it	.. .. ..	32
Majority against the amendment	.. ..	—72

On the question that the clause stand part of the bill, Colonel SIBTHORP said he should take the sense of the committee upon the question.—General JOHNSON and Sir Charles Grey supported the clause.—Lord WORSLEY said that his constituents generally were in favour of the bill, and he should, therefore, though contrary to his wish, support upon this occasion her Majesty's Government. The committee then divided, and the numbers were—

For the motion to report progress	.. ..	19
Against it	.. ..	175
Majority	.. ..	—162

Mr. FIELDEN then moved that the Chairman leave the chair.—The motion was negatived without a division. The committee then divided on the main question—

For the clause	.. ..	146
Against it	.. ..	26
Majority against the clause	.. ..	—120

The clause was then agreed to, and the house having resumed, the Chairman reported progress, and ordained leave to sit again.

On the order for the Linen Manufacturers (Ireland) Bill being put, Mr. LABOUCHERE asked to what extent the bill was to be limited, and the term for which it was to be continued?—Mr. GLADSTONE said the term was one year, and the next session.

Sir JAMES GRAHAM obtained leave to bring in a bill for regulating the dioceses of St. Asaph and Bangor. The house then adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—WEDNESDAY.

The house did not sit.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

Mr. HUME, on the motion being read for going into committee on the bill for the protection of her Majesty's person, desired to know whether the Ministers, who were now very unanimous, were prepared to ask for any grant with any measure of economy. He would recommend that they should advise her Majesty to reduce the expenses of her household by one-half. He believed that the expenditure of the Queen were very unnecessarily large. The same principle ought to be applied to the whole civil expenditure, upon which he said that two or three millions sterling might be saved. Particularly, he would call upon the public servants, and the pensioners to make a sacrifice upon their incomes at least for two or three years.—Sir R. PEEL presumed that the speech just made had been delivered under the mistaken apprehension that a motion then before the house was for going into committee of supply. He showed the impracticability of making any material reduction upon the estimates of this year. There were many special causes of increase in them, for which the present Ministers were not answerable, such as the occupation of Syria and of China; but on the other hand, in a variety of instances, there was an actual saving. He regretted the reference to her Majesty's personal expenditure and bounty, and hoped that the reference to her Majesty's personal expenditure and bounty would not needless obstruction. Sir ROBERT INGLIS rebuked Mr. Hume for his topics, and for the occasion which he had taken for introducing them.—Mr. HUME defended himself; and in his turn was severely seconded by Mr. WILLIAMS.—Sir R. PEEL interposed in a conciliatory tone.—Sir R. INGLIS explained; and the altercation then ceasing, the Protection Bill went through committee.—Sir R. PEEL took this opportunity of stating that FARGUS was to be transported to the most penal of the convict colonies.

After some questions and answers upon miscellaneous subjects, the house resolved itself into committee of supply.

In reply to Mr. HAWES, Sir R. PEEL said that the pressure of other business had prevented the Government from giving any notice to the question of Church Extension, as to other important subjects. The Government, therefore, would not, during the present session, propose any grant for Church Extension.

The vote was agreed to.

On the vote for the repairs of the Royal Palaces a conversation arose, in the course of which it was stated by the Earl of LINCOLN, that a sum of money voted last year for the erection of a conservatory at Buckingham Palace, had, at the special request of her Majesty, been applied to the provision of a private chapel.

The one and several other votes were passed, after desultory conversations.

On the question that £82,300 be granted for defraying the salaries of the officers of the two Houses of Parliament.

Mr. HUME wished to know what was the proportion which would be required for the House of Lords, and not receiving an answer which he deemed satisfactory, moved that, instead of the sum proposed, only £41,300 should be granted.

The committee divided—

For the amendment	.. ..	23
Against it	.. ..	90
Majority	.. ..	—67

The house having resumed,

The Protection of her Majesty's Perso ..read a third time and passed.

The house then adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY

Several petitions were presented against the Mines and Collieries Bill

Their lordships went into committee on the Railways Bill, and Lord CAMPBELL moved the insertion of a clause, forbidding the locking the doors of railway carriages against the consent of the passengers.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said the clause was quite unnecessary, as the railway companies had discontinued the practice, to the great annoyance of many of the passengers.

After some debate, the clause was rejected by a majority of four.

The bill for the better protection of her Majesty was read a first time.

The Mines and Collieries Bill, after a speech full of information on the subject from the Earl of DEVON, was read a second time without a division.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS. THURSDAY.

Mr FERRAND presented a petition from North, Glamorganshire, against the truck system

Mr MONTZ gave notice that early next session he should move a committee to inquire whether the distressed state of the country arose from the state of the corn-laws and money-laws; also what proportion wages bore to the price of corn.

Sir F. BURDETT gave notice of a motion to address her Majesty, to erect a monument to the memory of Sir Sydney Smith.

The Tobacco Bill was fixed to be read a second time on Monday next.

Mr. HUME brought forward his motion for the opening of cathedrals, the British Museum, and other public properties, to the people generally

Mr. EWART seconded the motion

Sir R. PEEL agreed to the general purport of the motion; but thought the matter had better be left in hands of the parties connected with it, on whom the expression of public opinion would, no doubt, have its due weight.

Mr HUME eventually withdrew his motion.

Mr. EWART then moved, "That it is expedient that the Government School of Design be formed into a central normal school for the instruction of teachers of design in communication with other schools of design throughout the country."

Mr GLADSTONE gave an explanation of the actual state and prospects of the School of Design, which was so satisfactory to the honourable mover that he withdrew his motion

Mr. HUME moved for returns relating to the periods of service of flag officers of the navy, which was refused by a majority of 76

Leave was granted to bring in a bill to regulate and reduce the expenses of the offices attached to the Superior Courts of Common Law in Ireland, also to bring in a bill for abolishing certain offices on the revenue side of the Court of Exchequer in England.

The Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction Bill was read a third time and passed

The Sudbury Disfranchisement (Witnesses Indemnity) Bill was read a third time, and passed.—Adjourned

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

The British Possessions Abroad Bill, and the Dublin University Right of Voting Bill, were read a third time and passed.

The LORD CHANCELLOR moved the second reading of the Queen's Protection Bill, which was, after some congratulatory remarks from Lords MELBOURNE, CAMPBELL, and BROUGHAM, unanimously agreed to.

Several bills were advanced a stage, and their lordships adjourned

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY

Mr. LABOUCHERE put some questions relative to the duty for exporting stone cement; and Mr. GLADSTONE in reply said he should ask leave to bring in a bill to remove the export duty on that article, as much was wanting for Hamburgh.

Mr. M'GIBSON asked if Government continued to receive fresh evidence of the state of the country, as it was notorious that each post brought new accounts of increased distress? -The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER (who had only just returned from the country) said he could not give an immediate answer to the hon. member's question.

Mr MARK PHILIPS wished to ask whether it was likely that a large quantity of corn would come through Malta to this country; and if so, whether such would be admitted free of duty? - Mr. GLADSTONE said he did not know if a large quantity of wheat would come through Malta to this country, but if it did, it would be treated as foreign wheat

The house then went into a committee of supply, Mr. GREENE in the chair. Various estimates were voted in detail, and the committee, after some observations, voted £30 000 for public education.

The vote for education in Ireland produced much discussion, Mr. WARD forming a division, being the sequel to a course of disorder, for which he had previously been reprimanded from the chair, and his conduct elicited many expressions of censure

The house resumed. Sir J GRAHAM announced that it was the intention of Government, before the close of the session, to introduce a measure to amend the law of registration, and establish an effective appeable tribunal.

The Election Petitions Trial Bill was read a second time.—Adjourned

HOUSE OF LORDS. SATURDAY

The royal assent was given by commission, to the Queen's Protection Bill, the British Possessions Abroad Bill, the Stock-in-Trade Rating Bill, the Worcester Indemnity (Bribery Election) Bill, the London Bridge Approaches and Royal Exchange Avenues Bill, the London and Greenwich Railway Bill, and several private bills. Some other bills were forwarded a stage, and their lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS —SATURDAY

Sir J GRAHAM, in answer to Mr Ricardo, said that reports of some disturbances which had recently occurred in the Pottery districts had reached the Government, but he was happy to state that there was nothing of an alarming nature in those reports.

Sir J GRAHAM also stated it was not intended, in the present session, to bring in a bill for the regulation of mills and factories.

The house went into committee on the Lunacy Lunatic Asylums Bill, and afterwards on the Fisheries (Ireland) Bill. Both were ordered to be reported on Tuesday.—Adjourned.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert, and the royal suite and household, attended divine service on Sunday at Claremont, whither they had gone the previous day, attended by their Serene Highnesses the Hereditary Prince and Princess of Saxe Gotha. Archdeacon Wilberforce officiated.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge gave a grand dinner on Saturday at Cambridge House, to the officers of the Coldstream Regiment of Foot Guards, of which Regiment his Royal Highness is colonel. Twenty-eight of the officers were present.

The Queen and Prince Albert and their Serene Highnesses the Hereditary Prince and Princess of Saxe Coburg Gotha, walked in the gardens and grounds of Claremont during the forenoon of Monday.

The Duke of Cambridge, attended by Baron Knesebeck, went to the review at Wimbledon, on Monday morning. In the evening his Royal Highness dined with the Noblemen and Gentlemen's Catch Club, at Willis's Rooms.

Their Royal Highnesses the Duchess and the Princess Augusta of Cambridge, attended by Lady Augusta Somerset, honoured the performance of Mademoiselle Rachel, at the Italian Opera, on Monday evening, with their presence.

Her Majesty the Queen Dowager and her Serene Highness the Duchess of Saxe Meiningen, arrived at Claremont, on a visit to the Queen, soon after one o'clock on Tuesday afternoon, from town. Their Serene Highnesses the Duke and the Hereditary Prince of Saxe Meiningen followed in another carriage and four.

The illustrious party partook of a déjeûné with her Majesty and Prince Albert, and their Serene Highnesses the Hereditary Prince and Princess of Saxe Coburg Gotha.

Shortly before four o'clock the Duke and Duchess of Saxe Meiningen and Prince George, the Hereditary Prince, took leave of the Queen and Prince Albert, on their Serene Highnesses' departure for the Continent; and left Claremont, accompanied by the Queen Dowager, for town.

A MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.—The nuptials of the Hon. Captain Frederick W. Child Villiers (third son of the Earl of Jersey) and Lady Elizabeth de Reede Ginkle (daughter of the late, and sister of the present Earl of Athlone) were celebrated on Tuesday at St. George's Church, Hanover-square, the Rev. John Johnson, chaplain to his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, officiating at the ceremony

RETURN OF THE COURT TO WINDSOR.—It has been finally arranged for the Court to visit Windsor for a somewhat lengthened period immediately after the prorogation of Parliament. The various repairs and alterations which were commenced at the Castle immediately after the departure of her Majesty on the 13th ult., will be completed for the Queen's reception at a very early period in the ensuing month.

A Cabinet Council was held on Tuesday afternoon at the Foreign-office. It was attended by Sir Robert Peel, the Duke of Wellington, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Wharncliffe, the Duke of Buccleuch, Earl of Aberdeen, Lord Stanley, Sir James Graham, Earl of Ripon, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Earl of Haddington, and Sir Edward Knatchbull The Council sat at hour and a half.

Her Majesty the Queen Dowager, and their Serene Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Saxe Meiningen and the Hereditary Prince, left Marlborough House at ten o'clock on Wednesday morning, attended by their respective suites, and embarked at Whitehall-stairs, in an Admiralty barge, for Greenwich, where the Governor received the illustrious visitors, and attended them during their inspection of the Royal Hospital.

Their Serene Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Saxe Meiningen, and Prince George, afterwards took leave of their august relative, the Queen Dowager, and left Greenwich, attended by their suite, in two carriages and four, for Dover, en route for the Continent.

BALL AT THE RUSSIAN EMBASSY.—On Wednesday night the Baroness Brunnow, the lady of his Excellency the Russian Minister, gave a magnificent fête at Ashburnham House, commemorative of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the nuptials of their Imperial Majesties the Emperor and Empress of Russia. The preparations for the ball were conducted on a scale of splendour becoming the joyous occasion, and nothing was omitted that could add to the elegance of the fête. The portico and vestibule were adorned on either side by a profusion of exotics, and the staircase and saloons generally were ornamented by numberless flowering plants.

In the vestibule were stationed the band of the Coldstream Guards; they, during the arrival of visitors, played in their usual excellent style, selections from the compositions of Lostzing, Meyerbeer, Bellini, Rossini, Auber, Sir H. Bishop, Costa, &c.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester, attended by Lady Caroline Legge, and their Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Cambridge and Prince George and Princess Augusta, attended by Lady Augusta Somerset, came at a quarter past eleven.

His Excellency Baron Brunnow was waiting to receive the Royal visitors, who were saluted with the honours due to their elevated station by the military band.

Shortly after the arrival of the members of the Royal family, dancing commenced. Above 600 of the leading nobility, and nearly the whole of the foreign ministers and attachés to the corps diplomatique, graced the entertainment with their presence.

PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS.

ASYLUM FOR THE DEAF AND DUMB.—On Monday a half-yearly general meeting of the subscribers to the charity, was held at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street, for the election of thirty children from a list of seventy-one candidates. The chair was taken by Mr. Alderman Gibbs, at eleven o'clock, when the minutes of the last meeting were read by the Rev. W. Curling, M.A.; and a report, from which it appeared that the charity had arrived at its jubilee, it being fifty years since its establishment in June, 1792, during which period nearly 1800 deaf and dumb children had been received into the institution. Although upwards of seventy children had been admitted during the last twelve months, the list of candidates did not diminish. At the present time 230 children were under instruction, who, with the exception of those on the pay-list, were clothed by the charity. The meeting was very numerously attended, and £178 in subscriptions was announced during the time of the election.

DIOCESAN BOARD OF EDUCATION. On Tuesday the annual general meeting of the London Diocesan Board of Education took place at the rooms of the institution, 79, Pall Mall, for the purpose of receiving the report of its proceedings for the past year, and electing officers for the year ensuing. The Rev. Dr. Cooke read the report, which congratulated the Society on the successful progress of the labours of the committee, and entered into a minute detail of the fiscal affairs of the institution. On the motion of Lord Radstock the report was adopted, and ordered to be printed and circulated. The right rev. chairman addressed the meeting at considerable length.

SPORTING INTELLIGENCE.

LIVERPOOL RACES

WEDNESDAY.—The Croxteth Stakes were won easily by Lord Westminster's Satirist (Marson), beating Shadow, Curricr and Meal.

The Produce Stakes were won by Lord Derby's Fortune-Teller Holmes), beating Sir R. Bulkeley's c. by Beagle, by a head.

The Bickerstaffe Stakes were won by Lord Westminster's Candahar Marson), beating Lord G. Bentinck's Peloponnesus by a head.

The Sefton Stakes, for fillies, were won by Mr. Meiklam's Florence (Templeman), beating Colonel Crawfurd's f. by Ladgar, and three others. A fine race.

The Mersey Stakes were won by Mr. G. Clark's Philip (Holmes), beating Eglidia, Maria Day, Colin Clink, and Gipsy Queen by half a length, easy.

The Sweepstakes of 500 sovs. each were walked over for by Auckland.

CRICKET MATCH.—KENT v. ALL ENGLAND.

There never was, perhaps, in the annals of cricketing a greater triumph than the one achieved on Tuesday evening, at Lord's, by the players of Kent, in their match with an eleven selected from the various counties of England; and in which they, after two days of unrivalled play, were proclaimed the victors by a majority of no less than fifty runs. The English cricketers are unquestionably the finest in the world, and the "Men of Kent" having now defeated, without much difficulty, the elite of the gentlemen and professional players of this country, they are entitled to the distinction of being styled the champions of the players of this fine athletic and truly British game, which, as an exercise, is rapidly increasing in the estimation of the public, particularly the aristocracy: and, if any argument were wanting to support this fact, the late order of the Commander-in-Chief for the establishment of cricket-grounds in the neighbourhood of barracks, for the sole use of officers and privates, would alone be sufficient.

For some time past this match has been the principal topic of conversation among the members of the metropolitan subscribers and provincial cricket clubs, and consequently a speculative interest has been excited; indeed, bets to an immense amount have been pending the result; and some idea may be formed of the anxiety with which the match was regarded by those amateurs and players who were unavoidably absent and living in distant parts, that pigeon and one-horse expresses were dispatched after each innings, communicating the state of the game.

The weather being propitious both Monday and Tuesday, the enclosure at Lord's presented a gay and animated appearance, from the immense assemblage of spectators, more than four thousand of whom paid for admission. There were above one hundred of the equipages of the nobility and other distinguished persons, including a number of the carriages of ladies of rank and fashion, in most of which were the fair owners with their families and friends, comprising the Countess of Verulam and Lady Jane Grimston, Countess Craven, Lady Augusta Gordon, Lady Bayley, &c.

Among other sporting noblemen, gentlemen, and well-known amateurs and patrons of the game we noticed the Marquis of Exeter, Earl of Aboyne, Earl Craven, Viscount Folkestone, Viscount Grimston, Lord W. Beresford, Lord M. Hill, Lord F. Beauclerc, Lord C. Russell, Lord F. Gordon, the Hon. F. Craven, the Hon. R. Grimston, the Hon. F. Grimston, the Hon. H. Grimston, the Hon. F. Ponsonby, the Hon. S. Ponsonby, the Hon. A. Villiers, the Hon. F. Cavendish, the Hon. — Montague, the Hon A. Saville, the Hon. Colonel Lowther, Sir J Bayley, General Mundy, Captain Udney, Captain J. A. Lambert, &c.

The play altogether was first-rate.

[We shall present our subscribers next week with an interesting view of Lord's Ground.]

GRAND ROWING MATCH

The public were entertained on Wednesday by an aquatic exhibition almost as rare as unexpected, in the revival of the scullers' wager, termed Lyon's sovereigns. In former years this was the great leading wager of the season, the contest by which the merits of the fresh candidates of each succeeding year were tested, and on which the sporting gentlemen bestowed more than ordinary attention. After two or three years of indifferent subscriptions it was discontinued, and from that period to this—a term, we should think, of half a dozen years—matches with picked scullers have been most unfrequent. The present contest differed in no respect from those of former years, as regarded its conditions, and the distance was, as usual, from Westminster-bridge to Putney, with seven scullers.

At half-past four the river was covered with boats belonging to the celebrated aquatic clubs, including those of the Cambridge, Oxford, King's College, St. George's, Leander, and others of equal note; and there were several members of the respective universities in handsome wager wherries. Betting was in favour of Phelps, George Campbell being next favourite. The men were started on this occasion from buoys with lines. They dashed away at a slashing pace. It was a sharp trial of game and stamina, but Pocock of Lambeth maintained the lead, and won the race by three lengths. Phelps was second, Hill third, Campbell fourth. The winner performed the distance under the disadvantages of excessive one-handed labour in thirty-eight minutes.

THE GUERNSEY REGATTA.

This regatta took place on Tuesday last. The wind blew fresh from the south-west; so that a fine opportunity was afforded for developing the utmost speed of all the vessels. The first prize competed for was the Sarnian Cup, valued at £100. The extremity of the course was from the Red Buoy in the Small Russell to two small craft moored to the southward of Castle Cornet, about six or seven miles. The winner was the Victoria, the property of A. Connor, Esq., of Cork. An amateur rowing match took place subsequently between two four-oared gigs, namely, the Tinemara and the Victoria, for five silver medals, which was won by the former. In the evening the parties dined at Gardner's Hotel. Wednesday evening a ball, in connection with the regatta, took place at the Assembly Rooms.—Guernsey Comet.

Goodwood Races commence on Tuesday, the 26th inst., and will continue four days. On the first day there will be the Craven Stakes; the 300 sov. Stakes, 12 subs.; the Gratwicke Stakes of 100 sov. each, 32 subs.; the Drawing-room Stakes of 25 sov. each, 17 subs.; the Goodwood Club Stakes for gentlemen riders, 14 subs.; the Welter Stakes for gentlemen riders, 7 subs.; the 1000 sov. match between Charles the Twelfth and Hyllus; and the Innkeepers' Plate, heats. On the second day, the Goodwood Stakes, the Cowdray Stakes, Queen's Plate, Stewards' Cup, and the Members' and Stand Plates, both in heats. On the third day, the Cup, 50 subs.; the Racing Stakes of 50 sov. each, 26 subs.; a Sweepstakes of 25 sov. each, for two-year-olds, 12 subs; the Molecomb Stakes of 50 sov. each, 15 subs.; the Duke of Richmond's Plate; and the Anglesey Stakes for gentlemen riders. The meeting will finish on Friday with the March Stakes for gentlemen riders (certain to produce two classes and a challenge cup); the Chesterfield Cup, 38 subs.; the Nassau Stakes of 50 sov. each, 22 subs.; and two matches. Without counting the heats, therefore (they are not only superfluous, but infra dig.), the sport for each day is almost unequalled in value and extent The Marquis of Westminster and Sir W. M. Stanley, Bart, are stewards. The races will commence each day at half-past twelve o'clock precisely.

POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No. V.

JOSEPH STURGE.

The persecutors of Fox, the first who openly professed and acted on the principles, since so well known as those of the "Society of Friends," would hardly have credited the prophet who should have foreshown them what an active part and weighty influence the "Friends" would one day possess, in the agitation that always must precede the political of social changes of the times. Yet much influence this peculiar sect has attained; and it is conceded them the more willingly, that it has been gained by legitimate means. The growth of their influence in society forcibly reminds us of the text, "The stone which the builders rejected, the same has become the head of the corner." Burke speaks of Religion "lifting her mitred front in courts and palaces;" but who would have expected to see the "broad-brim" making its way into senates, and assemblies of passionate and heated controversy? Yet this is also the case, and from causes that may easily be explained. Beneath that quiet, calm exterior, which seems the universal attribute of the "Friends," there is much latent enthusiasm, warm sympathy with the sufferings of humanity, of whatever creed, nation, or colour, and a deep desire to raise mankind to a condition nearer to that standard which it is the duty of all Christian men to, at least, struggle to attain. The desire to effect this does, we believe, lead the members of this quietest and most unobtrusive of sects, to do a seeming violence to the general tenor of their lives, and mingle in those disputes and struggles which are generally carried on by men of harder minds, and who have, it may be, more selfish motives for action. Of those few of the Society of Friends who have been forced into public notice by the share they have taken in the politics of the day, we know not a better or more favourable specimen than Joseph Sturge. He was particularly distinguished for the active part he took in procuring the abolition of slavery; he had the cause thoroughly at heart; and oe spared neither his pen, his purse, nor his personal exertions in the cause. The Anti-Corn-Law League is exceedingly strong in the support it receives from the Society of Friends; those who attended its meetings last year must have seen the mild intelligent features of the subject of our sketch as busy in the common cause, as earnest, but less fiery, as the fiercest Repealer there; his outward bearing supported by an inward conviction, that what he was engaged in was his duty. The violent energy, breaking not unfrequently into passion, which marked the demeanour of others, could not be traced in him; the "quietism," if we may so call it, of his sect, seemed to surround him like a spell, and to enable him to walk unscathed among the firebrands with whom he acted, in a spirit far different from their own. In the present year he has headed a movement, which has for its object a closer union between the middle and working-classes, whom the political events of late years seem to have estranged from each other. An "extended suffrage" is to be the means of bringing the represented and unrepresented classes into more cordial union; but whether it has yet succeeded to any great extent, seems doubtful. The Anti-Corn-Law League is at this moment again sitting in Palace-yard, but we have missed Joseph Sturge from among them. If his presence could act as a rebuke to the rash and violent men who now seem to take so prominent a part in the business of the League, he is much wanted at their meetings. The language now employed is such as every thinking man must regret, such as Joseph Sturge could not approve. It does not stop short of incitements to bloodshed and revolt. Apart from all considerations of agreement or difference with their cause, we wish, for the sake of the people, that such things had not been said, as have been attributed to them, and remain undenied. It is no light matter to speak of blood; while to hold up the prospect of it as a threat, is wickedness. The soil of England has not as yet been moistened with aught more sad than the tears of the suffering thousands who tread it under the chilling shadow of poverty; let not the crimson shower descend upon it now. They who make threats, by no means obscure, of assassination, cannot have a right sense of the task they have undertaken. Assuredly such are not the sentiments of Joseph Sturge.

There was a ghostly air about these uninhabited chambers in the Temple, and attending every circumstance of Tom's employment there, which had a strange charm in it. Every morning when he shut his door at Islington, he turned his face towards an atmosphere of unaccountable fascination, as surely as he turned it to the London smoke; and from that moment, it thickened round and round him all day long, until the time arrived for going home again, and leaving it, like a motionless cloud, behind. It seemed to Tom, every morning, that he approached this ghostly mist, and became enveloped in it, by the easiest succession of degrees imaginable. Passing from the roar and rattle of the streets into the quiet court-yards of the Temple, was the first preparation. Every echo of his footsteps sounded to him like a sound from the old walls and pavements, wanting language to relate the histories of the dim, dismal rooms; to tell him what lost documents were decaying in forgotten corners of the shut-up cellars, from whose lattices such mouldy sighs came breathing forth as he went past; to whisper of dark bins of rare old wine, bricked up in vaults among the old foundations of the Halls; or mutter in a lower tone yet darker legends of the cross-legged knights, whose marble effigies were in the church. With the first planting of his foot upon the staircase of his dusty office, all these mysteries increased; until ascending step by step, as Tom ascended, they attained their full growth in the solitary labours of the day.—Martin Chuzzlewit.

CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. II.

ST. MARY-LE-STRAND.

Of the thousands who daily pass by this sacred edifice which divides the vast stream of life flowing from east to west, like a rock in some river which resteth not nor stays in its course, "but flows, and as it flows, for ever will flow on," few are they who ever dream that they are passing one of the most interesting spots in London—the place where the emblem of its old amusements lingered the longest and departed the last; where the poetry of its out-door life flourished in its youth, and died unwilling in age, even when it was compelled to give way before what is called the march of modern improvement. Reader, on the site of St. Mary-le-Strand, that smoke-blackened church which stands at the end of Drury-lane, and on your right hand, as you pass westward under the shadow of Somerset House, stood once the "Maypole in the Strand." Visions of olden mirth, vex not our aching sight with shadows of revelry and glee, that not England, far less London, may ever behold again! Here, says the quaint old chronicler, did the "young men and maidens" of London and Westminster "much resorte," to do observance to the morn of May, with such dancing, and devices, and minstrelsy, as would by no means find favour in the eyes of those blue-coated functionaries, from whom a hearty laugh at a print-shop window is almost enough to excite a "Move on." The government clerks who, at four o'clock, look up at the steeple to assure themselves that her Majesty has not had a minute more of their ill-paid time than she is entitled to, seldom picture to themselves the pole and garland that would have greeted them, could they have looked up there in the early days of Queen Anne. Yet so it was: and, as regrets for the past are useless, let us to our task, which is to describe the present, or at least the manner in which what is the present, took the place of the past. The old church of "St. Mary and the Innocents in the Strand," stood to the south of the present structure, nearer the river, and on the ground now partly occupied by one of the wings of Somerset House. It was pulled down by "order" of Edward Seymour, Duke of Somerset, in 1549, to make room for the magnificent pile which he commenced on the site of the present Somerset House. We should like to hear what the Bishops of Exeter or London would say to the "absolute shall" of any noble duke of the present day, who might fancy that a church stood in the way of his prospect or improvements! Even in those times the proud Protector carried his power too far; the people at once accused him of peculation and sacrilege; and the immense sums he lavished on his building, and the recklessness he showed for sacred things in laying its foundation, were the pleas made use of by his enemies to bring him down from his "pride and place." In this drama the little church of St. Mary in the Strand played an important part. All that is known of the early history of this edifice is, that it was a church in 1222, how long before that date is unknown. When it was pulled down, as we have stated, it deprived the parishioners of their place of worship, and they joined themselves to the Church of St. Clement Danes, and after that of St. John the Baptist, in the Savoy. They continued to attend this as their parish church for more than one hundred and fifty years, till, in 1723, the act for erecting fifty new churches within the bills of mortality was passed. One of the number was appointed for this parish. The first stone of the present building was laid in 1714, so that it must have been commenced in anticipation of the act; it was completed and consecrated in 1723, and, instead of the ancient name, was called St. Mary-le-Strand.

Though not large (the builder was probably confined both by space and funds), it is an elegant building, and not without considerable merit as a specimen of metropolitan church architecture. It has an air of solidity about it which makes it look as if built for ages to come, and which still does not degenerate into heaviness. The western entrance is gained by a flight of steps cut in a circular sweep, conducting to a circular portico of Ionic columns, surmounted by a dome, which is crowned by an elegant vase. The columns are continued along the body of the church in pilasters of the same at the corners, and in the inter-columniations are niches, handsomely ornamented. Over the dome is a pediment, supported by Corinthian columns, which are also continued round the body of the structure, over those of the Ionic order; beneath, and between these, the windows are placed over the niches. The windows have angular and circular pediments alternately. The steeple is light, though solid, and ornamented with composite columns and capitals. A dwarf stone wall runs round the building, surmounted by an iron railing, more useful perhaps than ornamental.

The church is a rectory in the patronage of the Bishop of Winchester. An estimate taken some years since gives the value of the living at £225 a-year, besides the surplice fees: of this £100 a-year was settled by Parliament, and the remainder made up by a pound-rate on the inhabitants in lieu of tithes.

Such is a brief account of this church: those to whom the traditions of the spot are interesting, may wish to know what became of the Maypole, the centre of attraction to hundred ere summer revelry gave way to Sunday devotion. It is consoling to reflect, that no ignoble end befel this relic of olden time. When it was taken down (and much fell with it), it was found to be a good hundred feet in length, and probably for that reason was obtained by Sir Isaac Newton, and conveyed to Wanstead Park, in Essex, the seat of Sir John Child, afterwards Lord Castlemain, where, under the direction of the Rev. Mr. Pound, it was used in erecting a telescope, 125 feet long, the largest then known in the world, which had been presented to the Royal Society by M. Hugon, a scientific, and, we presume, a munificent foreigner. Thus, after gladdening the heart of man for a long, almost unknown period, it became instrumental in increasing his knowledge of "every star which heaven doth show:" it was beneficial in both capacities; and at the present moment we can hardly decide in which it was the most worthily employed. What became of the "Maypole," after the telescope had tired the eyes and exhausted the calculations of some generations of the Royal Society, we have not been able to learn: perchance it rotted into the earth, or, doing good to the last, it fed the winter's hearth of some poor cottager dwelling by the park side of Wanstead. In whatever manner it disappeared from the earth, few trees of the forest have been destined to minister more to the mirth and knowledge of the world. Would that we could now see the two things blended more frequently than we find them! Neither has gained by parting company; and could we recal the simple mirth and hearty cheerfulness of the olden time, it might be found that a course of most learned lectures on any ology of the list, might be well exchanged for a merry May-morning's dance round the "old Maypole in the Strand."

TELEGRAPHIC DESPATCH.

In this miraculous age of improvements and discoveries when "the annihilation of time and space" is no longer regarded as an idle chimera of the brain, it might hardly be considered necessary to occupy our space with a detail of the various schemes that have been adopted and put in operation to facilitate this most paramount and prevailing desire. So many thousands of our country readers, however (and we are proud to say that our country circulation increases weekly beyond our most sanguine expectations), must be naturally unconversant with those experiments in arts and science which the "great metropolis" is continually eliciting, that we feel it a duty which we owe to our friends and supporters at a distance, to place before them those objects of interest and real usefulness in which the metropolis abounds, and which are only known to them by name, and that too, perhaps, through the cold and often suspected medium of a newspaper advertisement. The subject which we have selected for illustration, in the present instance, is Watson's Telegraph, established for the service of the mercantile and shipping interest of the United Kingdom—one which, we believe, is not familiar either to our metropolitan or provincial readers, not even along the line of coast where this astonishing contrivance has been established. The title of this machine almost sufficiently explains its use and object as far as the saving of time is concerned, but the simple complexity (if we may so say) of its arrangement is so different from anything that has been heretofore started to answer the purposes of a telegraph, that we have deemed it necessary, even at the risk of encroaching inordinately on our space, to add a rather lengthened letter-press description of the apparatus which the subjoined engraving represents.

WATSON'S TELEGRAPH.

The view of the above edifice is taken from the Borough, and must be acknowledged by all who have seen it to be most correct. The plan was invented by a gentleman named Watson, and is carried into execution, we understand, by a body of enterprizing gentlemen calling themselves the "Shipping Telegraphic Association." As regards the topographical object of the telegraph, the intention is to establish it at various parts of the coast of Great Britain, and others from the coast to London, for the purpose of conveying instant intelligence of the arrival of vessels at any port; of vessels seen at a distance; of vessels in distress; of the kind of aid required and the place to which it must be sent; of orders given or required; of the number of passengers, or the kind and amount of cargo on board; and numerous other matters arising out of maritime enterprize; of the manner in which lives and property may be saved by such a system.

Coast Stations are now or have already been established at Pentland Firth, Peterhead, Flamborough Head, Spurn, Yarmouth, Orfordness, North Foreland, Deal, Reculver, Sheppy, the Needles, and three places in the Isle of Wight. There is also a chain of stations to connect London with Deal; the first of which is now erecting on the top of a shot-tower at the foot of London-bridge; the second at Forest-hill; the third at Knockholt; and others at Wrotham-hill, Bluebell-hill, and three or four elevated spots between there and Deal. These stations, by an agreement with the Trinity-house, are in communication, not only with each other, but also with the floating lights at the Nore, the Goodwin-sands, &c.

With regard to the mechanism of the signals, it is necessary to state that the primary part is the "Telegraphic Dictionary;"

a copy of which is kept at each station, and contains several thousand words, names, phrases, and directions, such as are likely to be most useful and required, and names of vessels, of places, and certain nautical terms, which have been selected with great care, as may best suit the object in view. They are all ranged alphabetically, and each one has a number attached to it, which number becomes the symbol employed in signaling.

It will thus be seen that the telegraphic operation consists, in principle, of the transference from place to place of symbols representing numbers. In this plan the numbers are represented by the position which two or more boards, poles, or arms, are made to assume, with reference one to another; the general principles of which (though not the minute details) may perhaps be understood from the following description.

The main part consists of two vertical masts, about twenty feet apart, and fifty feet high. Two cross-trees or poles are fixed, one near the top of each mast, and two pairs of arms are hinged to the lower part of each mast, one pair above another. There are thus eight arms, which, when down in the grooves, are invisible at a small distance. When in operation, one arm is capable of projecting sideways in one of three different directions, viz., upwards, inclining downwards, and horizontal. Every arm is managed by means of a wire rope, which passes into the house, and is there moved by a sort of windlass.

Now let us for an instant confine our attention to one pair of arms, attached to the same mast at equal heights, the one branching out to the left and the other to the right. Calling one the north arm—when this inclines upwards it signifies 1; when horizontal, 2; when it inclines downwards, 3. The south arm signifies 4, 5, and 6, when inclining upwards, horizontally, and downwards, respectively. Both arms inclining upwards signify 7; both horizontal, 8; and both inclining downwards, 9. It will thus be very apparent that any numeral from 1 to 9 may be symbolled by one or both of these arms, pointed obliquely or horizontally.

But if the number be higher than 9, the upper pair of arms in the same mast is brought into requisition. Here the positions are similar to those of the pair below; but each one is equivalent to a numoer ten times as great as the one below. If the lower north arm, inclining downwards, indicates 3, the upper north arm, inclining downwards, would indicate 30; and so of all the other positions. To indicate such a number as 79, therefore, the two upper arms would incline upwards for 70, and the two lower would incline downwards for 9.

Supposing, however, the number to reach hundreds or thousands, the other mast is employed, of which each pair of boards move precisely in the same way as the former. But the value of the indication is proportionably higher, the lower pair representing hundreds, and the upper pair thousands. These may all be compared in an easy way, by supposing the whole eight arms to project horizontally: then the lower pair on the first mast, as before observed, would represent 8; the upper pair, 80; the upper pair in the other mast, 800; and so on.

As these telegraphs are too cumbrous to be used on board ship, a system of flag-signals has been divised by Mr. Watson. Sir Home Popham and other naval officers have directed their attention to signals of this kind, and many attempts have been made to limit the flags to a conveniently small number. In Mr. Watson's system, thirteen flags are sufficient, used one or more at a time, to give all the signals contained in the telegraph-dictionary. Difference of colour, and difference of position as hoisted on the masts and ropes, give together all the combinations required.

Already, in the north of England, many and decided benefits—not only to commerce, but to the cause of humanity—have resulted from the telegraphic system as applied to shipping; and when the extensive system here sketched shall be in practical operation round the eastern and southern coasts of England, the contributions to civilization will, we are inclined to believe, be more extensive than the projectors first imagined.

It may be requisite to add that the Lords of the Admiralty have directed all her Majesty's ships and vessels to be provided with Watson's signal books, for the convenience of the mercantile community. By this means, merchant vessels carrying Watson's code will be enabled to communicate with any of her Majesty's vessels of war they may meet at sea. All revenue cruisers are also to be similarly supplied.

VIEW OF THE CUSTOM-HOUSE OF LONDON AND THE THAMES.

THE PORT OF LONDON.

The pent-up commerce of the Port of London appears to have burst forth with exceeding vigour on the coming into operation of the New Tariff, a measure, the uncertainty of which has so long suspended the vitality of our mercantile marine. On Monday the scene at the Custom-House was one of most extraordinary bustle and excitement, and formed a striking contrast to the stagnation which for some time past has prevailed within the portals of that great emporium of commerce. The apartment, which it is no misnomer to call the "long room," was crowded to overflowing with busy, bustling men of business, whose anxious countenances proclaimed the advent of a new market; and on the "grand side," we are informed, no fewer than 1850 entries were made during the day, whilst on the "plantation side" the entries amounted to upwards of 1000. At the Bonded Office, St. Katharine's Dock, the London Dock, and the West India Dock, a great deal of business was done, and a considerable quantity of foreign produce, which had been waiting the passing of the bill, was cleared from the different warehouses. The Hamburg steamer, which arrived during the morning, had a quantity of meat and poultry on board, which was admitted under the new regulations. We have endeavoured to perpetuate the recollection of this critical juncture in our commercial career, by the above view of the Custom-House of London and the Thames, which may not be unacceptable to our readers.

THE ROYAL HOUSEHOLD.—The members of the Royal Household, with the vast number of domestics in the Master of the Horse department, whose salaries and wages, payable quarterly at Lord Jersey's office in the Royal Mews, became due on the 1st instant, have been officially informed that a delay of some days must necessarily take place in the payment, in consequence of the Lords of the Treasury having required a return of their respective incomes, perquisites, &c., to be made forthwith to the Treasury, at Whitehall, with the view, it is supposed, of subjecting them to the deduction of the income-tax.

BALMY BREEZES, I'VE SOUGHT YE LONG.

Balmy breezes I've sought ye long;
Now ye come in luscious tides,
Bearing the riches of scent and song,
From the wild-flower fields to which ye belong,
Where the summer-king presides.

All acknowledge your potent power,
Man and insect, beast and bird;
For ye give a charm to the evening hour,
Whether here, in hall, or in foliage bower;
And their souls by your spells are stirr'd.

I'm your lover, and delight to kiss
Your sweet lips as they pass by;
I would wed ye (for 'twould be such bliss,
Nor a transient rapture or a joy like this),
And upon your bosom die!—Cicaré.

QUIPS ABOUT MARRIAGE.

Marriage is like a silk purse—most agreeable to bear when there is plenty of money in it. Marriage is like a mouse-trap: once get into it and you are caught, without the least prospect of recovering your liberty. Marriage is like a "rose-tree in full bearing": how attractive are its flowers! but the bright leaves fall after a season, and the thorns alone remain. Marriage among fools is like a boiled calf's head, without the accompaniment of brains. Marriage is like a roast leg of mutton on Sunday—served up cold on Monday, ditto with pickles on Tuesday, and hashed up on Wednesday. Marriage is the sunshine of life: beneath its genial influence spring up the best affections and the noblest virtues of man, which in the sterility of selfish celibacy would have lain dormant and useless.

MELTING MOMENTS.

A gentleman happened to remark, one intensely hot evening, that Parliament would soon be "dissolved." A young lady in the company immediately added, "So we all shall, if this weather continue."

SPEECH.

There is no greater miracle than the power of speech. The Divine Artificer of such a power! What is more wondrous then the evolving of thought in the chamber of the mind, and its winged course to the tongue! What matchless machinery, by which thought becomes embodied, as it were, and in one moment transmitted to thousands of fellow minds!

To strip religion of her gloom, and present her in such an attractive form, that you could not choose but love her, is the Christian minister's happy task.

NEW DICTIONARY FOR LADIES.

Brute—a domestic endearment for a humane husband. Wrinkle—The first thing one lady sees on another's face. Horrid, hideous—Terms of admiration elicited by any lovely face except that in the looking glass. Nice, dear: Expressions of delight applied to anything from a baby to a grenadier. Teen: A thing that begins to exist only after the birth of a great-grandchild.

The following comes from New York:—"Are you fond of novels, Mr. Jones?" "Very," responded the interrogated gentleman, who wished to be thought by the lady questioner a lover of literature. "Have you," continued the inquisitive lady, "ever read Tea Thousand a year?" "No, Madam; I never read so many novels in all my life."

HALF FARTHINGS.

In England, dear England, what is there that one can purchase for such a mite as one of the new fractions? Nothing. The traditionary farthing rushlight has risen to four times the price, and the old ha'penny roll has rolled into a penny one. And half a farthing? The only commodity I know of to be obtained for such a trifle is—kicks!

"I'd kick him for half a farthing."

The New Monthly.

CHARITY.

"I fear," said a country curate to his flock, "when I explained to you, in my last charity sermon, that philanthropy was the love of our species, you must have misunderstood me to say specie, which may account for the smallness of the collection. You will prove, I hope, by your present contribution, that you are no longer labouring under the same mistake."

A bookseller received an order for "2 sam bux." He puzzled his brain some time without understanding the meaning thereof, and returned it for an explanation. The writer was very much astonished that it could not be understood. "Why," said he, "it is as plain as day: 2 sam (psalm) bux (books)." This explained the mystery. —New York Evening Post.

GOOD RIDDANCE.

This is the last day of May, and, sooth to say, we are not sorry, for it has been a most melancholy and unpleasant month. Time was when all kinds of honied words were lavished upon May—"Merry May"—and poets and painters bedecked her in flowers, and sunshine, and brightness; but the only colouring in which the May of 1842 can be presented with any kind of "truth to nature," is that in which an eastern editor last week "showed her up," to wit—"as an old dowd sitting up for company in a mud-coloured calico gown, with a dripping cotton umbrella over her head." —New York Sun.

ODDITIES OF GREAT MEN.

Dr. Johnson used always, in going up Bolt-court, to put one foot upon each stone of the pavement; if he failed, he felt certain the day would be unlucky. Buffon, the celebrated naturalist, never wrote but in full dress. Dr. Routh, of Oxford, studied in full canonicals. An eminent living writer can never compose with his slippers on. A celebrated preacher of the last century could never make a sermon with his garters on. A great German scholar writes with his braces off. Reiseg, the German critic, wrote his commentaries on Sophocles with a pot of porter by his side. Schlegel lectures, at the age of seventy-two, extempore, in Latin, with his snuff-box constantly in his hand; without it he could not get on.

MUSIC.

I would fain know what music is; I seek it as a man seeks eternal wisdom. Yesterday evening I walked late in the moonlight in the beautiful avenue of lime-trees on the banks of the Rhine, and I heard a tapping noise and soft singing. At the door of a cottage, under the blossoming lime-tree, sat a mother with her twin babes; the one lay at her breast, the other in a cradle, which she rocked with her foot, keeping time to her singing. In the very germ then, when the first trace of life begins to stir, music is the nurse of the soul. It murmurs in the ear, and the child sleeps; the tones are the companions of his dreams; they are the world in which he lives. He has nothing; the babe, although cradled in his mother's arms, is alone in the spirit; but time will find entrance into his half-conscious soul, and nourish it as the earth nourishes the life of plants.—Bettina.

A PURSUIT.

No human being, however exalted his rank and fortune, however enlarged and cultivated his understanding, can long be happy without a pursuit. Life is a ladder, on which we cling from hope to hope, and by expectation, strive to ascend to enjoyments; but he who fancies he has reached his highest hope, or who enjoys the utmost of his wishes, is miserable indeed; for many who have been most successful in their respective undertakings, have given the gloomiest descriptions of the emptiness of human pleasures. The pursuit alone can yield true happiness; and the most trifling object that has power to fascinate the hopes of man, is worthy his attention.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"Custom-House, Southampton."—The annoyance and delay suffered here as a grievance which is really almost beyond endurance. Passengers from all parts of the world, and even from our own Channel Islands, have to undergo the delay of upwards of two, and sometimes five, hours before they are allowed to proceed on their journeys. A correspondent complains that on Friday morning, July 8th, he arrived from Guernsey at three o'clock in the morning, and had to wait till eight o'clock before he was enabled to obtain his luggage from the Custom-house. The first train had started to London, and the delay occasioned not only much inconvenience, but positive loss. We hope the absurd regulations at our ports will soon be altered.

"The Land Sharks."—We have had many letters complaining of a set of harpies who infest the coasts of most countries. We know of no decided remedy to avoid being plundered by these impostors. In our own country we hope the Legislature will interfere. Half the pleasure of an excursion is taken away by the double annoyance of the importunities and plunderings of cads, porters, and others, who infest the sea-ports of a few parts of the world.

"Kensal-green Cemetery."—We cannot tell who may happen to be the Directors of this burial-ground. Of this we are certain, the regulations are far from agreeable to the visitors. Our correspondent might well be indignant at the police snatching a flower in its breast; we would advise him and others not to subject themselves to such offensiveness, by keeping away in future.

We have to apologise to many correspondents. Some private communications shall be answered in a day or two.

"The Income Tax."—This tax, which at first was supposed to touch only persons of £150 per annum, we find has already taken effect on persons receiving dividends at the Bank to the amount of £2 10s. and upwards. The only remedy for the persons subjected to the above reduction is an appeal to the Commission—a very pleasant remedy, truly. We wish the Government joy of the outcry which will soon reach them, when this unequal tax is in full operation.

We shall be glad to receive proposals for engravings. Apply on Monday only, at 10, Crane-court, between ten and one in the morning.

"F. T., Mansfield, we are certain can procure our journal regularly, if he orders it. Apply to Mr. Langley, bookseller.

Booksellers and news-agents are informed that on application to our Publisher, they will be supplied with Prospectuses of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, gratis.

"W. S." and better order Saturday's edition.

"T. R., Manchester.—We recommend him the Saturday's edition. The impressions of the engravings are not better in the first edition. They do not wear like copper or steel plate engravings.

"J. N., Winchester.—300,000 impressions might be taken without serious injury to our engravings.

Part II. of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, containing Nos. 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10, is now ready, and may be had, by order, of all booksellers throughout the Kingdom.

"B. Blundy, Esq."—His communication our Publisher will attend to.

"J. K. P."—We will inquire.

"Carus Amicus" shall appear.

"A Subscriber," Teignmouth, had better send what he requests us to insert.

"R. A. B., Leeds, next week.

"A. Thompson, Inverkeithing. We will try to find room.

"J. J.," 3, Manchester-buildings.—Too late; the occasion is passed.

"Brutus,"—Edinburgh Castle shall appear. Could he forward us a short well-written history? Buckingham Palace is not forgotten. Windsor Castle will appear.

"J. T., Nottingham.—The view of his town next week.

Our usual articles on Gardening and Chess, together with the weekly Calendar, were unavoidably excluded from our last publication, owing to the great press of important public news.

A view of Bristol will appear next week, beautifully engraved.

We beg our advertising friends to send their favours on Thursday, as we cannot undertake to insert any advertisements after Thursday evening.

"N. D."—Our friend is mistaken in thinking that we were mistaken in our chess answer. The rule we laid down of making queens is general "in the clubs," of course as a strict law; but the conventionalities of ordinary society have given a predominance to the custom we indicated.

"A Subscriber," Bridgwater, complains courteously; but should hardly, we think, complain at all. If, however, there be an honour in being an exception to the general rule, our correspondent has all that advantage.

"A Subscriber," Edinburgh.—We have only to repeat that our Wrapper is not stamped, and cannot, therefore, go by post. The result is at the same time open, and again stated, that it must be procured by the news-agent or bookseller of personal liberty at a distance through the ordinary channel of booksellers parcels. Of course our own Publisher could not transmit the Wrappers. Independently of the postage, the labour would render that impossible, but he will supply them to any London agent with the utmost readiness. There has never been a deficiency in the quantity.

"W. A. B."—The limits of our journal are not about the suggestion in consequence of the space occupied by cuts. Every possible degree of intelligence when the paper can receive a notice thereof; this the columns record upon occasions when some things are unwillingly received to make way for the celebration of any extra important news.

Thanks to Mr. John Morris. We may find room for his communication.

"A. L."—In a day or two we will attend to your correspondent by post.

"J. O." We cannot venture to answer legal questions, especially upon a subject which is about to open so wide a field of appeal. We shall be happy to receive specimens and notices of the landscape illustrations.

"A. H. H., Leamington.—We have given special directions concerning the wrapper in this case; but there should be no difficulty. The London bookseller can procure them in abundance at the office. We have before stated that Mr. Marriot neither has, nor ever had, any connexion with this journal. The Colosseum Print will be delivered upon a previously organized system. The Times, Papers, &c., might need our purpose; but we should like to receive a specimen. Thanks for the whole spirit and intention of our correspondent's letter.

The letter of "Miles" is useful and just. Nothing but gradual organization can conquer the imperfection which his comments attack. Master of fact statements like his can, however, never be lost upon us.

"E. M."—The newsman should know. It was always advertised to be given at six months from the date of the commencement of the paper.

"A St. Mungo Resident."—Upon the ground of the name or title having been applied to our Saviour. To the rest of the communication we may find it within our province to attend.

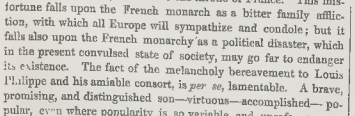
Captain Gray's worm, &c., have been received, and will be noticed in our next.



LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 18, 1840.

DEATH OF THE DUKE OF ORLEANS.

The most recent and distressing public intelligence that has reached us comes from abroad. The last express from Paris has brought us the sad information of the death, by accident, of the Duke of Orleans, the heir to the throne of France. This misfortune falls upon the French monarch as a bitter family affliction, with which all Europe will sympathize and condole; but it falls also upon the French monarchy as a political disaster, which in the present convulsed state of society, may go far to endanger its existence. The fact of the melancholy bereavement to Louis Philippe and his amiable consort, is per se, lamentable. A brave, promising, and distinguished son—virtuous—accomplished—popular, even where popularity is so variable and unsafe—escapes the ordinary dangers of revolutionary distraction, and falls, under the inscrutable decree of Divine Providence, a victim to the accident of a day. A whole family is plunged into woe—a father's heart is lacerated—a mother's soul paralyzed with sorrow—a monarch is deprived by death of his heir. The King is here levelled with the peasant, sorrow claims the sympathy of humanity from every Christian—and the love that liveth in the cottage can send up to the palace its tribute of affectionate and condoling grief. The domestic virtue of the kingdom is prompted through Nature and by the voice of God.

But the death of the Duke of Orleans becomes of measureless importance to Europe, in a sense wider and more dangerous, than any ordinary visitation upon royalty could imply. The young Prince has married, and has left behind him a son, heir to the throne of France! There are links between this infant child and his royal grandfather, but they are links which, upon the death of Louis Philippe, revolutionary France may snap. That is not a country to bear a long regency, unless the elements of that regency be cast in the boldest, the sternest, the most gigantic and commanding mould. The men who reign in France without being Kings, or who exercise a delegated authority without being republicans, must, in the present temper of that sovereignty, combine something of the firmness and energy of the now-reigning monarch with the wily diplomacy of the Talleyrand school and the more unscrupulous severity of the days of the Revolution or the Empire. To do this they must be greater men than we see or know upon the political horizon; and the hope of civilized Europe should be, that Louis Philippe may be spared, until the contingencies suggested by this grievous death of his son wear a brighter and less difficult aspect for the political contemplation of the world. We will not, at the first blush of this dire intelligence, pursue the theme through half the field that it opens before us; it is better and more seemly to close our reflections with most heartfelt expressions of sorrow for the disastrous calamity that has befallen, and to pay to the afflictions of the French monarch the respect which is due by all men unto grief.

It will be seen by our Parliamentary intelligence that Sir Robert Peel has brought in a bill for the better protection of the person of her Majesty, which, in its spirit, is nearly the echo of the article that appeared on the first page of the last number of this journal. It is so far in accordance with the tone of the whole metropolitan press, which might indeed almost claim the credit of giving the initiative to the minister, if it were not plain that common sense must have suggested the proposed alternative to the mind of every person of ordinary intelligence, who reflected upon the recent wretched and provoking, although distressing and alarming attacks upon the life or domestic happiness of our universally loved Queen.

The bill in question is a flogging bill; and this gives the death blow to the miserable vanity of your would-be-thought pseudo-regicides. Whip them at Newgate, they buy no more pistols; pillory them in Palace-yard, they shoot no more Queens. The punishment will henceforth not be commensurate with the crime; but it will so degrade the crime in dignity, that no future fool will set it up as an ambition in his imagination, and, let his morbid sensibilities or broodings be what they may, he will have no fancy for crimsoning them with his own blood. The half-idiot hobbledehoy, who knows nothing of the great question of eternity, and whom Jackshepp ardism has persuaded that to be hanged is to be a hero, goes to earn his reward of criminal notoriety, and is only cheated out of his celebrity by the mercy of the crown; but once tell him that "brute romance" will only pass current at the whipping post—that flogging shall reward him instead of fame—that jeering and gibing, and mob execration and scorn, and contumely and wretched contempt, will be unsparingly meted out to him by a sneering and hooting multitude; and the coward who could contemplate such designs as we have seen attempted, would crouch under the shadow of the infamy of his own suggested villany, and howl himself into exhaustion with an imaginative torture, that would handsomely deter him from ever aspiring after the real.

It is a great theme of praise too in favour of the Minister, that he has backed up the degradation of the lash with a year of severe punishment in England, and with seven years of after-transportation to our penal settlements abroad

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

POST-OFFICE NOTICE.—The following is a copy of a notice exhibited at the General Post-office, St. Martin's-le-Grand, and the several branch offices:—"The next mails for Malta, Greece, and the Ionian Islands, via Falmouth, will be made up on the 16th instant. The next mails for India and Egypt, via Falmouth, will be despatched hence on the 31st instant. The next mails for Egypt, India, &c., via Marseilles, will be made up here on the 4th of August. The Medway steam-ship will take out the West India mails of the 15th instant; and the Columbia the American mails of the 16th instant."

THE NEW COINAGE.—The Bank of England on Monday paid the dividends in new sovereigns and half sovereigns, and in new half-crowns, shillings, and sixpences, just received from the royal Mint. A large amount of new half-crowns, shillings, and sixpences, was sent off on Saturday and Monday to Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, Sheffield, Leeds, and other populous manufacturing districts in the north, where there is a great scarcity of silver. The number of light sovereigns now in circulation must be very limited, as during the last week but a small quantity were presented for change. The Bank only takes them now in sums from £30 to £500, and upwards; but the light gold that has been taken since the panic has been sent to the Mint to be recoined, so as to prevent the re-issuing.

The pressure of business at the Custom-house on Monday was very great, in consequence of the tariff coming into operation on that day. The arrangements, however, were so judicious, that no inconvenience was experienced. The clearances of goods were to a large extent, and would lead to the expectation that the depression in trade has been owing more to merchants refraining from business until the new duties were to be received, than to any other cause.

A curious auction was held in the City on Monday, on account of a bankrupt's estate. It appears that in 1836 and 1837, certain supplies were furnished to the Spanish Government, for which bills were drawn upon and accepted by A. de Ramon y Carbonell, Esq., the then authorised agent of the Government of Spain, which bills were overdue, and amount to £15,012 15s. 8d." The documents were put up to sale this morning in eight lots, and realized exactly one hundred and seventy pounds. Something like a correct calculation of the value of Spanish credit in this country may be formed from the circumstance. The genuineness of the bills was not questioned.

TAXES.—The whole of the taxes imposed in Great Britain, in 1841, was Land-tax, £1,183,985; other taxes, £51,997,000; in France Land-tax, £23,250,000; other taxes, £17,500,000; in Prussia—Land-tax, £3,994,000; other taxes, £3,667,000; in Austria—Land-tax, £3,795,000; other taxes, £7,700,000. Probate and legacy duty of £1,138,000, not paid by landholders. From the beginning of the reign of George the Third to 1834, 6,840,540 acres of waste land were enclosed.

THE WELLINGTON ARCADE.—A new and splendid arcade is about to be erected, extending from Wellington-street North, immediately opposite to the portico of the English Opera House, to Catherine-street, Strand, the hoarding for which has been erected, and the preliminary clearings for it already commenced.

THE METROPOLITAN ROADS.—The income derived from the tolls on the metropolis roads since the introduction of railway travelling, in 1837, has progressively decreased from £83,497 to £67,475, a falling off of £16,000 per annum. Under these circumstances the commissioners relinquished the expense of lighting the roads, and the greater part of the parishes have, it appears, taken on themselves that duty. The exceptions are the Kensington and Brentford roads.

The average circulation of the Bank of England for the four weeks ending the 25th of June, is stated to be £17,543,000, and the stock of bullion for the same period £7,846,000, showing an increase in the bullion, as compared with the four weeks ending the 28th of May, of £463,000, and as compared with the four weeks ending the 24th of July, 1841, an increase of £2,835,000.

The assessable, much of the same character as that between the Greenwich and Croydon companies, has arisen between the Northern and Eastern and Eastern Counties Railways, respecting their rate of tolls, and promises to lead to as much acrimonious discussion.

No less than twenty-one new magistrates have been created for the metropolitan county; a number of whom qualified on Friday at the Sessions-house, Clerkenwell-green. Amongst the appointments we observe the name of the Marquis of Abercorn, and Mr. Hodgson, M.P.

Lord Ponsonby, late ambassador at Constantinople, after an absence of several years from this country, arrived late on Saturday night, accompanied by Lady Ponsonby, from the Continent. The noble Lord, on leaving the Turkish capital, proceeded to Italy and Germany for the benefit of his health, which, we are happy to hear, is quite restored. On Sunday his lordship made visits to the royal family, and the members of the corps diplomatique and the leading nobility.

The Lords Commissioners of the Treasury have appointed John Thomas Briggs, Esq., the Hon. Robert Dundas, Sir William Burnet, John Meek, Esq., H. Arnedroz, Esq., to be the commissioners under the Income Tax act for her Majesty's navy.

REMOVAL OF AN OLD NUISANCE.—A favourable opportunity having presented itself to prevent the perpetuity of a nuisance which has long existed in Kensington-road, in consequence of a public-house, called the Half-way-house, standing in the road itself, and occupying a considerable portion of its width, the Commissioners, in conjunction with the Commissioners of her Majesty's Woods, Forests, &c., made arrangements with the Dean and Chapter of Westminster for the purchase of their interests in these premises. The transaction has been lately completed, so far as this commission is concerned; but the Commissioners of Woods, Forests, &c., not having yet authorised to accept the transfer of the deed the purchase-money—viz., £470 15s. 10d., appears for the present as an item of expenditure in the general account.—Parliamentary Paper.

The members of the Anti-Corn-law Conference have had frequent sittings during the week in their room in Palace-yard, where a great number of speeches have been delivered, and strongly worded resolutions adopted; but as yet, this appears to be the only good (if so near the dog-days good it can be called) which the body has effected.

John Stock, Esq., an intelligent and respected magistrate of Middlesex, died at his residence, near Poplar, on Sunday last, much regretted by his friends and neighbours.

The regret, as far as the Home-office authorities are concerned, as to the right of the coroner to have a prisoner remanded or committed by a police magistrate upon a charge of murder or homicide, brought before a coroner's jury, has been determined. The report of the visiting justices of the House of Correction states, that the visiting justices have received a letter from Sir J. Graham, and, concurring in opinion with Sir James, they have resolved, that it appears to them that the governor will not in future be justified in sending any prisoner committed for re-examination by a magistrate on a charge of homicide, before the coroner, in order to be present at the inquest.

LICENSED VICTUALLERS' ASYLUM.—During Monday and Tuesday last a most fancy fair took place on the grounds of the asylum, in and of its funds, for the benefit of the children of the Licensed Victuallers' School attended, marshalled by Messrs. Walter, Blake, Reader, and Lancaster, with their respective brothers-in-law, the band of the 73rd played during both days. The fancy fair was very liberally patronised by upwards of 900 persons.

CONSECRATION OF ST. THOMAS'S CHURCH, CHANCERY-LANE.—On Wednesday morning the Bishop of London consecrated the church of St. Thomas, situate in Bream's-buildings, Chancery-lane. After the ceremony of consecration had been performed, his lordship delivered a most impressive sermon from the 9th chapter of St. Matthew, 27th and 28th verses, to a highly respectable congregation, in aid of the building fund. After service a collection was made, amounting to £106.

THE LATE DOWAGER COUNTESS OF GALLOWAY.—The funeral of the above estimable countess took place on Thursday, when her ladyship's mortal remains were interred in a new vault in the cemetery at Kensal-green. The Earl of Galloway, Marquis of Anglesey, Hon. Sir Edward Paget, the Hon. Berkeley Paget, Lord Feversham, and the other immediate members of the family attended the obsequies.

STEAM ABOVE BRIDGE.—There landed at Chelsea from the steamers on Sunday last, 6741; at Putney, 4267; and at Richmond, 5072; independently of those who landed at Battersea, Wandsworth, and Kew. Many of our readers may not be aware of the short distance from Richmond to Hampton Court, across the Twickenham meadows.

THE INCOME TAX.

We subjoin a copy of the official rules and regulations for collecting this unequal and unfair impost, which cannot fail to be instructive to our readers.

The following is a copy of the official regulations which will be issued to every person for the purpose of assessments of profits in trade, professions, &c.:—

"County of ——
"Parish of ——

"In pursuance of an Act passed in the sixth year of the reign of her present Majesty, for granting to her Majesty duties on profits arising from property, professions, trades, and occupations, you are hereby required to fill up such statements as are applicable to your particular case, and deliver the same, under cover and seal, at my dwelling-house situate at ——, or at the office of the commissioners, at ——, within 21 days from the date hereof, under a penalty of £20 and treble duty.

"RULES AND REGULATIONS FOR INCOME.

"The tax under this schedule extends to all trades, professions, employments, or vocations, carried on or exercised in Great Britain, or elsewhere, by persons residing in Great Britain, or carried on or exercised in Great Britain by any persons, whether subjects of her Majesty or not, although not resident in Great Britain, and to every art, mystery, &c., carried on by them respectively, other than quarries of stone, limestone, slate, coal, coal-mines and other mines, ironworks, gasworks, saltworks, waterworks, canals, docks, &c., right of markets, fairs, tolls, railways, and other concerns of a like nature.

"The balance of profits of trade or manufacture is to be returned at the place where it is carried on, on an average of three years preceding; or if set up within three years, on an average from the period of commencing the same, either ending on the day of the year when the annual accounts of the trade have been usually made up, or on the 5th of April, 184 ; or if commenced within the year of assessment, according to such fair computation or average as to the best of your knowledge and belief you shall state, and shall be directed by the commissioners.

"In estimating the profits and gains in trade

"DEDUCTIONS ARE ALLOWED

"For repairs of premises, or supply or repairs of instruments, utensils, or articles employed, not exceeding the sum usually expended for such purposes, according to an average of three years.

"For bad debts only, or such part thereof as shall be proved to the satisfaction of the commissions to be such.

"For any average loss not exceeding the actual amount of loss or adjustment.

"And for the rent or value of any dwelling-house or domestic offices used for the purpose of trade, a sum not exceeding two-thirds part of such rent.

"NO DEDUCTIONS ARE ALLOWED

"On account of loss not connected with, or arising out of trade, &c.

"Nor for any sums employed or intended to be employed as capital therein.

"Nor on account of capital withdrawn therefrom.

"Nor for any capital employed in improvement of premises not occupied for the purposes of trade.

"Nor on account of pretence of any interest which might have been made on capital if laid out at interest.

"Nor on account of any annual interest, or any annuity, or other annual payment, payable out of such profits or gains.

"Nor for any sum recoverable under an insurance or contract of indemnity.

"Nor for any disbursements or expenses which shall not be money wholly and exclusively laid out for trade, &c.

"Nor for any disbursements or expense of maintenance for the parties, their families, or establishments.

"Nor for any sum expended in any other domestic or private purpose distinct from the purposes of trade.

"The profits on professions, &c., are to be returned on the amount of the preceding year, ending as before; subject to the like provision with respect to those profits as to profits on trade, or the setting up within the year of assessment.

"The profits on all securities bearing interest payable out of the public revenue except annuities, dividends, and shares payable out of any public revenue, or the interest of East India bonds otherwise charged), and all discounts and interest of moneys, not being annual interest, payable or paid by any person whatever, are to be returned on the full amount of profits and gains arising therefrom within the preceding year.

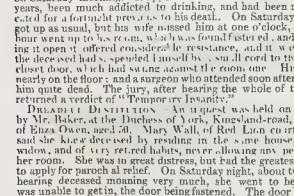
"The profit from foreign possessions and securities, or in the British plantations, or in any other of her Majesty's dominions, are to be stated to and assessed by the commissioners of London, Bristol, Liverpool, and Glasgow, or nearest to such place where the property shall have been imported, or the persons receiving the remittances or value thereof reside, or if imported or received in different ports or in two or more of the outports above mentioned, the whole profits are to be returned at each port; but they are to be assessed upon the aggregate amount at each port only where the major part of the value has been imported or received.

"The returns of profits arising in any other manner than as above described, comprehending every possible source of profit, of whatever nature or kind not particularly described in the other parts of the act, may either be for and on an average of years, if in their nature these profits are uncertain in their annual amounts, or, if certain in their annual amount, on the profits of the preceding year.

"You are not required to make any return of annuities, &c., payable in Great Britain out of any public revenues, or of the interest on East India bonds, the duties of which are to be retained by the respective corporations or companies trusted with the payment of the same, unless the half yearly payment of dividend does not amount to fifty shillings; nor are you required to make any return of rents, annuities, or interests of money, and other annual payments payable to you as Peers residing in this kingdom unless such payments are derived from property out of Great Britain, they being chargeable on the party by whom the payment is to be made, and will ultimately fall on you by way of deduction from the amount at the time the payment is made, without a particular assessment."

GENERAL DECLARATION.

"I, ——, do hereby declare that all the particulars required in this notice, to be returned as appertaining to me in relation to the duties on profits of property, trade, or profession, contained in schedule ——, are in every respect fully and truly stated, according to the best of my judgment and belief, and according to the rules and regulations of the Act of Parliament in that behalf made ——Dated this —— day of ——, 184 (Signed)



FATAL CARRIAGE ACCIDENT.—On Tuesday afternoon an inquest was held before Mr. Wakley, at the King's Head, Maddox-street, St Pancras, upon the body of a child, named Henry Keenn, aged three years, who was run over on Friday last by a cart or waggon belonging to Mellish, Esq., Arlington-street, Piccadilly. The driver deposed that he was not aware of an accident having occurred until he was informed thereof by the constable. The jury without hesitation returned a verdict of "Accidental Death."

THE EFFECTS OF INTOXICATION.—Late on Tuesday evening an inquest was held before Mr. Carter, the coroner for Surrey, at the Crown and Anchor, Kent-road, which is in the hamlet of Hatcham and parish of Deptford, though in the county of Surrey, respecting the death of Mr. Ishmael Hewson, aged 36, a timber-merchant, and proprietor of the Old Oak, at the Kent-road, who committed suicide on Saturday morning. It appeared that the deceased had, for many years, been much addicted to drinking, and had been nearly intoxicated for a fortnight previous to his death. On Saturday morning he got up as usual, but his wife missed him at one o'clock, and a neighbour went up to his room, which was found fastened, and upon bursting it open it offered considerable resistance, and it was then found the deceased had suspended himself to a small cord to the edge of the closet door, which had swung against the room one. His knees were nearly on the floor; and a surgeon who attended soon after pronounced him quite dead. The jury, after hearing the whole of the evidence, returned a verdict of "Temporary Insanity."

DREADFUL DESTITUTION.—An inquest was held on Wednesday, by Mr. Baker, at the Duchess of York, Kingsland-road, on the body of Eliza Owen, aged 50. Mary Wall, of Red Lion-court, Kingsland, said she knew deceased by residing in the same house. She was a widow, and of very retired habits, never allowing any person to enter her room. She was in great distress, but had the greatest repugnance to apply for parochial relief. On Saturday night, about twelve o'clock, hearing deceased moaning very much, she went to her room, but was unable to get in, the door being fastened. The door being broken open, the deceased was found lying on the floor, with only a piece of old rug round her. Stimulants and food were offered to her, but she was too far gone to eat or drink, and died about two o'clock the following morning. Mr. William Turner, surgeon, of the Kingsland-road, said he had examined the body, which was much emaciated, and it was his opinion that her death arose from destitution. The jury returned a verdict of "Natural Death accelerated by want."

REMARKABLE FATALITY IN ONE FAMILY.—Yesterday morning an inquest was held before W. Carter, Esq., coroner for Surrey, at the Europa Tavern, Rotherhithe, on the body of James Heard, 27 years of age, who was found drowned in the Thames off Pageant Stairs, Rotherhithe. It appeared by the evidence that the deceased was a bargeman, in the employ of Messrs. Cobham and Co., of Ware, Herts, and that in delivering a cargo at White Lion Wharf, Upper Thames-street, it is supposed he accidentally fell over, but there was no evidence to show how he came into the water, and the jury accordingly returned a verdict of "Found Drowned." The brother of the deceased said, that the male part of the family had obtained their living for some years as navigators on the rivers Thames and Lee, and that no fewer than seven of them had been accidentally drowned whilst following their avocations on those rivers, and two others had lost their lives by accidents which had befallen them whilst so employed. Amongst the former the father of the deceased, and two of his sons, were drowned a short time ago.

TAKING TIME BY THE FORELOCK.—The officers of the Plymouth Dockyard, who were paid their quarter's salaries a few days ago, had the income-tax deducted from all wages of £150 per annum and upwards.—Globe.

AFFECTING INCIDENT.—Previous to the Affghanistan warfare, Miss Walker, a lovely accomplished Scotch lady, possessing great personal attractions, was engaged in marriage to Mr. Munro, a young officer of a regiment serving in that country. The first outbreak was ordered to proceed to Cabul. Before the order was issued, young Munro assured her that his unsettled state should leave her free to go to the Indies, in order that their future destinies might be linked together in wedlock. Before her departure from Scotland, Miss Walker acquired Mr Munro of his letter, which reached him on his route to Cabul, when his colonel gave him leave of absence, that he might be enabled to meet her on her arrival. He had scarcely obtained that leave, when necessity compelled the commanding officer to send it, and order him to rejoin his regiment, which had such an event upon him, that he shot himself through the head. Miss Walker has arrived, and is at present residing with Mrs. Ramsay, completely ignorant of the fate of her intended! Extract from a Private Letter.

Notes and Paragraphs.

CLAREMONT, THURSDAY.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert, and the Hereditary Prince and Princess Ernest of Saxe Coburg have postponed their departure until Monday next. The chance in the arrangements of the Court has been caused by the extreme inclemency of the weather. Her Majesty and her illustrious guests take daily carriage drives, and walk in the neighbourhood of Esher, Kingston, and Richmond. Claremont is henceforth to be called the Palace at Claremont.

M. Dedel, the Netherlands Minister, returned to Wilton-crescent, last Wednesday, from the Hague, after an absence of three months.

The Russian Minister and the French Chargé d'Affaires transacted business on Thursday at the Foreign Office.

Lord Sandon and Sir R. Inglis had an interview with Sir R. Peel on Thursday.

Colonel M'Arthur had an interview with the Earl of Ripon on Thursday.

COUNTY OF BEDS.—The election for a member for this county took place on Friday, at Aylesbury, when the Hon. W. E. Fitzmaurice was elected without opposition.

The Court will go into mourning, next week, for the late Duke of Orleans.

Sir Robert and Lady Peel left Whitehall-gardens on Friday morning, and proceeded by the nine o'clock train of the Birmingham Railroad to their seat, Drayton Manor, Staffordshire. The Right Hon. Baronet returns to town on Monday.—Standard.

A dinner was given on Friday at the Thatched House Tavern, the Duke of Richmond in the chair, to Sir Allan M'Nab, in acknowledgment of his loyal services in Canada in the outbreak of 1837-8.

The Countess of Leicester, accompanied by her son the Earl and the rest of her family, left London by the Princess Victoria steamship for Antwerp, which started on Thursday morning, from the St. Katharine's Wharf, Tower.

CONCERT AT STAFFORD HOUSE.—On Friday morning there was a grand concert at Stafford House, the residence of the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland, for the benefit of the Poles. About 300 of the nobility and gentry were present. The receipts are said to have amounted to nearly £1000.

AFFAIR OF HONOUR.

CAPTAIN BOLDERO, M.P., AND THE HON. CRAVEN BERKELEY, M.P.—A hostile meeting took place this morning (Friday) between the Hon. Craven Berkeley, M.P., and Captain Boldero, M.P. The dispute arose in consequence of Mr. Berkeley having attributed to Captain Boldero the use of certain expressions disrespectful to her Majesty, which the latter peremptorily denied. The parties met this morning at five o'clock, in the neighbourhood of Osterley Park, Middlesex, accompanied by the Hon. W. Ridley Colborne, M.P., and Captain Boldero by Mr. W. F. Mackenzie, M.P., and having exchanged shots without effect, they left the ground. The cause of the dispute is thus given by Mr. Berkeley, who states that Captain Boldero, in some conversation on the subject, said—"If any man in my dero, in some conversation on the subject, said—"If any man in my presence, drunk or sober, were to damn the Queen, I should take no notice—I am no eavesdropper." While Mr. Botfield, who was present, gives this version (in reply to a letter from Captain Boldero):—"I never did the words you used ever utter that if any man were to damn the Queen, to damn the Duke of Wellington, to damn Sir Robert Peel, that you would pay some such words it would when drunk, pouring a tumbler full of the driest champagne in upon it, that you would not consider it necessary to call any man to account for expressions said under the influence of intoxication. Upon which Mr Craven Berkeley said he would kick or shoot any man who should damn the Queen in his presence." This led to some altercation, which I did not view seriously at the time, and out of which, as it appeared to me, no question could arise as to your loyalty and attachment to your Sovereign."

It appears that a letter, signed "M," in the Morning Chronicle, headed "More Fury Loyalty," subsequently alluded to this conversation, and Captain Boldero applied to Mr Berkeley to assist him in "detecting the author of so base, false, and malicious a calumny." Mr. Berkeley, in reply, says, "I have to assure you that I have not the most remote idea who was the writer of that letter, and that I was not in any way privy to the publication of it. At the same time I feel it right to state that the report in that letter of the words used by you, in the conversation which passed between us upon the occasion referred to, is substantially correct."

This explanation not being deemed satisfactory, Mr Mackenzie on the part of Captain Boldero met Mr. Ridley Colborne on the part of Mr. Berkeley, who proposed to Mr. Mackenzie that the affair should be accommodated on the basis of the following memorandum:—"Though I am still convinced that the words used in my letter were uttered by Captain Boldero, I have no hesitation in declaring that I can never have imputed any disloyal motives to Captain Boldero, nor have been, as I before stated, either directly or indirectly, the author of the paragraph in the Morning Chronicle." This memorandum, being signed by Mr. Mackenzie, the meeting was immediately disarmed, and took place as above stated. [It is, we think, evident that the conversation must have arisen by some allusion to the recent case of Colonel Dundas and his dismissal.]

LIVERPOOL RACES.—WEDNESDAY.

The Maiden Plate was won after five heats, by Mr. G. Clarke's Woldsman.

THURSDAY.

The Free Handicap was won easy, by Clinker (Nat,) beating Azurat.

The Foal Stakes were won by Peloponnesus (Rogers), beating Bona Fide and Sir R. Bulkeley's c. by the Mole.

The Cup.—Lord Chesterfield's Rhodanthe and Mr. Holmes's Vulcan ran a dead heat for the cup, which was afterwards won by Vulcan by a neck.

Her Majesty's Plate of £100 was won by Mr. Meaklain's c. by Physician, out of Solace, beating Mr. Watt's Forester and Mr Jones's Portrait.

FRIDAY

The Stanley Stakes were won by Lord Westminster's Maria Day (J. Howlett), beating Mislead, Frea, and Mud, in a canter.

The Knowsley Dinner Stakes were walked over for by Lord Westminster's Candahar.

The Grosvenor Stakes were walked over for by Lord Westminster's William de Fortibus.

The Stand Cup was won by Lord Howth's St Lawrence, Mr Greaves's being second; the Satirist, Dr. Cains, the Young'un, and Ermengarde, not placed.

The Whip Stakes were won by Mr Ferguson's Fireaway, beating Mr. Allen's Belcour and Mr. Dickinson's Ballinkeele.

The Selling Stakes were won by Mr. Meiklam's Wee Willie, beating Woldsman, Sybarite, and Smirke, after four heats

DEATH OF THE BISHOP OF MEATH.—With deep regret we have to announce the death of the Right Rev. Dr. Dickenson, Lord Bishop of Meath, which took place on Wednesday, at the See House, Ardbraccan, after an illness of nine days of typhus fever.

CROSSING THE DESERT.—The contract for supplying the cargoes to convey passengers across the Egyptian desert has been assigned by Mr. Andersen, Her Majesty's merchant in Southampton. Each carriage is to be in the form of a small omnibus, to carry four inside and two out. There will be a very light construction, for the purpose of passing easily over the sandy soil of the desert. Each carriage will be drawn by two Arab horses, that will run nine miles an hour. Forty carriages must be ready by the 1st of September next DREADFUL STATE OF THE POTTERIES.—Letters from Burslem, in the Potteries, state that not less than 600 workmen have turned out, owing to the reductions of wages. The collieries, iron-works, and potteries, have been visited by them, and those men who had accepted the reduced scale of wages subjected to personal violence. Yeomanry and military are now parading the districts, and much alarm is felt for the public peace.

The shipwrights in the Tyne have struck during the last few days, in consequence of the shipbuilders having determined to give 21s., instead of 24s. per week: further stagnation in trade has of course ensued.

We regret to say that the most distressing intelligence reached us this morning from Birmingham; in addition to which, the colliers, in large bodies, are come about leaving employment in different places in the Potteries, &c. Mr. Milner Gibson last night, in the House of Commons, said the accounts from Manchester were also bad. Great fears are everywhere entertained that the people, driven to despair, will break out into open violence.—Morning Chronicle, Saturday.

LOSS OF BANK NOTES. SINGULAR RECOVERY.—Thursday forenoon a respectable tradesman, named Gifford, of James-street, Oxford-street, went into a fancy shop in the same street to be shaved. He had put down his hat preparatory to the operation, which was taken up by another person after he had been shaved, who left the shop with it undetected by Mr. Gifford, who, on ascertaining the fact, stated that he had in the hat a pocket-book, in which were £1 in one and five-pounds notes. He immediately made known his loss to the police constables, who were prompt in their inquiries, and soon discovered that the hat had, with its contents, had been deposited in a stable in the neighbourhood of Duke-street, Manchester-square. The person who possessed it appeared to have been totally unconscious of its treasure, as the pocket-book had not been opened, and the hat was carelessly flung down on the floor.

POLICE.—Mary Robinson, the "lady thief," was brought up on Friday at Bow-street for final examination, charged with stealing a gold pencil-case from the Panthéon, in Oxford-street, and duly committed to Newgate for trial

James Eade was brought up on Friday at the Mansion-house, by an agent of the firm of Messrs. Crawford and Lindsey, linen-merchants, of Ireland, for breaking into their premises, and stealing goods to the amount of £220. Several witnesses averred to the fact of seeing the prisoner committing the robbery, upon which he was remanded.

UNION-HALL, Friday.—William White was charged with assaulting Selwood, the constable of the Surrey Theatre, in the execution of his duty. The complainant stated, that on the preceding night he had occasion to proceed to the boxes owing to a noisy gentleman, who broke the door, and interrupted the audience. The defendant admitted that he was tipsy at the time, and apologised for his conduct. He was held to bail.

Thomas Sydnhe, collecting clerk in the employ of an extensive glue-manufacturer, in Bermondsey, was committed for embezzling upwards of £40, the property of his employer. Three wire-sieve charges selected against the prisoner.

William Webb, a labourer in the employment of Messrs. Noble and Mee, farmers, at Peckham Rye, was brought up on Thursday, charged with attempting to rob and murder James White, who now lies doubtful of recovery at St. Thomas's Hospital. It appeared that it was the custom of Webb to sleep in a barn on the premises, and on the night in question a man entered through an aperture leading from an adjoining barn, who laid himself down beside him on the hay, afterwards struck him a violent blow with a sharp weapon, on the back part of the head, covering him with blood, and rendering him insensible. The fact of the prisoner being at that spot at the time was proved, and a billhook belonging to him identified. He was remanded, and it is hoped in a few days the wounded man will be able to come forward as a witness.

FIRES THIS DAY.—This morning, at half-past four, the workshops of Mr. Roffey, a wheelwright, in High-street, Camberwell, with the stock in them, were wholly consumed by fire.—Another slight fire broke out, a little before three o'clock, in the shop of a Mrs. Ash, Brewer's-lane, Spitalfields. There were one or two other fires, but still more insignificant than those above alluded to.

FOREIGN.

PARIS, July 14.—There is little to add to the melancholy intelligence conveyed yesterday by express. The Royal Family, as may be imagined, are in the greatest affliction, but the fortitude of the King on this trying occasion is the admiration of every one. The poor Duchess of Orleans is still ill. Neither of the two will be present during the ensuing week. The remains of the Duke are deposited in the chapel at Neuilly. Nothing is yet certain respecting the funeral. All the Royal family are invited. It is supposed that next week's sitting will be attended with the ceremonial of the Regency, which is not provided for by the charter. The Assembly has not yet taken the oath. The funds have fallen about three per cent. Three per Cents, 76f. 90c.

RUMOURS IN PARIS.—The following appears in the Nation of Thursday:—"It is quite ill to account for such an absurd rumour as that which has been current in Paris since yesterday at the Bourse and in drawing-rooms. There was a report that the Duke of Orleans had died of his wounds in London, and that the Queen had given way to grief in her palace. The English journals, received today, take no notice of such a fact."

The death of the Duke of Orleans will be a great blow to the French turf. The Duke kept up fine packs of hounds at St. Germain, Fontainbleau, and Chantilly. Racing in France, under his management, had become quite popular, and French horses were seen to run on English courses. Fontainbleau was the Goodwood Cup, and Chantilly the Ascot races for this month. George Edwards, the jockey, was lead to meet on the prince. The whole of the stock is now likely to be sold off

SPAIN.—Barcelona letters of the 7th state that Zurbano was preparing to march against the Carlist bands, who, in despite of Felip's declature on the increase in Catalonia.

MADRID.—The head of the 7th also notes that the anniversary of the popular movement of July 7th, 1822, passed off quietly with the usual ceremonial. The Regent passed in review the national guards and the troops of the line, and illuminations took place in the evening.

TAMBOFF.—The Moscow Gazette gives the details of a great fire which, on the night of the 2nd of May, destroyed more than 200 houses, with all their contents, in the town of Bolschoe-Pitaievo, in the Government of Tamboff.

AMERICAN AFFAIRS.—The Hibernia, Captain Farber, arrived at Liverpool early on Thursday morning. None of the papers makes any allusion to Lord Ashburton's mission.—Tariff and revenue bills continued to engross the time of Congress.—No material change had taken place in the money or stock markets.—In Kentucky and Indiana the banks had resumed specie payments. There had not been any run upon them in consequence.

ROYAL AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY OF ENGLAND.

In pursuance of the pledge which we gave the public at the commencement of our (as yet) most prosperous career, to place beneath the glance of our readers, and within their grasp, the very form and presence of events as they transpire in all their substantial reality, we this day present our readers with a series of engravings illustrative of the proceedings of the Royal Agricultural Society of England, now assembled in the ancient city of Bristol. The objects and principles of this most powerful and influential body will be found so fully discussed in our front page, that we deem it unnecessary to do more in this place than direct the attention of the reader to the subjoined details of this important and interesting event:

Bristol, Tuesday, July 12.

Contrary to the prophecies of the would-be weather-wise, this, the first day of the celebration of the anniversary meeting of the Royal Agricultural Society of England, has been remarkably fine, a circumstance not to be despised in London, but far less in Bristol, which ancient city, south to say, does not present the most inviting aspect to a visitor on a wet day. Be that as it may, however, the city of Bristol bears an animated appearance, and was never more full of visitors than at the present moment; but the proceedings are only of a preliminary nature, and Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday are the great days of attraction. The hotels are crowded, and private lodgings are only to be had on the most extravagant terms, yet "the cry is still, they come." Great numbers of persons have arrived already by the railroad, the neighbouring counties have already sent their tribute of visitors, and the city and suburbs, and even Clifton, are tolerably well filled. Swarms of people, whether agriculturists or not is not easily ascertained, but consisting of ladies as well as gentlemen, children and adults, inhabitants of the city and strangers, have been all day long going up the hill on which Park-street is built, to the Victoria-rooms, and down again. At College-green, at the terminus of the railroad, at the doors and entrances of the inn-yards, and at all the public places, crowds have been collected. All the inns are filled, and it is with difficulty that lodgings can be procured at private houses.

Next to the lodging-house and hotel-keepers, the Great Western Railway proprietors are likely to benefit most by this meeting. Their traffic has certainly been considerably increased by it, not merely from the accession of visitors which it has brought, but from the immense quantities of agricultural implements and fat cattle which have been conveyed hither per rail from all parts of the kingdom. Extra trains have been put on for the occasion. The steamers from Ireland have also been busily employed in importing specimens of the agricultural progress of the Emerald Isle. One main object indeed of holding the present meeting at Bristol was to give this facility to our Irish brethren.

The bells are ringing merrily, and the streets rattle with the wheels of omnibuses and carriages. There are drovers and cattle, grooms, horses, sheep, pigs, and so forth. The entries for the exhibition of stock are very numerous; above a thousand tickets for specimens have already been issued, so that the show will exceed that of Liverpool in point of numbers. Great preparations have been made, and are still being made, for the victualling and eating and drinking department of the proceedings, and cooks, waiters, attendants, &c., are all in busy employment, toiling for the anticipated consumption of viands, in which agricultural philosophers, lecturers, farmers, nobles and ignobles, alike delight. Bristol is generally a bustling city, but at the present moment it is in a fever. The ploughing match will take place to-morrow, in a field at Beggar's-bush, an eligible locality, about two miles from the centre of the city, lying to the west of the Avon, and not far from Leigh Woods, in a beautiful country on the borders of Somerset-shire. A better spot could not have been chosen, and the gaudia certaminis, and those who delight in the sowing of furrows, will, if the weather be fine, have a gratifying sight.

It was rumoured in several quarters that Prince Albert, the Duke of Wellington, and Lord Stanley were expected to arrive during the course of the day; but on inquiring into the matter, it would seem that "the wish was father to the thought." The Duke of Buckingham is also expected to be found among the list of the missing, which to many of the west-country agriculturists will prove a great disappointment. The following distinguished noblemen and gentlemen have already arrived:—The Duke of Richmond, the Marquis of Downshire, the Hon. S. Agar, Earl Somers, Viscount Sandon, the Prussian Ambassador, the American Envoy, Sir Thomas Acland, Earl Spencer, the Duke of Beaufort, the Marquis of Worcester, the Earl of Ilchester, the Earl of Charleville, Sir C. Lemon, Bart., Mr. M. Philips, M.P., Lord Walsingham, Mr. Buller, M.P., Mr. T. D. Acland, M.P., Col. Wood, M.P., &c.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge and suite have just arrived. His Royal Highness honours Mr. Miles by accepting his hospitality, and will this evening be entertained, together with the members of the council of the Society, and the most distinguished visitors, by the Mayor, George W. Franklyn, Esq., who has provided a superb banquet at the Council-house.

The judges have been occupied to-day in examining and making their award on the exhibition of agricultural implements, which award has not yet been pronounced. The number of exhibitors is 99, and of implements exhibited almost innumerable.

The number of strangers that has already arrived is stated to exceed 8000.

THE MEETING—SHOW YARD AND GROUNDS.

Bristol, Wednesday.

The address of the corporation was presented last night to his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, after his return from Leigh to the banquet at the Merchants Hall, by the mayor and the deputation appointed by the town council. After a few remarks of an introductory character from the mayor, the town-clerk read the following address:—

"To his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge.

"We, the Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of the City of Bristol, in council assembled, humbly beg leave to approach your person, to express our deep sense of the honour conferred upon our ancient and loyal city by the presence of your Royal Highness. We welcome that presence with the liveliest feelings of pleasure and satisfaction, particularly as it affords us the opportunity of presenting to your Royal Highness the homage of our dutiful and unfeigned respect. We hail this visit at the present moment with peculiar interest, as evincing the cordial participation of your Royal Highness in the important proceedings of the Royal Agricultural Society of England, so conducive to the advancement of science and the welfare of the country.

"It is with pride and pleasure that we record our testimony of the high veneration and esteem we entertain for your Royal Highness, and for those amiable and excellent qualities which have endeared you to the nation at large; and permit us to add the assurance that the citizens of Bristol do not give place to any of her Majesty's subjects in firm attachment to our constitution, in reverence and devotion to our beloved Queen, and in respect and regard for every branch of that illustrious house of which your Royal Highness is so exalted a member."

After which his Royal Highness made nearly the following reply:—

"I return you my sincere thanks for your very loyal and flattering address, couched in such terms as are most gratifying to my feelings. It is with equal satisfaction that I name to you, Mr. Mayor and gentlemen, the reception I met with on my arrival at the railway station this day. These receptions must undoubtedly add very much to the pleasure I feel at attending the very interesting meeting for which I am come to Bristol; and I will only add, that I can never forget your kind attention to me."

After the presentation of the address came

THE MAYOR'S BANQUET.

This banquet, given by the Mayor, G. W. Franklyn, Esq., to his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, and the distinguished members of the Council of the Royal Agricultural Society, took place at the Merchants' Hall, King-street. It was of the most costly and recherché description, served throughout on a massive service of silver and silver-gilt plate, and did great credit to the purveyors, Messrs. Niblett and Pring.

His worship presided, the vice-presidents' seats being filled by the town-clerk, Mr. D. Burgess, and Mr. J. Franklyn. His worship was supported on the right by his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, the Duke of Beaufort, and the Earl of Essex; and on the left by the Hon. Edward Everett, Minister from the United States, the Duke of Richmond, and the Marquis of Downshire.

Among the company present were the Marquis of Worcester, the Earl of Ilchester, Earl Somers, Earl Ducie, Lord Portman, Lord Stavordale, Lord G. Somerset, Lord C. Beauclerc, Mr. H. Handley, president of the Society, the Very Rev. D. Laud, Dean of Bristol, the Rev. Professor Lea, Mr. W. Miles, M.P., Mr. Sotheron, M.P., Captain Gordon, R.N., Sir T. Acland, Sir J. Johnston, M.P., the Hon. G. Berkeley, Mr. S. Miles, M.P., Sir C. Lemon, M.P., &c.

The cloth having been removed, his worship, in highly complimentary speeches, gave the healths of "Her Majesty the Queen," "His Royal Highness Prince Albert," and "The Queen Dowager and the rest of the Royal Family," and then proposed that of "The Illustrious Guest."

The Duke of Cambridge, who was received with loud demonstrations of respect, returned thanks, expressing his satisfaction at the flattering reception he had met with and the pleasure it afforded him to be a member of such a society. He proposed "The health of the Mayor, and prosperity to the ancient city of Bristol."

The Mayor returned thanks, and proposed "The Lord Bishop and Clergy" (which was responded to by the Rev. Prebendary Harvey,) and "The Army and Navy."

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge responded.

"The Royal Agricultural Society" being proposed,

Mr. H. Handley, the president, returned thanks. As the Mayor had said he was yet unacquainted with their mysteries, he (Mr. Handley) hoped that in the course of the present week the curtain of the society would be raised sufficiently high to introduce to their notice all the arcana and mysteries of agriculture. (Cheers.) During the week the city would be visited by many thousand farmers from distant parts of the country, who, he felt assured, would leave them with the conviction of the necessity of a strict union between the merchants and the agriculturists. The agriculturists, in their vocation, felt that the admixture of soils was necessary for the fertilization of the earth. He was convinced that the admixture of classes was no less beneficial to society, and he hoped he might be allowed to say that those would be happy days for England when they could reciprocate congratulations on the flourishing condition of all branches of industry. (Cheers.) On behalf of the society, whose mouthpiece he was, he sincerely thanked them for the manner in which they had responded to the toast.

The Mayor proposed "The Duke of Beaufort, Lord High Steward."

His Grace the Duke of Beaufort returned thanks.

"Earl Fitzhardinge, lord-lieutenant of the county."

The Hon. G. Berkeley, M.P., acknowledged the toast.

The Duke of Beaufort proposed "The health of the Duke of Richmond," to whom the Agricultural Society was more indebted than to any other individual.

The Duke of Richmond said, he must beg to remind them that his health had been proposed by one who had been his companion in arms in the Peninsular war, and who was therefore prejudiced in his favour: for he could not claim the merit which the Duke of Beaufort would bestow upon him. It was true that at a large meeting in London, Earl Spencer and himself had proposed the origination of this society, and that by the assistance of the practical farmers of England they had succeeded in establishing it, but in this he could claim no merit that was not equally due to Earl Spencer. He felt that this society was one of great national importance, founded as it was, not for the discussion of party, but on that higher and more ennobling feeling which had enabled this country to surmount every difficulty, the feeling of reliance upon themselves. (Cheers.) He could not sit down without noticing the hospitality of the constituted authorities of all classes of the citizens of Bristol, who had in the kindest manner thrown open their doors to all strangers who attended their meeting. He thought this was of great importance when he looked at the extent of the commercial transactions of this great city, and of the high character borne by her merchants in every part of the world. He hailed this feeling towards agriculture with peculiar gratification, proving, as it did, that they all concurred in the opinion that the agriculturist, the manufacturer, and the merchant, should do the utmost in their several spheres to promote the union of all interests in this great country, and that no opportunity should be lost to promote good will and kindly feeling, which were the strength and glory of the empire. He had not been bred to speak at public meetings, though he must plead guilty to have often done so; but they ought never to forget that excellent motto, that to be strong they must be united, and therefore it was that they should unite practical science with industry. He begged again to thank them, and hoped they should meet again the day after to-morrow, when they would see a sample of the British farmers, and if they were not satisfied with them, he did not know anything that would satisfy them. (Cheers and laughter.)

The Mayor, in an appropriate speech, proposed the health of the Hon. Edward Everett, the Envoy of the United States. (Cheers.)

The Hon. E. Everett, in acknowledging the toast, said, he felt gratified in being present on an occasion which was so deeply interesting to him, because he had observed that there was a great similitude in the mode in which such meetings were conducted here and in his own country. The fundamental principle of his country, as they already knew, was equality, and he confessed that he had erroneously thought that in the mother-country this was not so; but when last week he had met his Royal Highness at Cambridge wearing a doctor's gown at the University of Cambridge like the rest, and mingling equally with his fellow-doctors, and when now again he met his Royal Highness among the farmers of England, he was proud to confess how erroneous had been his impression; and he must say that this example set by his Royal Highness was calculated to have the most salutary influence. (Cheers.) There were many associations between the ancestry of Bristol and the United States, and he felt satisfaction, when, while at such a distance from his home, at being in a city which from the earliest times had been connected more or less with his own country. (Cheers.) Perhaps it was not known to many who were present that the discoverer of Virginia, Sir Humphrey Gilbert himself, had been at one period of his life a resident in Bristol, engaged in carrying on the trade of a common pilot between Bristol and Ireland. In later times associations had sprung up between Great Britain and America which he hoped would be advantageous to both countries. Steam navigation had still closer cemented the intimacy of both countries, and he could not forget that to Bristol was the honour due of having first originated that navigation across the Atlantic; and he could assure them that the arrival of their noble Great Western at the shores of America was considered as an era in the history of their country, which he hoped would prove but the harbinger of a closer union, and that the steam navies of both countries would only be used to assist each other. (Cheers.) The steam-engine had arrived at a degree of perfection in this country, under Bolton and Watt, but it had not been used on the waters in this country until his countryman Fulton took the engine of Bolton and Watt, and put it in locomotion on the waters; thus had this great result been brought about by the united sagacity of both countries. (Cheers.) He assured them that he felt at home in this the home of his fathers; and in coming down from London to-day every name and every spot on the map appeared familiar to him. This was to be accounted for from some of the earliest settlers in America coming from this part of England, and they in the United States had their Bristol, their Bath, their Wells, their Exeter, their Gloucester; every name in this neighbourhood seemed to remind him of the home of his heart, and to make him, a pilgrim in a strange land, feel at home. Mr. Everett then concluded by expressing a hope that the communication between the two countries would be still more frequent and their union more cordial than ever.

The healths of the members for the city, the counties of Gloucester and Somerset, the High Sheriff, the Duke of Wellington, Lord John Somerset, &c., having been drunk, his Royal Highness rose at about a quarter before 1 o'clock, and the party separated.

Thus, and at a sufficiently late hour, concluded the festivities of yesterday. The theatre, the fête at the Zoological Gardens, the Circus, and the various institutions of Bristol, all of which have been liberally thrown open, occupied the attention of the general mass of visitors.

This morning, unfortunately, has set in rainy, a circumstance much to be regretted, as the ploughing match, the trial of implements, and the show of implements, must naturally take place in the open air. Although the weather has, in more senses than one, thrown a damp over these proceedings, yet, despite the rain, every point of attraction is crowded with visitors, amongst whom are a considerable number of elegantly-dressed ladies. Every vehicle in the town has been put under contribution for the purpose, the different exhibitions being some miles apart. The trains from London, and the various conveyances from other parts, have to-day greatly increased the number of visitors. One London train this morning alone brought down upwards of 500, and extra trains have been put on to supply the required accommodation.

The Society of Merchants of Bristol sent a deputation to the Duke of Cambridge at Leigh this morning, informing his Royal Highness that he had been elected to the freedom of the corporation, to which a most gracious reply was returned.

The exhibition of agricultural implements, and the miscellaneous department of the show-yard, opened at eight o'clock this morning. The number of exhibitors were 99, and every species of implement used in husbandry was to be seen. The ground occupied by the exhibition was very considerable, and was accordingly well arranged at the back of the Victoria-rooms, Clifton. The stewards of the implement department were—Mr. W. Miles, M.P., Mr. Shelley, sen., Mr. Benett, M.P., the judges of implements, Mr. Parkes, Mr. Graburn, and Mr. Legard; and the judges of seed-wheat, Mr. Kimberley, Mr. Le Coste, and Mr. Johnston; and the director of the show, Mr. H. Gibbs.

A lecture on draining was delivered at the Philosophical Institution by Mr. Smith, of Deanstone, which was very well attended and gave great satisfaction.

THE PLOUGHING MATCH.

The next matter of importance in the proceedings of the day was

THE TRIAL OF IMPLEMENTS.

The competition between the respective exhibitors of agricultural implements took place on Wednesday, in a field near Sneed Park, the property of George Webb Hall, Esq., in the presence of Messrs Parkes, Graburn, and Legard, the judges, and Mr. G. W. Hall, the steward of the ground. The interest manifested to witness this trial was intense; from an early hour in the morning vehicles of every description were to be seen on the whole line of road from Bristol to the field, and in the course of the day thousands of spectators visited the spot. The trial commenced early this morning, and occupied the whole of the day. The number of implements submitted for trial was much larger than on any previous occasion. But even this exhibition yielded in interest to the GRAND PLOUGHING MATCH.

The public exhibition of ploughing in competition for the several premiums offered, took place in a field in the occupation of Philip John Miles, Esq., of Leigh Court, and situated near Beggar's Bush, on the high road to Pill and Portishead.

The weather was, on the whole, less favourable than could have been desired; but the interesting nature of the operation, and its importance as a branch of the agricultural art, attracted a very large concourse of spectators, including a large proportion of practical farmers. The hour named for the commencement of the match was twelve o'clock; but for upwards of two hours before that period the roads in the immediate neighbourhood of the field were thronged by persons from Bristol, as well as from St. George's, Abbotsleigh, and the surrounding villages, who were anxious to get a view of the proceeding.

The road to the spot selected is exceedingly picturesque and beautiful. Quitting Bristol, you cross the river Avon at a point which enables you to command views of the fine old St Vincent's rocks, with the suspension bridge in course of erection, and also the extensive woods of the downs, and a considerable part of the celebrated and fashionable village of Clifton. Ascending Rownham-hill, you pass through Leigh wood, a portion of the estate of Sir John Smyth, Bart., and one of the most charming suits of woodland scenery to be met with in this part of the kingdom. Further on you catch a brief glimpse of the Severn, and the mouth of the Bristol Channel, with the shipping entering and quitting the port, or lying at anchor in Kingroad; the view being bounded in the distance with the hills of the Gloucestershire coast, and the more inspiring hills of South Wales.

The field covered about twenty acres, but it was not considered a very favourable spot, as it turned up stony, and in some instances would hardly admit of ploughing to the regular depth of four inches.

On the ground were a vast number of fashionable equipages, upwards of 1000 in number, on horseback, and from 1500 to 2000 foot spectators. His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge was in a carriage with the lady of P. J. Miles, Esq., of Leigh Court, where his Royal Highness is staying. He watched the proceedings, in which he appeared to take great interest, for several hours. His Grace the Duke of Richmond, the Duke of Beaufort, the Marquis of Downshire, and other distinguished personages, were also on the ground.

Forty-six ploughs started, and the work was, as far as circumstances would admit of, cleverly performed. The decision of the judges had not been awarded when our report left.

The roads in the neighbourhood of the field presented all the appearance of a fair or racecourse; booths had been erected, barrels of beer tapped for sale, ballad-singers plied their vocation, the Indian juggler swallowed his sword, and there was full an average number of handbarrows, with "apples, nuts, and ginger-pop." At about half past twelve a sharp shower came on, and much amusement was occasioned by the flight of the lookers-on, who scouted off in all directions from the field of action. I need not say that the utmost confusion was occasioned; some were to be seen rolling into the mire, while others tumbled over them; others were fortunate enough to get under the shelter of a tree or bush; but by far the greater number had their agricultural ardour much damped by a thoroughly wet jacket.

To-morrow will be the day for the exhibition of the cattle and the awards, after which 2600 persons will dine together in the enormous temporary pavilion erected for their accommodation.

A very fine bull, belonging to Sir H. Hoskins, which was to have been sent here, has died suddenly, and a statement was, upon good authority, this morning circulated through the town that it had been poisoned. Three sheep belonging to a gentleman, and which were to have been at the show, are said to have had their throats cut. (This story is, however, not believed.)

Bristol, Thursday night.

Yesterday, after rain had done its worst—when it had duly soaked the congregated thousands at the ploughing match, and the trial of improvements—the weather suddenly cleared up, and the streets of Clifton and Bristol once more became all animation. The next proceeding of the day was the council dinner, which took place in the great room of the Victoria Rooms, at Clifton, which building has been kindly lent to the society for headquarters, by the proprietors. The building is a most elegant one. It is of the Corinthian order of architecture, and its octastyle portico, after the manner of the Propylæ at Athens, is truly beautiful, and does infinite credit to the good taste of Mr. Charles Dyer, the architect. The large room in which the dinner was held is nearly 118 feet in length, by 55 in width, and 47 feet high. This, however, is infinitely too small for the dinner of the members, which takes place to-day, and which will be held in an immense pavilion, erected for the purpose, at the back of the Victoria Rooms. According to the order of the proceedings, I first proceed to forward you a report of

THE COUNCIL DINNER.

The dinner took place in the large hall of the Victoria Rooms before mentioned. Five long tables occupied the whole length of the room, and a cross table at the top was occupied by the more distinguished guests. The hour named was five o'clock, but it was nearly six before the doors were thrown open. A very large number of well-dressed persons were assembled outside to witness the arrival of the Duke of Cambridge and the distinguished visitors, by whom his Royal Highness was very loudly cheered. The refreshments in the hall were exceedingly good, and the tables were very handsomely set out. More than 600 guests were present, amongst whom were his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, his Grace the Duke of Beaufort, Earl Spencer, the Mayor, G. W. Franklyn, Esq., Baron Knesebeck, the high sheriff, Thomas Jones, Esq., and the Town-clerk, D. Burges, Esq., his grace the Duke of Richmond, the Hon. Edward Everett, envoy from the United States, the Marquis of Downshire, Earl Somers, Earl of Chichester, Francis Savage, Esq., master of the Society of Merchants, R. Phippen, Esq., — M'Adam, Esq., &c., &c.

One of the tables which attracted most attention was that set apart for the accommodation of the press; the representatives of which from all parts of the country were present to the number of 50.

The President, (H. Handley, Esq.) entered the room about six o'clock, introducing his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, who was received by all the company standing, and with repeated cheers.

After the removal of the cloth, grace was said by the Very Rev. Dr. Lamb, the Dean of Bristol.

The usual loyal toasts were then given and responded to in the warmest manner. The health of the Mayor, and the Corporation of Bristol; the health of the Hon. Henry Everett (the American Minister,) an honorary member of the Society; Prosperity to the Royal Agricultural Society of England; the Chairman; and several other toasts were proposed, and severally acknowleged in an eloquent and enthusastic manner, which we regret our want of space imperatively obliges us to exclude. The company did not separate until a late hour.

THE CATTLE SHOW.

The great object of attraction to-day has been the show of stock, which certainly is of the most splendid description. The show yard was open as early as six o'clock, at which time great numbers were present, and after breakfast the whole spacious yard was crowded.

The stock comprises some of the finest beasts ever bred, and the beholder is struck with astonishment at the vast size and weight of the first class Devons, which seemed to attract the principal attention, particularly the first class prize bull of Messrs. Booth and Parkinson, and also that of the Rev. C. Mordaunt, of Cross, Somerset, which for symmetry and growth was considered unequalled.

The stock consisted of about from four to five hundred head. Amongst the sheep there are some beautiful specimens of Southdown and Leicester breeds, particularly the latter, belonging to Messrs. Joseph and Samuel Bennet, of Bedfordshire.

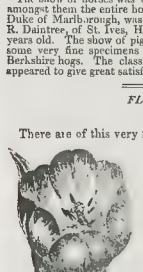
The show of shearling ewes was not considered to be a good one, and the judges withheld the premiums offered for this description on account of want of merit in the sheep comply for.

The show of horses was excellen, and attracted much attention; amongst them the entire horse, Young Sampson, the property of the Duke of Marlborough, was much admired, as was also that of Mr. R. Daintree, of St. Ives, Huntingdon, a beautiful roan stallion, two years old. The show of pigs was not very numerous, but there were some very fine specimens of the breed, particularly those of the Berkshire hogs. The classification of the various breeds of cattle appeared to give great satisfaction.

FLORICULTURE.

THE TULIP.

There are of this very favourite flower a number of different species, the merit of whose production must certainly be accorded to the Dutch, for to those persevering cultivators we are greatly indebted for the beautiful varieties they by themselves raised, previous to that attention being bestowed upon it by the florists of other countries, more particularly by those of our own, and who under whose management it has assumed its present perfect state. First of the species, let us place the Tulipa Gesneriana, from which all the fine varieties of the garden flower have been produced; these are divided into four classes—Bizarres, Byblemens, Roses, and Selfs. We shall have sufficient spaces to describe the forms and colours of these varieties: we intend merely to point out what it is that constitutes their beauties, and to offer some remarks on their general cultivation. The illustration that commences our article, is copied from the "Florist's Journal," a work to which we are indebted for the examples of choice flowers we have weekly given to our readers. In the same work the desirable properties of the tulip are thus detailed by one of the most celebrated cultivators in the neighbourhood of London:



"The flower should consist of six petals, three outer and three inner, placed alternately and closely together; the tops should be round and broad, and perfectly smooth at the edge; wide enough to allow the edges to lie on each other when the flower is fully expanded, by which the opening between the petals is avoided. The petals should be all level at the top, and not the three outer ones turning back from the others; it is frequently the case when a flower is a little past its prime, that the inner petals are higher than the outer. This is considered to be a defect. The ground should be of a pure colour, perfectly clear from any marks at the base of the petals round the stamina, as this is a blemish which no cultivation can improve. The stem should be elastic, and well proportioned in height to the size of the flower."

Perhaps few flowers require so much constant attention as it is necessary to bestow on the rearing of tulips. There are numerous matters connected with it, that, were we to treat of our directions would extend to a much greater length than our purpose will allow. For a thorough scientific essay on its cultivation, we must refer our readers to the "Florist's Journal," page 193, Vol. I., and will content ourselves with now submitting to them Mrs. London's more condensed remarks:—

"A bed, four feet wide, and of any convenient length, should be dug to the depth of two feet, and a stratum of fresh turfy loam should be laid, and on this there should be a layer of rotten cow-dung, and then a layer of loam mixed with an equal quantity of sand. The surface of the bed should be slightly raised in the middle, and the tallest tulips planted along it; the lower growing ones being ranged on each side, so as to make the flowers form a gentle curve on the sides of the bed. The tulips should be seven inches apart each way, and should be planted two inches deep, and then the bed protected by half-hoops placed over it at regular distances, above which mats should be strained, but so contrived as to be removed or opened at pleasure. When the tulips are nearly arrived at their full height, the hoops and mats should be removed, and, a path being made round the bed, a canvass awning, supported on a wooden frame, should be substituted. When the plants have done flowering, the leaves should be suffered to remain on till they turn brown, in order that they may assist in perfecting the new bulb that is formed every year in lieu of the old one, which gradually wastes away. When the leaves are withered, the bulbs should be taken up and laid on the shelves to dry. Any leaves that remain on may be removed, and the fibrous roots rubbed off. The season for replanting is the last week in October or the first in November. A fresh bed should be made every year, or the soil of the old one changed, as the exudations from tulips poison the ground for other plants of the same kind, though they are suitable for other crops."

Observations.—This is the proper time to bud roses. The chinese varieties are best on the common china, others on stocks of the wild or dog rose. Pipe pinks under a hand-glass, shade them from the sun, and keep them just moist. Sow picotees, pansies, polyanthuses, and all biennials. Carnations should be neatly tied up; if the blooms do not open regularly tie boss or silk round them. Ranunculus should be taken up and dried out of the sun.

THE WAR IN AFFGHANISTAN.

Extract of a letter from a non-commissioned officer of H.M. 9th Regiment of Foot, dated "Camp, Jellalabad, 20th April, 1842":—

"I think, when I wrote from Kawntour, I told you our destination was Cabul. We marched from there on the morning of the 5th. We ascended the heights in five hours, and found the enemy ready to receive us with a sharp fire, which lasted eight hours, when they gave way. The Infantry had the brunt of the work, particularly our regiment. We lost 20 men and a lieutenant, and 40 wounded. We were five days and nights on the top of the heights, with nothing but what we stood in, a continual firing kept up the whole time, and all we had to eat or drink was four or five mouldy biscuits and a quart of water, which we carried with us in our canteens. We did not suffer so much from want of food; it was water we wanted most. A continual biting of cartridges causes thirst. The Khyber Pass is a deep and narrow ravine, overtopped with high mountains. After we ascended the first height, and drove the enemy off, we mounted them successively; and as they fled we advanced, until we beat the whole of them, amounting to about 5000. It is calculated that about 500 of the enemy were killed. We had not an opportunity of taking any prisoners, for as they gave no quarter neither did we. The moment a man falls they run up and cut him in pieces with huge knives. After we came through the Pass we came to some villages; but the inhabitants had all fled, and we burned them to the ground, and destroyed the ripe corn—hundreds of acres of it. On the 16th of this month we arrived at Jellalabad—a place desolate in its appearance, it being a succession of mud forts; in one of which the 13th Regiment of Foot had been shut up for seven months, and, not expecting any relief, they sallied out on the enemy, determined to die by the sword rather than die with hunger. Luckily they beat them off, leaving the plain on which we are now encamped strewed with slain horses and men to the amount of 5000. We came to their relief in a few days after; so that there is now an army of 20,000 men, and not much fear of our ever being attacked again.

"P.S. We are going to attempt to release General Sale's lady and daughter, with several other ladies, two soldiers' wives, and two men of the 44th Regiment—all that is left of an entire regiment."

PROVINCIAL.

SIR W. W. WYNN.—We are highly gratified in being able to contradict a rumour, which we do from the best authority, that Sir W. W. Wynn had suffered himself to become a loser, at a gaming table, of a vast part of his property. The tale is utterly false in every particular, the gallant baronet having a decided aversion to gaming, in which he never engages.—Shrewsbury Chronicle.

BUCKINGHAMSHIRE.—A meeting was held on Monday, in the great room at the Crown Inn, Kingsbury, at which it was resolved that Mr. Phillips, of Wendover, should be requested to stand against Captain Duncombe at the ensuing election for the county of Bucks. The hon. gentleman has consented to allow himself to be put in nomination, and a committee was immediately formed, and a canvass commenced, which, considering the lateness of the start (as his party say), progresses favourably. Mr. P. Phillips is a strong advocate for a repeal of the Corn-laws, although the son of a large landed proprietor.

EPISCOPAL COLLEGE IN SCOTLAND.—We learn from the charge of the Bishop of Edinburgh, that in the short interval between November last, when the scheme was first published, and the present time, £15,000, being more than one-half of the required amount, has been subscribed towards the establishment of the Episcopal College in Scotland

COACH ACCIDENT.—On Thursday evening last, the Commerce (Leeds and Halifax coach) was overturned while on its way to Leeds, in Godley-lane, near this town, with a fearful crash. There were six or seven passengers on the coach at the time, all of whom were more or less injured: a young woman of the name of Vickers was very seriously injured, having sustained a concussion of the brain. Another female had one of her arms broken. Not the slightest blame is attributable to the coachman.—Halifax Guardian.

Between three and four o'clock in the afternoon of Sunday last, a fire was discovered on the Manor Farm, Great Easton, in the occupation of Mr. Thomas Turner, near Great Easton church. Mr. G. Palmer, Mr. Francis, and many other influential inhabitants, were quickly on the spot, and under their efficient directions the fire was subdued, after destroying part of a hay-stack and a stable, with some harness; but a new barn standing near was saved. It is feared it was the act of an incendiary. The alarm was given in church, just after the conclusion of the prayers, and when the clergyman left the vestry for the pulpit, the congregation, with the exception of the chirity children, had quitted the church. This hitherto rural and peaceful neighbourhood has within the last few days been a scene of great excitement; it is only a fortnight since two cottages were burnt down, and the body of a man, supposed to have been murdered, was found in the same neighbourhood.—Essex Herald.

Near one o'clock on Tuesday morning great alarm was occasioned in the town of Northampton by a cry of fire. It was said the George Hotel, at which the high sheriff and grand jurors of the county mostly put up at, was in a blaze; this, however, turned out not to be so, though the case was sufficiently alarming, the premises actually on fire being immediately adjoining the hotel, and for some time great fears were entertained for the latter. The conflagration soon got into play and the fire subdued, one house only being consumed; but the destruction of property carried from the George, in the haste, must have been considerable.

IRELAND.

THE ENNIS RIOTS.—The bills of indictment preferred against the police for shooting at the people, during the unfortunate separation riot which took place some time since at Ennis, were ignored by the grand jury.

Three persons concerned in the riot, and robbery of Mr. Bannatyne's boats, at Clare, were found guilty of the riot; but mercifully let off without punishment, counsel for the Crown having declined to call for sentence upon them.

THE INCOME-TAX. Circulars have been sent from the Paymaster-General of the Forces to all officers receiving half-pay, and retired allowances, and to widows of officers residing in Ireland, calling on them to fill up certain certificates, stating the amount of their income from the public, which, in the event of its being £150 a-year, will subject the receiver to the payment of the Income-tax. The certificate to be sworn to. If the income derivable from the public funds be under £150, any additional income derivable from private sources is to be added. A penalty of £50 is imposed for making a false return. [This is surely a case which calls loudly for exemption. The public might well have spared the pittance squeezed from such a source. ED. I.L.N.]

SUDDEN DEATH OF MR. JUSTICE FOSTER.—We regret to have to announce the sudden demise of the Right Hon. John Leslie Foster, one of the Justices of the Irish Common Pleas. His removal from this life was remarkably sudden, and without the slightest previous illness. It took place at Cowan, on Saturday night last, where he had gone, along with Baron Pennefather, to preside at the assizes.

THE ENNIS AFFAIR.—The Limerick Chronicle of Saturday informs us, that the thirty-eight policemen concerned in the late affray at Ennis, were discharged from prison on Wednesday evening, by order of Baron Richards, and now occupy their barracks in Gaol-street. They have not however, resumed their usual duties, nor will they, until the issue of the Government investigation by Mr. T. N. C. Smith, Q.C., is made known. It adds, that a report prevails, that fourteen of them had joined the army with the recruiting parties of the 16th and 85th, at present "beating up" in Ennis.

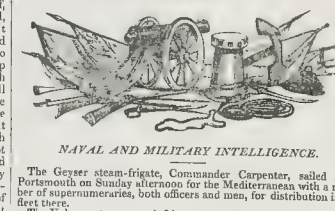
MYSTERIOUS DEATH. A death, which is at present involved in mystery, took place on Saturday, at Rathmines, near Dublin. Mr. Augustus Byrne, of Albert-terrace, a gentleman of 28 or 30 years of age, it appeared, had died under circumstances which gave rise to a variety of reports that he had not come fairly by his end. An inquest has been held, and adjourned for a week, to give time to analyse the contents of the stomach.

REPRESENTATION OF DUBLIN UNIVERSITY.—In consequence of the expected promotion of Sergeant Jackson, the Solicitor-General, to the vacant judgeship, a canvass has already commenced in the University. The next election there is likely to be a formidable struggle between Mr. George Alexander Hamilton and Dr. Longfield.

THE MARCHIONESS OF WATERFORD, DUBLIN, July 12.—I am happy to say that the Marchioness of Waterford is now so nearly recovered that it would be superfluous on my part to continue to transmit you further accounts on the subject—intelligence which, I am aware, will be received with joy by an extensive circle, but not with greater than that with which I have the pleasure to forward it to you.

The Countess of Caledon and Lady Stuart de Rothesay are still staying at Curraghmore, and will not leave until the health of their noble and interesting relative is perfectly restored.

ROSCOMMON, Friday.—We regret to say Judge Torrens had a bad fit of gout last night, and was obliged to have a sofa on which to recline while trying the cases. He is since reported to be much better.



NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

The Geyser steam-frigate, Commander Carpenter, sailed from Portsmouth on Sunday afternoon for the Mediterranean with a number of supernumeraries, both officers and men, for distribution in the fleet there.

The Volcano steam-vessel, Lieutenant Commander C. J. Featherstone, sailed same day for Bermuda; she carries out Captain Denham, of the Royal Engineers, who is to survey the fortifications there.

His Belgian Majesty's steam-ship, the British Queen, sailed same afternoon for New York from the Motherbank, where she arrived on Friday night from Antwerp. She did not proceed to Southampton as announced, but remained at the Motherbank, where she took in her mails and passengers. Captain Keane, R.N., who commanded her the last voyage, does not do so the present one, as the Belgians were desirous that she should be commanded by one of their own naval officers, and not by a British one. She is, therefore, now under the command of Captain Eckholt, an officer in the Belgian navy, who holds a rank in that service similar to that of Commander in the English navy. The King of the Belgians is about to bestow the order of the Cross of Leopold on Captain Keane, in approbation of his services. It appears that a great part of the cargo has been insured in several of the London offices, with the understanding that the vessel was going out under the command of Captain Keane. As no official or public notice has been given by the Belgian government of this change of command, and as even up to the present hour the vessel is advertised to sail under the command of Captain Keane, should any accident befal the ship or cargo, that country will be liable to pay up to the shippers the full amount of freight, the insurance being rendered invalid

PORTSMOUTH, Monday night.—This morning the Echo steam-vessel took nearly three hundred convicts from the York hulk, and embarked them on board the Marquis of Hastings, at Spithead, which will set under weigh in the course of a few hours for New South Wales. The notorious Francis is one of the number. He appears to feel deeply the dreadful situation in which he has placed himself; and, although his life has been spared, he is well aware that it is to be passed in the most galling and hopeless slavery, to which death itself were almost preferable. When he arrived at Gosport by the train, he was taken into the Railway Hotel, where dinner was given to him previous to his being taken on board the prison hulk. While he was eating it he burst into tears, and exclaimed, "Indeed, I never meant to hurt the Queen." He has been in a most desponding state ever since. Though the "provision for life" he has acquired is not what he contemplated, it is to be hoped it is sufficiently miserable and degrading to deter other ruffians from following his example.

The Nautilus, 10, Lieutenant-Commander J. T. Paulson, is still cruising off the Brighton coast for the protection of the fisheries. While lying at anchor a few days since, off Brighton, a party of ladies went on board to look at her, and during their stay on board it came on to blow a gale of wind, so that the Nautilus was obliged to ship her cables and put to sea, carrying the ladies with her, who were thus unexpectedly compelled to go on a cruise, which lasted several days, as there was no opportunity of landing them until the weather became more moderate.

SWEDENBORG.—COURT MARTIAL.—At the Special Court Martial which took place on board the Admiral's flag-ship, the Camperdown, to inquire into the charges brought against Mr. James Balcombe, late master of her Majesty's ship Larne, and which we mentioned in our last, a verdict of guilty was pronounced against Mr. Balscombe, and he was sentenced to be dismissed the service.

CHATHAM.—A detachment of 6 officers and 200 men, of Royal Marines, marched into Chatham, where they will remain till the new barracks at Woolwich are completed. On Saturday an order was received to launch from Chatham dockyard, about half-past one and two o'clock, on Monday, the 25th instant, the Goliah, of 80 guns, and Virago, a large class war steamer. The Goliah is to mount sixty-eight 32 pounders, long guns, and twelve 6-inch guns, burthen in tons, 2589. The Virago is to mount two long guns 84-pounders, and four 32-pounders, burthen in tons, 1060

COURT-MARTIAL IN THE TOWER.—On Wednesday the 1st Battalion of the Coldstream Guards, under the command of Colonel Shaw, now stationed in the Tower, were mustered upon parade to hear the finding and sentence of a regimental court-martial on Sergeant Sharp, who had been tried for disobedience of orders and neglect of duty. This proceeding arose out of the case of Mr. Elder, clerk of the Ordnance Office in the Tower, who has been held to bail on a charge of an infamous assault on William Yowel, a private in the regiment, while on duty as a sentinel at the Jewel Office in the Tower. Elder was given into the custody of Sharp after the alleged assault was committed, but instead of taking him to the guard-house, as Sharp ought to have done as sergeant of the guard, he allowed the accused to go to his own residence, and did not report the occurrence to his officer. The court-martial found Sharp guilty of the charge of disobedience of orders and neglect of duty, but in consideration of the excellent character he had maintained in the regiment for 19 years, sentenced him to be reduced to the ranks. After the sentence was read over Sharp had the stripes denoting his rank as a sergeant cut from his dress, and took his place in the ranks as a private. His conduct previous to the transaction in question was that of a careful and steady soldier, and he had never been reported before for any breach of military discipline.

NEW POLICE ARRANGEMENT. Several cases having lately occurred in which criminals have not been taken into custody so promptly as the public had a right to expect, the commissioners of police have arranged that a new company shall be immediately raised out of the present police, to be called the "Detective Force," and is to consist of two inspectors and eight sergeants and private constables, to be selected from the most efficient officers. The two inspectors are to receive each £200 per annum, and the pay of the other eight officers is to be raised to 30s. per week each.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

LAUNCH OF THE PRINCE OF WALES INDIAMAN.—On Saturday an immense number of well-dressed persons assembled in the yard of Messrs. Green, Wigram, and Green, the extensive ship-builders and owners, to witness the launch of the above splendid vessel. Every thing being in readiness, at a quarter past two o'clock precisely the stocks and fastenings were removed, and the vessel glided majestically into the bosom of old Father Thames, amid the firing of cannon and the shouts of the assembled multitude. She was decorated with a number of handsome ensign-jacks, and could not have had less than 500 persons on board at the time. The ceremony of christening was performed by Miss Dundas.

The Braganza steamer arrived at Falmouth on Saturday morning with the Malta and Peninsula mails, having left Gibraltar on the 30th ult., Cadiz the 1st, Lisbon the 4th, Oporto the 5th, and Vigo the 6th inst. Also arrived at same place on Sunday morning the royal mail steamer has Captain Scott, with mails from Mexico and the West India Islands, her dates of departure being from Havannah the 15th ult., Nassau the 18th, Bermuda the 24th, and Fayal the 3rd instant, with 300,000 dollars on freight, 107 serons of cochineal, and 54 passengers, 20 of whom were from Fayal. At all the islands they complain greatly of the hard times, and declare that ruin is about to overtake them, want of labourers being everywhere apparent in the cessation of their troubles. The Jamaica Dispatch says, "The interests for an immediate supply of labourers for the redemption of our colony is plain to every observer; and if these cannot soon be afforded, Jamaica will become a wilderness, a sink of iniquity, a den of thieves."

SUPPOSED NEW SHOAL. ANTIGUA, June 7.—Captain Newbold, of the brig Transit, on her passage from Halifax to St. Vincent in February last discovered a shoal to windward of this island, lat. 16 45 N., long. 59 6. He examined it as carefully as circumstances would permit, and describes it to be about 200 feet long and 80 feet wide, with three fathoms water in the centre, and much shallower on the edges.

LIGHTHOUSE AT ST. JAGO DE CUBA.—A lighthouse has been erected on the table land, about 500 feet to windward, or east, of the Morro Castle, intended to indicate the entrance of this harbour, and thus prevent vessels from running to leeward of it during the night. The lantern has been lit, and will continue to be so from sunset to sunrise. It is a revolving light, forms its complete revolution in two minutes and a half, is 240 feet above the level of the sea, and may be seen at a distance of 20 to 24 miles.

By the arrival of the City of Glasgow, one of the subsidiary steamers lately employed in the West Indies, we received on Wednesday Barbadoes papers to the 8th June inclusive. The Tay steamer had reached Barbadoes with the outward mails on the morning of the 7th, having made the passage from Falmouth, touching at Corunna and Madeira, in 19½ days. Col. Tayler, who had for several years been employed as Adjutant General of the Forces in Barbadoes, died on the 3rd of June, much and justly regretted.

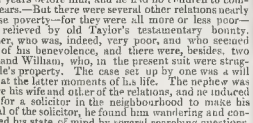
DEAL, July 12.—Arrived the Royal Sovereign, from New York; Juno and Caroline, from the Mediterranean. Arrived from the River the Hope, for Quebec.

During the past week much interest has been manifested in the operation being pursued, under the superintendence of Capt. Fisher, chief harbour-master of the port of London, in order to entirely destroy and remove the wreck of the barque Vesta, of 400 tons, which has for the last two years so materially impeded the navigation of the Thames off Gravesend, and which was finally completed on Tuesday last. After repeated explosions the whole of the Vesta's larboard quarter was found completely destroyed, from her keel to her bulwarks, as was also her bows. The starboard quarter and stern were much shattered. On the diver descending he found what remained of the vessel was the bottom, and which was shivered to pieces, and which may be easily got up, and has probably been so.

THE CHURCH.

ORDINATIONS. A general ordination was holden in the cathedral church of Worcester on Sunday morning last, when a number of gentlemen were admitted into holy orders by the Lord Bishop of the diocese.

A general ordination was holden at Farnham Castle, on Sunday last, by the Lord Bishop of Winchester.



LAW INTELLIGENCE.

PREROGATIVE COURT. TUESDAY.

TAYLOR v. WYLD.

Sir H. Jenner Fust gave judgment in this case.

Mr. W. Taylor was an old man, who, during a life of active industry as a tradesman in Camberwell, had acquired personal property to the amount of £500 or £700, and in addition a few small houses. His wife had died some years before him, and he had no children to comfort his declining years.—But there were several other relations nearly allied to him, whose poverty—for they were all more or less poor—would have been relieved by old Taylor's testamentary bounty. There was a brother, who was, indeed, very poor, and who seemed the natural object of his benevolence, and there were, besides, two nephews, George and William, who, in the present suit were struggling for their uncle's property. The case set up by one was a will made by his uncle at the latter moments of his life. The nephew was in the house, as were his wife and other of the relations, and he induced his uncle to send for a solicitor in the neighbourhood to make his will. On the arrival of the solicitor, he found him wandering and confused, and he tested his state of mind by several searching questions, which he was scarcely able to answer. To the inquiry, "To whom will you leave the bulk of your property?" the reply was, "All to my nephew." "To what nephew?" was the next question, and the solicitor was only able to comprehend whom he meant by bringing William Taylor into the room. The deceased then said, "That is the one;" and William Taylor having described himself, he was inserted in the will, as the principal legatee. The other relatives were kept out of the room.

The court pronounced it invalid. The onus probandi always lay upon a party bringing forward a testamentary paper, and the party here claiming probate had not borne the burden which the law had placed upon him. The will was made in extremis. The testator was in a confused, if not altogether in an insensible state of mind. He was unable to remember the position and prospects of his family. He seemed quite to have forgotten a brother who was altogether dependent upon him. The contents of the will were improbable. The will was not drawn up by the old man's solicitor. A stranger had been sent for, and he and his clerk were the attesting witnesses. The relatives were kept out of the room, or at any rate were not in it; and altogether was there so much suspicion about the whole circumstance, that the only course open for the court was to reject the prayer.

ASSIZE INTELLIGENCE.

SOUTH WALES CIRCUIT.

The learned judges opened the commission at Cardiff last week. The only case of interest was that of Edwards, for the matricide at Merthyr.

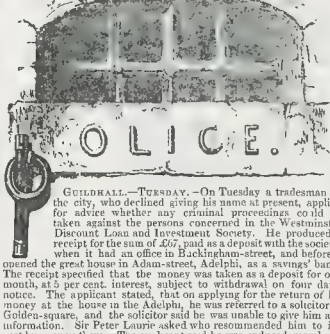
Richard Edwards was indicted for the wilful murder of his mother, Taman Edwards; and having been found guilty, sentence of death was passed upon him, the learned judge exhorting him not to entertain any hope of mercy in this world. The prisoner made no defence.

HOME CIRCUIT—CHELMSFORD, TUESDAY, JULY 12.

(Before Lord Abinger.)

Jeremiah Coghlan, 21, a draysman in the employ of Messrs. Barclay and Co., surrendered to take his trial upon an indictment charging him with the manslaughter of Emma Tudor. It appeared that the unfortunate lady, the subject of the inquiry, was the wife of the Rev Summerton Tudor, the curate of Woodham Ferrers, and on the day mentioned in the indictment she was riding with her husband and a servant in a four-wheel chaise on the Romford road, at the time three drays loaded with beer, and a waggon, were coming in an opposite direction. These vehicles, it was alleged, were racing, and endeavouring to pass each other. A ginger-beer cart was in front of the chaise; and the foremost dray, of which the defendant was the driver, ran against the chaise, turned it over, threw all the persons in it to the ground, and the unfortunate lady received such severe injuries that she died a few days afterwards. Several witnesses were examined in support of the prosecution, and they swore that the prisoner was riding on the dray, and that he had no command of the horses, thus occasioning the accident. On the part of the prisoner, it was contended that he was by the side of the horses, and that when the dray was passing the waggon, the driver of the latter vehicle struck the dray horses with his whip, and they became unmanageable, and did the mischief complained of, in spite of the endeavours of the defendant to restrain them.—The jury ultimately returned a verdict of Not Guilty

Two men, named Ladbroke and Appleby, were tried on Monday afternoon for a burglary at Langham, and stealing sixty-two sovereigns, some articles of wearing apparel, and other property, belonging to Benjamin Turner. Appleby pleaded guilty to the charge, and the offence was clearly brought home to the other prisoner by the evidence. It likewise appeared that before the villains went into the prosecutor's bedroom, they had gone into the room of one of the servants, and, while he was lying in bed, Appleby raised his bludgeon, and was about to strike him, but was prevented by the other prisoner. It appears that, after the burglary, the prisoner Ladbrook went to London, and he actually, in an assumed name, made an application to the Commissioners of Police to appoint him a member of that force. The jury returned a verdict of guilty, but recommended Ladbrook to mercy, on account of his having prevented the other prisoner from committing violence upon the servant.—Lord Abinger said that Appleby was an old offender, and he had pleaded guilty to another charge of burglary. The sentence, upon him was, that he should be trans-ported for life. With regard to the other prisoner, he should so far give effect to the recommendation of the jury, that he would not transport him for the full period; but it was necessary, for the protection of society, that he should be removed from this country for a long period. He was then sentenced to ten years' transportation.



GUILDHALL.—TUESDAY.—On Tuesday a tradesman in the city, who declined giving his name at present, applied for advice whether any criminal proceedings could be taken against the persons concerned in the Westminster Discount Loan and Investment Society. He produced a receipt for the sum of £67, paid as a deposit with the society, when it had an office in Buckingham-street, and before it opened the great house in Adam-street, Adelphi, as a savings' bank. The receipt specified that the money was taken as a deposit for one month, at 5 per cent. interest, subject to withdrawal on four days' notice. The applicant stated, that on applying for the return of his money at the house in the Adelphi, he was referred to a solicitor in Golden-square, and the solicitor said he was unable to give him any information. Sir Peter Laurie asked who recommended him to invest his money there.—The applicant said he was induced merely by reading the advertisements in the newspapers, in which there appeared to be some respectable names. Sir Peter asked if there were any names he knew.—The applicant said there were not.—Sir Peter observed that applicant was satisfied from seeing the title of honourable or esquire attached to the names. Had he not heard of the West Middlesex Assurance Company obtaining £300,000 from the public? Did not that make him cautious about parting with his money? Applicant replied that he had heard of that fraud, but people were not always on their guard.—Sir Peter asked whom the applicant had seen at the Westminster concern. The applicant said he had seen two persons, a Mr. Simpson and a Mr. Williams.—Sir Peter asked what sort of a person Mr Williams was.—The applicant said he was a short, stout man. Sir Peter said it was not then the Mr. Williams who figured in the West Middlesex Company. He was a tall man. Did not applicant on any occasion see the board of directors?—Applicant said he did not. He found the place fitted up like a banking-house, in a respectable place, and therefore parted with his money without any suspicion of wrong.—Sir Peter said the West Middlesex dressed men up in style, and decked their fingers with dazzling rings, to sit as a sham board of directors, at a shilling or two per diem. He asked if he had any book describing the organization of the concern, or list of parties concerned in it? The applicant said he had not. He wanted to learn who were connected with this concern, shareholders. He had received a copy of the Sun, wet from the press, in February last, containing the report of the last general meeting, from which it seemed they were thriving, having loaned £180,000 in three years, and divided 8 per cent. among the shareholders.—Sir Peter asked if he knew whether there was any deed of partnership? The applicant said he did not know. A gentleman in the room, who stated that he was a accountant, said the company might have afforded to be honest, for, according to the first report of their loan transactions, and looking at the terms of their prospectus, they were making nearly 60 per cent. per annum.—Sir Peter asked if there was any means of knowing how much the company had obtained from the public. The gentleman said he remembered they boasted in their second report of having extended their business to £80,000, but they did not mean that they had obtained so much capital.—Sir Peter said he should be happy to assist the applicant, but he was at present not sufficiently informed about the facts and the parties to be assisted. He must find out, consult, and act with some of his fellow-sufferers. The applicant promised to make further inquiry.—Sir Peter said the press would perhaps assist him by taking some notice of this application. Companies were extensive advertisers, and the independence and spirit of the press in giving publicity to statements affecting such bodies was above all praise.

THAMES-OFFICE.—On Tuesday Thomas Brown, who has been frequently in custody for various offences, was brought before Mr. Ballantine, charged with committing a felonious assault on John Brown, a seaman, and cutting his head open with a poker. The prisoner is an attendant upon an infamous house in the Match-walk, Shadwell, where robberies are almost nightly committed. The prisoner was committed BOW-STREET.—On Monday, Thomas Norwood, a driver of a Post-office collecting omnibus, was charged with stealing sixteen newspapers, the property of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. Clayton conducted the prosecution. Matthew Peake, a constable employed in the General Post-office, having been sworn, deposed to the detection of the prisoner on leaving the Post-office yard, after depositing the bags on Saturday evening, with a number of newspapers in his pocket; the newspapers were addressed, "Mr. Griffiths, Newmarket-place, St. Helen's; sent by J. Clayton." On being before the inspector, the prisoner said, "Pray, Sir, forgive me this time, and I'll never do it again;" and when the inspector asked him how he had got them, he said, "in the omnibus." There were four other newspapers found in another pocket, and he was then conveyed to the station-house.—Thomas Mortimer, shopman to Mr. Clayton (publisher of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS), 320, Strand, said that the parcel produced, addressed to Mr. Griffiths, was directed by him on Saturday last, and it contained eight papers, value 3s. 11d. The parcel, he believed, was sent on Saturday to the receiving house of Mr. Jones, Strand.—Charles Bowyer, a letter-carrier, who acted as guard to the cart driven by the prisoner on Saturday night, proved that on his way to the Post-office they called at Mr. Jones's, in the Strand, where they took up newspapers. The prisoner was ordered to be remanded for a few days, in order to give time for further inquiries. On Thursday the prisoner was fully committed, Mr. Peacock saying the offence was a most serious one, inasmuch as many respectable newsvenders had lost excellent customers in consequence of the non-delivery of the paper.

CLERKENWELL.—The fellow Gamble, the friend and associate of the murderer Good, and who, it will be recollected, was committed with that miscreant to Newgate, was brought before Mr Greenwood, charged with committing a dreadful assault on Mr. Richard Hammond, of Baldwins-gardens. It appeared that the complainant had interfered to save an aged female from the fury of the prisoner, and thus brought down his vengeance on himself.—Mr Greenwood asked the defendant what he had to say for himself?—He said he was called a murderer, and that aggravated him.—The complainant and the other witnesses denied this statement.—Mr. Greenwood, after commenting on the prisoner's brutal disposition, sentenced him to pay a penalty of £5, and to be imprisoned in the House of Correction for six weeks in default of payment

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.—The court and its avenues were literally besieged on Monday, with persons who had evidence to give against the parties in custody on suspicion of being concerned in one of the most extensive systems of plunder that has been brought to light for many years past. Since the apprehension of Richard Hanley, the person charged with having robbed a number of ready-furnished lodging-houses of plate, jewellery, and other valuable property to a large amount, he has given such evidence to the police as ultimately led to the capture of Edward Gifford and Sarah Ann Hunt, two persons living together at No 5, Warwick-street, Charing-cross, in whose house an enormous quantity of almost every kind of valuable property was found by the police. Since the last examination of the prisoner, the police have been indefatigable in tracing out the owners of the property. In order to facilitate this plan, the station-house at Vine-street was turned into a temporary bazaar, and numerous have been the applications to view the property. At a rough calculation, the property thus exposed, and presumed to be the produce of different robberies, could not be less than the value of £1,000. The whole pieces of Brussels carpet, silk velvet, silks, satins lace, gloves, watches, spoons, forks, rings, pins, veils, form a small portion of the miscellaneous property yet unowned. It is reported that Hanely has afforded much assistance to the police. He says he has been "put up" to all the robberies; that he has been furnished with all the necessary means to perpetrate the felonies; and has found a ready market for the plunder in the two other prisoners. On Monday the prisoners were brought up for further examination, Richard Hanley for felonionsly stealing, and Edward Gifford and Sarah Ann Hunt for feloniously receiving stolen property. Mr. Clarke and Mr. Phillips attended for the prisoners Gifford and Hunt. Further evidence having been received as to the identification of stolen property, the prisoners were remanded until Wednesday. Mr. Maltby directed the prisoners Hunt and Gifford to be sent to the New Prison, and Hanley to Tothill-fields.

UNION HALL. ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.—On Monday Robert Lindsay Crauford, claimant to the peerage of "Crauford, Lindsay, and Garnock," was brought before Mr. Traill on the double charge of bigamy and returning from transportation before the expiration of his sentence. A witness named Gavin Reddie stated that he had known the prisoner for the last eighteen or twenty years; and that in the month of March, 1827, he was convicted of horse-stealing at Londonderry, in Ireland. A sentence of death was recorded against him, which was subsequently commuted into transportation for life, but that he had since been at large in this country, although no remission of his sentence had taken place. That since the prisoner's return he had been busily engaged in prosecuting his claim to the above peerage, until it was discovered by his agents that he had forfeited them in consequence of being a convicted felon. The witness, in answer to Mr. Traill, admitted that he had not been present at the trial in Ireland. A young woman then stepped forward, and stated that she had gone out as a free settler to Sydney, in 1832, and on her arrival obtained a situation in the family of Chief Justice Dowling; that at that time the prisoner, who went in the name of Samuel Lindsay, was also in the same service; that in the same year she was married to the prisoner by the Rev. Dr. Laing, and in 1838 they returned to this country. She said that latterly the prisoner's conduct to her had been very bad; that he was now forty-three years of age; and that he married a girl about seventeen years ago, the daughter of a bricklayer, with whom he was now and had been for some time living at Vauxhall. She added that she confessed she came forward on this occasion owing to the infamous manner in which she had been treated by the accused. Mr. Traill inquired of the witness how the prisoner contrived to make his escape from transportation.—The witness, in answer, produced the Sydney Gazette, of July 15, 1837, with the following advertisement in its columns:—"I, the undersigned, eldest son of the late John Lindsay Crauford, Esq., claimant of the peerages and earldom of Crauford, Lindsay, and Garnock, do hereby give notice that I am about to leave this colony for Scotland, to prosecute the said claim now pending there on my behalf; and I therefore request all persons having claims upon me to forward them to my address, No. 17, Phillip-street. (Signed,—Robert Lindsay Crauford." The witness said, that the prisoner inserted the above advertisement in the newspaper, and that having been transported in the name of "Samuel Lindsay," he was not known as the person to whom the document referred, and being under but little restriction in his employment, he easily found means to make his escape and return home in a merchant ship, for which he paid £30. That she (witness) attended on a lady the passage home.—Mr. Traill remarked that there would be considerable difficulty in proving the alleged charge of bigamy, owing to the marriage having taken place in another hemisphere, and none of the witnesses being present here. With respect, however, to the other charge, that of returning from transportation, it would only be necessary to have the prisoner sent over to Ireland in the custody of a constable, in order to be identified.

The prisoner said that he had no wish to deny the fact of his being at Sydney, but that if he was remanded he would be enabled to show by documents which he should produce, that he was at large in this country with the permission of the authorities of South Australia—that he had not escaped from transportation. With regard to the other charge, there was no foundation for it, and that it was the fabrication of an exasperated woman. He stated that there was a strong prejudice existing against him, and that several persons were desirous of punishing him for ever from this country, to prevent him from prosecuting his just claims to a peerage. He, however, trusted that he would be enabled to overcome his enemies.—The magistrate then remanded the prisoner until Wednesday.

We have it from good authority, that Mrs. Yates will retain an interest in the Adelphi Theatre, and after a certain interval will resume her duties there as a member of the stock company. Mr. Rodwell, the composer, will occupy the position in the theatre made vacant by the lamented death of Mr. Yates.

THE WATER CURE.—The late Dr Parry, of Bath, had at one time under his care two patients who had attempted to cut short, or to ease, a paroxysm of gout, by plunging the affected foot into cold water. This gave instant relief to the pain, and, in both instances, the inflammation presently abated; but in both, also, palsy of one-half of the body occurred a few hours afterwards.

FINE ARTS.

THE ZEITELMOOS.

From a number of a German publication, containing specimens of modern engraving, we select one plate as exhibiting that rich and playful fancy for which many of the works of the German artists are remarkable. This imaginative faculty, when thrown into a pictorial shape, does not, however, always take so playful a direction as in the present engraving. The dark imaginings which seem familiar to the pencil of Retsch, are striking instances of this, though it is but justice to this gifted artist to say that he is equally at home where youthful grace and simplicity are to be expressed. The "Zeitelmoos" represents a benighted traveller beset by fairies, and plagued and tormented by the merry and minute beings in every possible manner. There is a spice of malice in your German fairies, though the artist hath limned them in agreeable shapes, as right tricksey spirits, elegant and graceful withal. The plate will not develop all it contains at the first glance; every corner is filled with life; the "creatures of the element" swarm in every part of the picture: they cling to the thong of the bewildered horseman's whip, to his hair and whiskers, to the mane of the horse, to the rein and bit. If he beats them off, they go like flies, only to settle on him the next instant. We are not without hope that their various attitudes will give the reader some amusement. He can scarcely lay his finger on any part of the engraving that does not offer something to engage his attention—even the frogs in the margin have a touch of the grotesque in them, "they imitate humanity" so admirably. Our engraving is somewhat reduced in size from the original plate, which is drawn and etched by J. B. Sonderland; it is intended to illustrate a fanciful little poem by Kopisch, of which we had intended to attempt a metrical version, but pressed by time and occupation, we have been unable to do so and therefore subjoin the following correct literal translation, which to the engraving will add some interest:—

"'Go home, ye little ones, and warm yourselves by the fire; in the evening it is not pleasant in the Zeitelmoos.' The little ones laugh; and, as he rides further from the spot, a maiden throws herself into the pond, in the cold water. What shall he do? He springs into the water after her to save her. Yes, when the water-sprites had only him for a fool! The water-sprites laugh. He crawls back to his horse with wet bones. There the little ones are sitting upon his horse again. Whatshall he do! He takes his whip and whips them; but, like dragon-flies, they spring down, and stand and laugh. And he settles himself, but he sweats with anguish when he feels again that the little ones are sitting behind him. What shall he do? They cling so fast about him and pinch him, that he cannot pull the little devils from his neck. And they laugh. 'It is not pleasant in the Zeitelmoos at evening,' chirps one. But he now sees shepherds round a fire What shall he do? He thinks it best not to trust himself from the spot even so far as the next village, but would get down, and speak civilly to the shepherds. The little ones laugh. He tries to knock them down with the butt-end of his whip, but they fly and make faces at him. The shepherds try to pull him from his horse. The saddle turns round and he falls down. The shepherds laugh. He applies his whip to them, but they both vanish He lies on the moor in the slumber of a damp bog. What shall he do? He jumps up, seizes fast hold of his saddle again, gets across it, and whips. 'It is best to ride away,' says he. The little ones laugh. He does not move; he seems to be in a dream. The saddle is not on the horse, but on a tree. What shall he do? From every corner there is a cry, 'Go home to the fire, and warm thyself; it is not pleasant in the Zeitelmoos.' The little ones laugh. And there he sits. The tree-frog croaks; the gnats sting. Everything there treats him as a fool. What shall he do? He sits and sits. The morning cock crows. Then they call out, 'Now, good man, you are released.' And they fly and laugh. He gets up; takes the saddle from the tree, and puts it on the horse; gets upon it, and rides out of the enchanted district. What shall he do? The day breaks, something sings in his ears, and he hears continually, as in chorus, the little ones laugh."

THE WILKIE TESTIMONIAL.

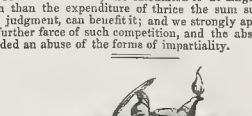
The very extraordinary facts connected with the decision of the committee, which has placed the execution of this statue in the hands of Mr. Joseph, will justify our alluding, some what more personally than usual, to their tendency—a tendency as injuriously fatal to the arts as any that may well be imagined. We dislike individual comparison, but we scarcely see how, in the present instance, such dislike can be compatible with our public duty; and shall, therefore, speak freely of names, as well as of principles. Among the names of the gentlemen who were proposed as candidates for the commission, were those of Mr. Bailey and Mr. Lough; the one of them holding, since Chantrey's death, the rank—and that by a generally common assent—of our first sculptor, the other, certainly but inferior to him; and both immeasurably superior to the gentleman who was selected by the committee of the Wilkie testimonial, as men of genius in their common profession Nor, if possible, were the claims Bailey's professional standing gave him to be selected for the task of commemorating departed genius lessened by the fact that he was a member of the Academy, which lost in Wilkie one of its most talented members, and perhaps, with the exception of Turner, its greatest living ornament. To this gentleman, then, we think the scale would naturally have inclined of those two whose pre-eminent powers we have pointed out. Yet how did the votes run? For Mr. Bailey 5, and for Mr. Lough not a single vote, while Mr. Joseph found 24 gentlemen who were willing to pin their faith on his unproved talent, and give him the commission, as a bust-maker, from which the mere name of Behnes —one of the best sculptors that ever lived—was excluded by the harsh interpretation of a chance.

Five for Bailey! none for Lough! and for Mr. Joseph twenty-four! It is as striking a commentary on the jobbing system pursued in these committees as can well be imagined. For the sculptor of the Fee, five votes; for the creator of the Milo, none; and for the gentleman who was a promising young man when Scott recommended him to Byron years past, and has so little verified that promise since, twenty-four!!

To what are we to impute such a disproportionate avowal of prejudice, folly, or determinate blindness, on the part of the committee who have coolly given such a judgment on the respective merits of the three? Were it possible to impute the small number of votes registered in favour of Mr. Bailey to any cause but predetermined favouritism, it would undoubtedly be the unprovoked, and, we believe, most gratuitously ill-judged attack made on him by Mr. Allan Cunningham, on the score of his having refused to sign a letter of condolence to the sister of Wilkie. We think highly of Allan Cunningham as a man of talent; but we can neither admire the feeling which induced him to attack Bailey, nor the taste which allows him to take so prominent a part in the distribution of the loaves and fishes of commission statues amongst the members of a profession he loves—at least we take it for granted that he does so. It would be expecting too much from any man, to suppose that, connected as Mr. Cunningham has been during the greater part of his life with sculptors and sculpture, he should not be biassed by those personal feelings which ought never to enter into the consideration of a question in which the public are concerned. Accordingly, his whole conduct evinces this bias, whenever we find his name mentioned in any of the committees of these public testimonials. The last character in which he appeared was as the patron of Mr. Weekes, in determining the choice of a sculptor to execute the Goodal testimonial; and we now have him, in the matter of the Wilkie testimonial, throwing his weight in the scale against Bailey, with one of the most singular personal arguments on record It was not possible that, in any way, the talents of the sculptor could be lessened by his refusal to sign the letter addressed by the Academy—or rather by the members of it, to the sister of the deceased artist; for it appears that the original letter was no act of the Academy as a body, by its own will, but a strictly individual letter left for signature with the keeper, Mr. Jones.

But there is another piece of gross partiality connected with this testimonial we cannot but comment upon. The model which Mr. Joseph had made for the statue was not exhibited until the votes of his supporters had been given in his favour, although other models and drawings from the various candidates had been previously exhibited. On such a proceeding we make little or no comment. The harsh exclusion of the name of Behnes from the list of candidates, through a mere lapse of memory on the part of the Bishop of Llandaff, is another fact which requires no comment. Reasons, and sound ones, were given for it; yet, we confess, we should have thought a little lenity in the interpretation of the restriction, might well have been ventured on in such a case. As for the utter want of a single vote for the name of Lough—perhaps as striking a fact as any—we have no terms sufficiently strong to express our astonishment, and can only trust that the grossly apparent injustice of the whole affair will partially react as a cure upon itself, and that we shall not very soon have to comment on such names as Sir Peter Laurie, Mr. Cunningham, Mr. Hall, and a few others whom we could, if were inclined to do so, point out, being concerned in the details of so gross a job—which name we unhesitatingly affix to the late selection of a sculptor to execute the Wilkie testimonial.

Such a selection as that which marked the choice of a sculptor to execute the Goodall testimonial, and this second bêtise by a second committee, are calculated to do English art more harm than the expenditure of thrice the sum subsequently, with judgment, can benefit it; and we strongly appeal against the further farce of such competition, and the absurdity of so paraded an abuse of the forms of impartiality.



LITERATURE.

A Summer's Day at Hampton Court. By Edward Jesse, Surveyor of her Majesty's Parks and Palaces. Fifth Edition. John Murray, Albemarle-street. 1842.

"'Mid all the palaces so fair,
Framed for the royal dwelling,' few possess more attractions than Hampton Court; its interest is not that of old feudal associations; it was never half palace, half fortress; it had neither drawbridge nor battlements, nor (and it gains by the want of them)—

"The loophole grates where captives weep."

Society had banished all these when Hampton Court was founded; the better portion of it was the creation of that princely-minded churchman—the last of that race of English dignitaries, who combined in themselves the powers and attributes of the priest and the noble. Founded by a cardinal, continued by one king, completed by another, and since inhabited by many of royal blood and station, containing within its walls some of the finest efforts of the painter, and the most elaborate productions of the obsolete, but beautiful, skill of the workers of tapestry, the palace itself is a building that well repays the visitor; but when, to the attractions within its walls, are added the historical associations that hang round the place, that linger in its courts, and lurk in its "trim gardens," where could a "summer's day" be more pleasantly or profitably spent, than at Hampton Court? And, if the reader will take Mr. Jesse for his companion, his days will pass more pleasantly still; for in his volume he has a store of history, tradition, and description, very skilfully combined; there is an authenticity, too, in all his details, which could only be derived from the sources at the command of "The Surveyor of her Majesty's Parks and Palaces." His details bring the mind of the loiterer into sympathy with the genius loci, if the spirit of that place can be said to be one and the same, whose duration spreads over the greater part of three centuries, of which the first was picturesque, the second quaint and formal, but not uninteresting. As we pass round the open courts, and issue from under the low archways, we almost expect to meet a robed and chained official of the cardinal's splendid household, admonishing a "clerk of the kitchen," or conversing with a "gentleman of the chamber;" nor would it startle the ear of fancy to hear the silence broken by the hearty, but coarse, laugh of Bluff King Harry himself, sauntering familiarly with the cardinal, during one of those visits when the monarch came to Hampton, to enjoy the hospitality, and, alas! to envy the splendour of his host. We wander into the blooming, though rather formally-disposed gardens; and, as we saunter up a shady avenue, we can almost hear the rustle of the silks and brocades of a group of lords and ladies, attending the Royal Anne on one of those occasions when she amid the groves of Hampton. Yes, there go the Belindas and Sir Plumes of the age when French glitter was spread over Dutch uniformity; they are going to loiter by the side of the canal, the beaux elaborately complimentary, and the belles condescendingly attentive, yet with a dash of something that keeps familiarity at fan's length. They have formed themselves into a very Watteau-like group for a moment, and, while Sir Plume is dangling his "clouded cane" with that "nice conduct" of which Pope speaks so prettily, and is opening the lid of the "amber snuff-box," which he little thinks is to be made immortal; we will leave them -for we cannot join the party—and return to Mr. Jesse's elegant volume, which recalls us to the actual.

"Sometimes counsel took, and sometimes tea,"

Bay Window in the Presence-Chamber, from the Kitchen-Court.

The descriptions will best be studied on the spot, the following personal trait would be interesting anywhere: —

"When Wolsey walked in the Park at Hampton Court, he would suffer no servant to come near him, but commanded them away 'as far as one might shoot an arrow.'"

Never was the odi profanum vulgus et arceo more practically carried out; yet was Wolsey a munificent master. Of such a man alone could the following description have been written; it is a fine specimen of poetical rhetoric:—

"In full-blown dignity see Wolsey stand,
Law in his voice and fortune in his hand:
To him the church, the realm, their powers consign;
Through him the rays of regal bounty shine;
Turn'd by his nod, the stream of honour flows;
His smile alone security bestows;
Still to new heights his restless wishes tow'r,
Climb leads to climb, and pow'r advances pow'r;
Till conquest, unresisted, ceased to please,
And right submitted left him none to seize.

"At length his sovereign frowns; the train of state
Mark the keen glance, and wait the sign to hate.
Where'er he turns, he meets a stranger's eye
His suppliants scorn him, and his followers fly!
Now drops at once the pride of awful state,
The golden canopy, the glitt'ring plate,
The regal palace, the luxurious board,
The liveried army, and the menial lord.
With age, with cares with maladies oppress,
He seeks the refuge of monastic rest.
Grief aids disease, remorse devours his soul,
And low his head falls to the block of kings.
Speak thou, whose thoughts at humble peace repine,
Shall Wolsey's wealth and Wolsey's end be thine?"

Archway and Steps leading to the Great Hall.

It was built by Henry the Eighth, after the death of the Cardinal; and of the present state of the apartment Mr. Jesse gives the following description :—

"The dimensions of this very noble room are—in length 106 feet, in breadth 40 feet, and in height 60 feet. The roof is very elaborately timbered, and richly decorated with carvings of several of the royal badges, and with pendent ornaments executed in a style which shows that the Italian taste had already made considerable advances in this country.

"Seven capacious windows on one side, and six on the other side, with a large window at each end, all placed considerably above the floor, throw a fulness of light throughout the apartment. A bay window on the dais, extending from the upper part of the wall nearly to the floor, contributes very essentially to the cheerfulness of the general effect. This window has recently been enriched by Mr. Willement with compartments of stained glass, containing the arms, initials, and badges of King Henry VIII., the arms and motto of Queen Jane Seymour, 'Bown'd to obey and serve,' and the full insignia and motto of Wolsey, 'Dominus mihi adjutor.' On the lower part is seen the following inscription—'The lorde thomas Wulsey, Cardinal, legat de latere, Archbishop of Yorke, and Chancellor of Englande.' The whole of the stained glass in the hall and in the presence-chamber is modern, and of Mr. Willement's fashioning and framing.

"It was, if we may trust tradition, upon one of the panes of glass of this window that Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey, so famous for the tenderness and elegance of his poetry, and for his martial nature, wrote some lines with a diamond on the fair Geraldine; and it is told, with what certainty we know not, that the first play acted in this hall was that of 'Henry VIII., or the Fall of Wolsey.' Shakspeare is said to have been one of the actors in this play.

"Above the entrance-door leading into the presence-chamber, or withdrawing-room, has been inserted a richly-carved stone bracket, inscribed 'Seynt George for merrie Englande,' on which, in full panoply, stands our patron saint, surrounded by a halo of ramrods, transfixing with his spear his antagonist, the dragon. On each side of this stands a smaller bracket, bearing figures clothed in bright plate armour. These figures have been placed here by permission of the Board of Ordnance from the stores in the Tower, and have been arranged under the direction of Mr Stacy, whose good taste in matters of this kind is so well known. He has also arranged a fine group of armour under the east window.

"Between each of the side windows there is a noble pair of the horns of deer, with finely-carved heads of the animal, and carved wreaths round each of them. These horns, which form part of a large collection, were probably placed in the hall in the reign of Henry VIII, when it was called the Hall of Horns. They have been preserved in the palace, and the original colours have been restored as nearly as it was possible to do so. Over the horns are banners, having the devices of Henry VIII. and the arms of Wolsey, and of his several benefices, painted on them. The string course above the tapestries has also been enriched with the rose, portcullis, &c., in colours. The most interesting, however, of the decorations to be seen in this truly regal apartment have yet to be mentioned. From the under part of the side windows to within a few inches of the pavement, the walls are covered with tapestry of such excellent design, and such costliness of material, that it may be safely asserted that its parallel does not exist in Europe at this time. Three pieces hang on each side of the hall, and two others at the dais end.

"'For round about the walls yclothed were
With goodly arras of great majesty,
Woven with gold and silke so close and nere,
That the rich metal lurked privily,
As feigning to be hidd from envious eye;
Yet here, and there, and everywhere, unawares
It shewed itselfe and shone unwillingly;
Like to a discoloured snake, whose hidden snares
Through the green grass his long bright-burnished back declares.'"
SPENSER.

The neighbourhood, as we have before stated, is rich in historical associations, and has a quiet and verdant natural beauty, which wins many admirers even among those who have a predilection for the grand and wild in nature. We must, however, close our notice of one of the most elegant and complete hand-books ever published. Taste should make it indispensable to the visitor to Hampton Court.

HAND-BOOK TO FREE PICTURE GALLERIES. By FELIX SUMMERLEY.

This very useful book we have to recommend to visitors to the following exhibitions, open to the public without charge :—

The National Gallery, open on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday.

The Dulwich Gallery, open every day, except Fridays and Sundays. A ticket must be obtained from some bookseller in London.

The Soane Museum is open on Thursdays during April, May, and June. Tickets to be procured of the trustees.

Barry's Pictures, at the Council-room of the Society of Arts, in the Adelphi, open every day, except Wednesdays and Sundays.

The above exhibitions are fully catalogued and explained in this little volume. We are glad to see these pocket-companions published; they are invaluable to the visitor and admirer of these national picture galleries.

The profits of the performance given in the Opera room on the 24th of June, for the benefit of the sufferers from the recent fire at Hamburgh, amounted to £640 1s.

MILITARY COMPOSITIONS.—The Guernsey Star of Thursday, June 23, gives the following reason for requesting advertisements for next publication one day earlier than usual, viz :—"In consequence of the militia going out on Monday next, and the whole of the men of our establishment having to attend to their military duties."

It is estimated that twenty-eight million pounds of genuine coffee are consumed yearly in the United Kingdom; and not less than eighteen million pounds more of vegetable matter are sold under the name of coffee. About half of these eighteen million pounds of pretended coffee are composed of chicory, upon which an import duty is imposed, and the remaining half of other ingredients are injurious to health, and a fraud upon the revenue.

It being reported that Lady Caroline Lambhad in a moment of passion struck down one of her pages with a stool, the poet Moore, to whom this was told by Lord Strangford, observed, "Oh, nothing is more natural for a literary lady than to double down a page."

ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH.—We learn that negotiations are far advanced for laying down the electric telegraph of Messrs. Cooke and Wheatstone, on the South Western Railway to Portsmouth. Her Majesty's Government are said to take a very lively interest in the matter.

There is every probability that some arrangement will soon be come to, for throwing open the cathedrals of this country, as well as public edifices and monuments, for the free admission of the public in the same manner as on the Continent. The Select Committee of the House of Commons appointed to inquire into this subject, have drawn up an admirable report, in which they state that the Committee do not apprehend that any danger to the monuments in Westminster Abbey and St. Paul's, would result from giving to the public, under proper regulations, the same freedom of admission to those cathedrals which is allowed in the case of the British Museum, National Gallery, Hampton Court Palace, and other places.—By the evidence of Colonel Rowan before the Select Committee, it appears that the conduct of the working classes has been of late years much improved; and he attributes the removal of exclusion, and the free admission of the people to the public edifices and monuments, as having greatly contributed to that favourable result.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

TOLBECQUE,

LEADER OF THE ORCHESTRA AT HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

PORTRAIT OF TOLBECQUE—(AFTER DANTAN).

Tolbecque, as thou in thy orchestral pride,
Still at thy post of music, true, art seen,
Long may'st thou lead, old boy! by Costa's side,
Triumphant in our Theatre of the Queen.

Thou art first fiddle now; and is not, pray,
Your life an emblem of a fiddle, too?
Which you, who hardest work when most you play,
Are only wearing out till "all is blue."

Long may it hold you, Tolbecque, in "good case,"
Well resin'd up by Health from day to day;
And as you're far too honest to be base,
Why, keep the even tenor of your way.

Be still an upright beau—and, o'er your bridge
Of life, walk, full of its most tempting things;
Then, when you rest on some retired ridge,
May it be long ere Death shall snap your strings!

SIGNOR DRAGONETTI,

KING OF THE DOUBLE BASS.

PORTRAIT OF DRAGONETTI—(AFTER DANTAN).

Who is Dragonetti? Ha, ha! you ask the question to sell, in slang phraseology, the simpleton who shall answer it. Who is Dragonetti? "Not to know him argues thyself unknown." He is the monarch of double bass—the veteran of the whole world of instrumental harmony. His name is fame; and he is, moreover, as much identified with his instrument as you see him here under the magic pencil of Dantan. He is part and parcel of the old and well-inured rosewood or mahogany, whichever it may be, that now seemeth as if it were "bone of his bone, and flesh of his flesh;" and literally he has been heard to tell men that "it is his wife." Drag!—Drago!—Dragonetti!—he has all sorts of familiarities upon our tongues. The great world has been often full of him, and he is still one of its living constellations. He is carrying with him the guerdon of genius into a late grave. Old, feeble, almost decrepit, he has bodily powers for no physical exertion, but that which his marvellous playing evokes from its lion's mouth of sound; and this he has still strength to invest with all the eloquence which has stirred the bosoms of his hearers for "many years agone." Honour will crown him as long as he lives; honour will follow him whenever he shall die; honour will survive and immortalize him far—far within the temple of memory, and beyond the tomb.

RACHEL.

(ON THE LAST APPEARANCE OF THIS GIFTED TRAGEDIAN.)

Again, high, proud interpretess of mind!
Young genius of the drama of old Gaul!
Fair sybil of the soul—from whom we find
Such oracles as stir and startle all,
Pouring their intellectual strength in light,
Beauty and passion, on th' admiring throng,
And sparkling in their fall like rivers bright,
Rolling, 'mid rocks, their sunny streams along.

Again, the glow and glory of thy thought
Are gleaming on the fix'd enraptur'd crowd;
Like some grand speaker, inspiration-fraught—
Thy listened voice seems, in a whisper, loud,
Till the fierce energies of passion rise
In grand sublimity before the world,
And then the loudness of thy whisper dies
'Mid the mad thunder by thy genius hurled!

Young conqueror of the heart—thy step once more
Is heard within the spirit's silent cell—
The way is stolen through th' enchanter's door
Into the home where sweet emotions dwell;
Tears gush up with thy sorrows from all eyes,
That—if thou art enraged—flash anger then!
Mover of love, pride, vengeance, joy, surprise!
And maiden thraller of the souls of men!

Thy genius still is with us—we rejoice
In the grand majesty of thy young mind,
(And all the lingering echoes of its voice
Shall leave their fine reverb'rance long behind!)
Still may we catch its cadence sweet of love,
Hear its terrific note to madness swell—
And only sigh—when all is past—to prove
Our grief that its last spirit breathed "Farewell!"

Farewell—young heroine of the tragic muse!
Bear back thy genius to a land thine own,
But say our English hearts did not refuse,
Queen! when thou cam'st, to let thee keep thy throne!
Tell—when thy native worshippers grow wild,
And Fame lays wide before thee all her lairs,
That in her crown of pride, their gifted child
Must wear our laurels still entwined with theirs!

THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue de la Chaussé d'Antin, le 10 Juillet, 1842.

Mon cher Monsieur,—Frequently, after the disclosure of some great political scheme, or the bursting of some great pseudo-commercial bubble, have I remarked the grave dignity with which those who rejoice in the appellation and power of the editorial WE, utter forth their perfect knowledge of unanticipated events. "We surmised," "we conjectured," "we anticipated," and "we foresaw," have each and all their various effects upon their still more various readers. This preamble, mon cher monsieur, would imply neither more nor less than that in the world of fashion, as in the world of politics and of commerce, "great events cast their shadows before." In my latter billets I have exclaimed against the rage existing in favour of short sleeves, without a due consideration of nature's fair proportions on the part of the wearers. I am too happy to find that not only in the higher ranks of haut ton, but even with royalty itself, long sleeves (and full) are daily becoming popular. At present they appear in morning dress only, but the time is near when they will be generally adopted. The shawl and the scarf have maintained their reign for ages, but the cardinales de l'Angleterre are as much admired here now as the cachmere de l'Inde is in the colder season. La Baronne D——, who is considered one of our plus belles etoiles, attracted the attention of all the promeneurs de Longchamps by the magnificence of her cardinale, which on dit is from Nottingham. En verite, 'tis the first time England boasted of a cardinal since the days of Wolsey, and vraiment, the manufacturers of Nottingham have cause to be proud of this distinction. Au revoir, mon cher monsieur,

RUGBY SCHOOL.—The Rev. Dr. Kennedy, head master of Shrewsbury school, is one of the candidates for the head mastership of Rugby school, vacant by the death of Dr Arnold.

In consequence of the continued illness of Mr. Arkers, he has paired off for the remainder of the session with Mr. John Bell, the member for Thirsk.

Sir Andrew Armstrong has paired off with Mr. James Hans Hamilton, for the remainder of the session.

The Lord Mayor (Sir John Pirie, Bart.,) will give a sumptuous entertainment at the Crown Hotel, at Rochester, on the 23rd instant, on the occasion of his Septennial Court of Conservancy on the river Medway.

EXTENSION OF THE FRANCHISE.—It ought to be generally known that for borough electors to retain their votes for the next year, it is necessary that they pay, on or before the 20th July, all poor's-rates and window-tax payable from them before the 6th of April. It is important to those who possess a qualification, but are not rated, to know that in those parishes where there has been but one rate made since the 31st of July, 1841, they can obtain a vote at the next registration, if they claim to be rated on or before Saturday, the 30th of July.

THE SNOW-DROP.

BY THE REV. HUGH STOWELL, M.A.

Pale daughter of winter, thou emblem of woe,
Bespangled with ice-gems, embedded in snow,
I love thee, all lowly reclining thy head,
As pure as the tear-drop an angel might shed;
So gently enduring the pitiless storm
It will not, it cannot despoil thy frail form.
Let others despise thee and choose for their bowers
The proudest of plants and the richest of flowers;
To me thou art welcome, meek emblem of woe
Though spangled with ice-gems and mantled with snow,
Let lightsomer flowers bedeck the gay breast—
On my wounded bosom the pale one shall rest;
Like thee, I have suffered the wild winter-gale;
Like thee, I have oft'times been lonely and pale;
Nor will I at storms nor at lightnings repine,
If only thy pureness and patience be mine.

MISCELLANEOUS.

SIR CHARLES METCALFE'S GOVERNMENT OF JAMAICA.—A meeting of the members of the Colonial Society was held on Tuesday at the Thatched House Tavern, St James's-street, to consider the most appropriate mode of expressing to the Right Honourable Sir Charles Metcalfe, Bart., G.C.B., the grateful sense which the Society entertained of the important benefits arising from his government of Jamaica. The Earl of Mountcashel was called to the chair. An address was submitted to the meeting by Mr. Burge, the agent for Jamaica, the adoption of which was moved and seconded by Mr. Burnley and Dr. Ralph. A deputation having been appointed to present it, the meeting separated.

The Naval and Military Gazette contradicts, upon authority, the rumour which has been for some time afloat, that it is intended to organize a new regiment at Winchester, to be called the 100th Foot.

SINGULAR DISCOVERY OF A SILVER COIN OF KING WILLIAM RUFUS.—A few days since, a labouring man, who stated he was engaged in digging up the foundation of an old house, in the vicinity of Westminster Abbey, entered the premises of Mr. Tummond, who keeps the Sun, public-house, in Brownlow-street, Drury-lane, and throwing a silver coin upon the bar, asked Mr. Tummond if he would let him have a pot of beer for it. Perceiving that it was good silver, Mr. T. accorded with the man's wish. On the following day, on showing it to a friend of his, he was informed that it was a very rare and valuable coin of Rufus. The medal bears date 1050. The shield or escutcheon contains a naked sword and three fleurs-de-lis, on the reverse is a warrior, accoutred in mail, on horseback, with the superscription "Concordiâ parva crescunt."

THE INCOME TAX.—Sir Walter Scott, in his memorable description of Mrs. Bethune Baliol, in the "Chronicles of the Canongate," says, "She was punctiliously loyal in that most staggering test of loyalty, the payment of imposts. Mr. Beaufet, her butler, told me he was ordered to offer a glass of wine to the person who collected the Income Tax; and that the poor man was so overcome by a reception so unwontedly generous, that he well nigh fainted on the spot." A severer piece of quiet satire on the obnoxious character of the tax, can hardly be conceived. Sir Walter little thought his friends, the Tories, would re-impose it in a time of peace.

When Mr. Wilberforce was a candidate for Hull, his sister, an amiable and witty young lady, offered the compliment of a new gown to each of the wives of the freemen who voted for her brother; on which she was saluted with the cry of "Miss Wilberforce for ever," when she pleasantly observed, "I thank you, gentlemen; but I cannot agree with you, for really I do not wish to be Miss Wilberforce for ever."

DRY HUMOUR.—An Irish poet having driven a gentleman a long stage during torrents of rain, the gentleman drily said to Paddy, "Are you not very wet?" "Arrah! I don't care about being very wet, but please your honour I'm very dry."

PLEASURES OF THE LAZARETTO.—Every one on entering the lazaretto is obliged to unpack all his things and put them out on wooden horses, during the whole time of his stay, the last three days excepted, which are allowed for packing up; and his quarantine does not begin to count until they have been so exposed. All sealed letters or packages must also be opened, unless he chooses to give up the former, and have them forwarded, after proper fumigation, by the post. Anything may be sent for from the town; but nothing can be returned, unless it can pass uninjured through the process of fumigation. The guardians are obliged every day to open and inspect the rooms, to see that the things have been laid out and exposed to the air. Great care must be taken to avoid touching any one not in quarantine, as he would be consemned to pass the same number of days in the lazaretto as the person so communicating him; who would have to pay all his expenses, and these he might increase to any amount in revenge for his confinement.—Wilkinson's Modern Egypt.

TINDER.—A thin rag, such, for instance, as the dresses of modern females, intended to catch the sparks, raise a flame, and light up a match.

The mightiest changes that the world has ever seen, were made by men whose only talents were love of truth, love of man, and love of God.—Croly.

An American editor says:—"If it's hard work to look at the sun without winking; but harder still to look at some of our young women without feeling inclined to wink."

"Pass," said a little boy to his father, "do people ever eat newspapers?" "No, you silly child," replied the father; why did you ask?" "Because," returned the boy, "I heard a man complaining of the hardness of the Times."

A bed is a bundle of paradoxes,—we go to it with reluctance, yet we quit it with regret; and we make up our minds every night to leave it early, but we make up our bodies every morning to keep it late.

When Foote was at Salt Hill he dined at the Castle, and when Partridge produced the bill, which was rather exorbitant, Foote asked him his name. "Partridge, an't please you," said he. "Partridge!" it should have been Woodcock, by the length of your bill."

SOUTHEY ON STYLE.—"Ours is a noble language, a beautiful language; I can tolerate a Gallicism for family sake; but he who uses a Latin or French phrase where a pure old English word does as well, ought to be hung, drawn, and quartered, for high treason against his mother tongue."

A link-boy asked Dr. Burgess, the preacher, if he would have a light. "No, child," says the Doctor, "I am one of the lights of the world." "I wish, then," replied the boy, "you were hung at the top of our alley, for it is a very dark one."

When Dan O'Connell was placing his son Maurice under Doctor Sandes, his tutor in Trinity College, Sandes asked him what he intended to make of Maurice? Dan replied—"Sir, I intend to make him a barrister; it depends upon himself to become a lawyer."

"I was not aware that you knew him," said we to an Irish friend the other day. "Know him!" exclaimed he, in a tone that comprehended the knowledge of more than one lifetime, "I knew him when his father was a boy."

GETTING UP.—"Such is the pressure of times in our town," said a Birmingham manufacturer to his agent in London, "that we have good workmen who will get up the inside of a watch for eighteen shillings." "Pooh! that is nothing compared to London," replied his friend, "We have boys here who will get up the inside of a chimney for sixpence."

It is said that a red herring firmly fastened by a string to any place where rats usually make their run, will have the effect of expelling those noxious intruders.

"Knowles and Power were together. Knowles says—'Power, have you any commands for Ireland?' I'm just going over. Power replied—'No; but to what part are you going?' 'Oh,' answers Sheridan, 'I haven't made up my mind yet.' 'Think,' says the doctor, 'of a man asking another for commands, when he didn't know to what part he was going.'"—Memoir of Dr. Maginn, in the Dublin University Magazine.

HOW TO GET A PRACTICE.—A physician of Montpelier was in the habit of employing a very ingenious habit to bring himself into notice with the public. When he came to a town where he was not known, he pretended to have lost his favourite dog, and ordered the public crier to offer, with beat of drum, a reward of twenty-five Louis to whoever should find it. The crier took care to mention all the titles and academic honours of the peripatetic physician, as well as his place of residence. He soon became the talk of the town. "Do you know," says one, "that a famous pays can has come here, a very clever fellow, of high academic honours, he must be rich, for he offers twenty-five louis for finding his dog!" The dog was not found, but patients were.

The life of a rich bachelor (says a Swedish novel writer) is a splendid breakfast, a tolerably fat dinner, and a most miserable supper.

A shrewd observer once said, that in walking the streets on a slippery morning, one might see where the good-natured people lived by the ashes thrown on the ice before the door.

"Father, what do printers live on?" "Why, child?" "You said you had not paid him for two or three years, and yet you have his paper every week?" "Take the child out of the room,—what does he know about right or wrong."

Talleyrand being pestered with importunate questions by a squinting man concerning his broken leg, replied, "It is crooked, as you see."

A Yankee has invented a butter-churn that is worked by a locomotive! He sends off his new milk by the railway train, and it arrives at market worked up into butter!

AWFUL CONFLAGRATION.—A dandy fell in the fire the other day, and being unable to rise, his head was entirely consumed. Luckily, there happened to be nothing in it.

A lady, who was by no means modest and submissive before marriage, was observed by a friend to use her tongue pretty freely after. "There was a time when I almost imagined she had none." "Yes," said the husband, with a sigh, 'but its very long since."

"What harm is there in a pipe?" says young Puffwell. "None that I know of," replied his companion, "except that smoking induces drinking; drinking induces intoxication; intoxication induces the bile; bile induces jaundice; jaundice leads to dropsy; dropsy terminates in death. Put that in your pipe and smoke it."

"Come here, Sally, my love. Now tell me what b-e-d it means?" "Don't know, ma'am." "What! La, what ignorant children! Take your finger out of your mouth. Well now, Sally, what's put round your waist every day? Come now, look at me. Speak out. Fibaw, what are you looking so sheepish for? Tell me now." "Oh, Mrs. Boozle, I didn't think you knew'd it." "Could what are you thinking about, child? Come 'tother scholars are waiting. Answer me directly. What is put round your waist every day?" "A-a-a hem; its Joe Stokes's arm, but he kissed me only jest once."

PACKING OF FIGS.—The process of packing figs in the drums for exportation is considered as one of the "curiosities" of Smyrna, though, in truth, it is simple enough, and conducted without any mystery. After drying on the tree, they are brought from the country on camels' backs. The figs are then turned out in a heap in the middle of an apartment, round which are squatted a group of women and children, not very cleanly in appearance, who press them into rather a long shape from the stalk, and then hand them in sieves to another party of women and men, who, with a drum before them, and a pail of salt water by their sides, form a little packet of figs in their hands by pressing half-a-dozen close together, and place them round the inner edge of the drum, with the stalk inwards. On completing the circle, they fill up the inside with as many as they can get in and then, sprinkling the whole with salt water to destroy the worm which each fig is said to contain, and to produce a candied appearance by crystallisation, they proceed to the next layer.

TRAIT OF A DUELLIST.—Lord Camelford commanded the Favourite sloop-of-war, and Commodore Fahie the ship Perdrix, Mr. Peterson holding the rank of First Lieutenant on board the last named vessel. Commodore Fahie had left Antigua a short time before, to take temporary command of the fleet, then anchored before St. Kitt's; and, during his absence, Lieutenant Peterson was of course left in command of the Perdrix. Lord Camelford and Lieutenant Peterson were unhappily at variance; and, perhaps to mortify his rival, Lord Camelford ordered Mr. Peterson to take the watch on the very evening that a gay ball was to be given at Black Point to the naval officers. Unfortunately, Lieutenant Peterson entertained the idea that he was in command of the ship Perdrix, in the absence of Commodore Fahie, he was superior officer to Lord Camelford who only commanded a sloop; and, in consequence of this false impression, he positively refused to obey his lordship's orders.—The disastrous evening approached, and the Lieutenant retired to his quarters above the captain-house in order to dress for the festive party. Arming himself with a pair of loaded pistols, and telling his boat's crew to attend him, Lord Camelford quitted his retirement, and stationed himself directly between the captain-house and the guard-house (now called the Commissioner's house), and there waited the approach of Mr. Peterson, whom he had already summoned to attend him.—Upon the unfortunate young officer making his appearance, accompanied by some friends, his lordship again commanded him to take the watch for the evening; he again refused; when, taking one of the pistols from his bosom, Lord Camelford immediately fired, and the ball passing through the breast of the brave but inconsiderate lieutenant, he fell a corpse upon the ground, the deadly stream welling from the wound, and staining, as it flowed, the gay buildings which he never—No sooner did the well-aimed weapon do its work, than, drawing the other from its resting place, his lordship turned to the Second Lieutenant of the Perdrix, and pointing it at him, asked if he would obey his orders, or meet the same punishment as Mr. Peterson? Life is sweet!—the second in command saw his friend stretched at his feet with the red blood gurgling around him; and, fearing the same fate, he obeyed Lord Camelford, and took the watch.—Antigua and the Antiguans.

NEGRO WEDLOCK IN THE WEST INDIES.—When the light of day began to dawn upon this benighted part of the globe by the introduction of Christianity among the Negroes, they were encouraged by the Moravians and Methodists to choose a partner from among the other sex, and, in the face of the congregation vow to each other fidelity and love. Although, of course, such marriages were not held binding by law, it was hoped that it would, in some measure, check the increase of immorality, and, in some instances, it might have done so; but the greater part violated those vows without compunction, or held them only until a fresh object gained their attention. It has been frequently known for a man thus married to maintain his wife and his mistress in the same house; which arrangement occasioned frequent domestic broils; and, in such cases, the man being applied to as umpire, has settled the dispute by remarking to his mistress, "That she must not quarrel with her companion, who was his wife; and that if she did, he would turn her away," and then, addressing the aggrieved wife, tell her, for her consolation, "That she must not mind, because she was his wife already."—After the Negroes were freed from the thrall of slavery in 1834, and the same privileges open to them as to the rest of the British subjects, it was their pride to be married at the Established Church. In many instances they had been already joined by the Moravian or Methodist preachers; but, wishing to get rid of their partners who had borne with them the brunt of slavery, they privately paid their addresses to some of the young ladies already mentioned, carried them to the altar, and there married in direct opposition to their former vows, which were as binding and sacred in the eyes of God as if his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury had pronounced the nuptial benediction. Among such an immense number of Negroes, it is almost impossible to discover the offenders in this respect against common decency, although the clergymen are generally indefatigable in their exertions to discover the truth. Still, vigilant as they are they have been deceived, and instances are known where parties have been twice married, even in the Episcopal Church.

* * * * * *

When such circumstances have occurred, and the clergymen refused to remarry them, it has been no unfrequent practice for the parties to embark on board a small vessel and, proceeding to Montserrat, or some other island, there to procure the completion of their unhallowed purpose.—Another evil to be deplored is, that even when parties are lawfully joined in the bands of wedlock, they pay such little regard to the solemnity of the act. The smart dresses (for which often they commit an unlawful deed), the plentiful breakfast or lunch, the gilded cake, and the driving about in borrowed gigs, is much more thought of by them than the serious, the important promise, of loving one another in sickness and in health, and, forsaking all others, cleave only unto them, who by the ordinances of God and man are made one flesh. From this want of regard to the serious part of the ceremony, great mischief ensues. As soon as the novelty has worn off, the husband forgets the wife he ought to cherish, and the wife forgets his honour which she is bound to protect. The old leaven cleaves about them; and, throwing off all shame, they follow the bad example of their parents (who indeed are less faulty than themselves not having had such means of instruction), and by these means give to the country, instead of an honest peasantry, a race of idle illegitimate children.—Antigua and the Antiguans.

DERIVATIONS.—Bourne, a place bounded or enclosed from the moors and downs; as Cranbourne, Winterbourne.—Bye, a dwelling; as Grimsby, Hornsby, Rugby, Wetherby.—Chippenham, Chipping-Norton; that is Market Norton.—Coombe, a vale in the bosom of hills; as, Englishcoombe, Monkton-coombe.—Ham, home; hence Hampton, Buckingham, Fakenham; hence, also, hamlet, a village of scattered houses.—Stoke, a village; a sorry retreat; a residence within a village; it is often joined to another name, as Limpleystoke, Basingstoke, Chewstoke.—Pen, a hill, the summit of a hill, a promontory: hence Penrith in Cumberland, and many highlands in Cornwall.

A CANDID CONFESSION.—Among the traditions of Westminster Hall is one of a certain Sergeant Davy, who flourished some centuries back, in a darker age than the present. He was accused, once upon a time, by his brethren of the coif, of having degraded their order by taking from a client a fee in copper; and on being solemnly arraigned for his offence in their Common Hall, it appears, from the unwritten reports of the Court of Common Pleas, that he defended himself by the following plea of confession and avoidance:—"I fully admit that I took a fee from him in copper, and not only one, but several, and not only fees in copper, but fees in silver, but I pledge my honour as a sergeant that I never took a single fee from him in silver until I had got all his gold, and that I never took a single fee from him in copper until I had got all his silver—and you don't call that a degradation of our order?"

VARIETIES OF COUNTENANCE.—It is the common wonder of all men, how, among so many millions of faces, there should be none alike; now, on the contrary, I wonder as much how there should be any. He that shall consider how many thousand several words have been carelessly and without study composed out of twenty-four letters; withal, how many hundred lines there are to be drawn in the fabric of one man, shall easily find that this variety is necessary: and it will be very hard that they shall so concur as to make one portrait like another. Let a painter carelessly draw a million of faces, and you shall find them all different; yea, let him have his copy before him, yet, after all his art, there will remain a sensible distinction; for the pattern or example of everything is the perfectest in that kind, whereof we still come short, though we transcend or go beyond it; because herein it is rude, and agrees not in all points unto its copy.—Sir Thomas Browne.

ABSURDITIES.—To attempt to borrow money on the plea of extreme poverty.—To make yourself generally disagreeable, and wonder no one will visit you unless they gain some palpable advantage by it.—To sit shivering in the cold because you wont have a fire till November.—To suppose the reviewers generally read more than the title page of the works they praise or condemn.—To keep your clerks on miserable salaries and wonder at their robbing you.—Not to go to bed when you are tired and sleepy because it is not bed-time.—To make your servants tell lies for you and afterwards be angry because they tell lies for themselves.—To tell your own secrets, and believe other people will keep them.—To render a man a service voluntarily, and expect him to be grateful for it.—To expect to make people honest by hardening them in jail, and afterwards sending them adrift without the means of getting work.—To fancy a thing cheap because a low price is asked for it.—To say a man is charitable because he subscribes to an hospital.—To arrive at the age of fifty and be surprised at any vice, folly, or absurdity your fellow creatures may be guilty of.—To vote for a candidate at an election because he shakes hands with your wife and child, and admires the baby.

CHEAP PORK.—When pigs is scarce, there's plenty o' ways of filling the pork barrel for them Britishers. You know there's young porpesses, seals, an' slick dogs, as well as bears an' possums—an' there's plenty o' ways to cheat pigs as died in murrain time to put along with 'em. Them 'ere pigs warn't a no use then—but now we knows better—we shan't throw away nothing. But, man, it a'nt lawful to put no young children in pickle.—American Paper.

AN APT REPLY.—"Husband, I don't know where that boy got his bad temper—not from me, I'm sure." "No, my dear, for I don't perceive you have any!"

"Well, Mister Jones, and how does your son get on with the clarionet?" "Mighty well, sir, there were fourteen on us playing together the other night, and he beat us all; he took the lead, and kept it so well, sir, that none of us could catch him."

At the Microscopic Society, specimens of microscopic animalcules, sent us from the country alive, through the post-office, were exhibited by Mr. Ross. They had been enclosed, with the weeds they were attached to, in a piece of wet linen, covered over with tinfoil.

China.—The conterminous empires of Russia and China occupy between them about one-fifth of the whole globe, in pretty nearly equal proportions but the population of China is about four times greater than that of the former, even after including its recent addition of ten millions of Poles. We can easily trace the boundaries and mark the extreme limits of those two great empires by parallels of latitude and meridional lines of longitude—but when we come to reduce them to square miles, or speak of their contents in acres, the mind is bewildered in the magnitude of the number required to express them, and forms but an indistinct idea of their superficial extent. For this reason we shall content ourselves by merely tracing the boundary lines. The frontier of China on the side of Russia, including every part of Tartary under its immediate protection and from which it derives tribute, is as follows:—Commencing at the north-eastern extremity, where the Uda falls into the sea of Otchotsk, in the 55th parallel of northern latitude, it stretches W. and W.S.W. along the limits of the Tungousi Tartars, the Dunowiso mountains, along the Kerlin which divides it from the Russian province of Nertchinsk, till it meets the 50th parallel. It then continues along that parallel from 117 deg. to 70 of east longitude, separated from Tobolsk and Irchuisk by the Sawansk, the Altai, and the Bercha mountains. On this line and about the 106th meridian, on the river Selinga, are situated the two frontier trading towns of Keaokta and Mai-mai-tchin, the only two points in the long conterminous line of boundary where Russians and Chinese have any communication. Hence, descending south along the Kirghis Tartars, western Tooikistaun, and Little Thibet, it is terminated in this direction by the Hindoo Coosh—and turning to the S.E. along the Himalah mountains, Bootan, Assam, the Burman Empire, and Tonquin, it again skirts the sea in the parallel of 21 deg. as far to the eastward as 123 deg. (including Coorea to 130 deg.) and near the Uda, from whence we set out, to 143 deg. of east longitude. The extent of frontier cannot be less than ten thousand geographical miles.—Encyclopædia Britannica.

Chinese Junks.—A Chinese ship, or junk, is seldom the property of one individual. Sometimes 40, 50, or even 100 different merchants purchase a vessel, and divide her into as many different compartments as there are partners, so that each knows his own particular part in the ship, which he is at liberty to fit up and secure as he pleases. The bulk-heads, by which these divisions are formed, consist of four stout planks, so well caulked as to be completely water-tight. A ship thus formed may strike on a rock, and yet sustain no serious injury: a leak springing in one division of the hold will not be attended with any damage to articles placed in another; and, from her firmness, she is qualified to resist a more than ordinary shock. A considerable loss of stowage is, of course, sustained; but the Chinese exports generally contain a considerable value in small bulk. It is only the very largest junks that have so many owners; but even in the smallest class the number is very considerable.—M'Culloch's Dictionary.

Russian Toilet.—Very old, and probably oriental, customs are still discernible among the pure Russians, and seem to be more firmly rooted in them than in any other European people. The manner of washing themselves is strictly what it was among the ancient Egyptians, as it is described in the Bible, as it prevailed among the old Greeks and Romans, and is practised by Moslems in the present day. They cannot, however, boast of the cleanliness of the followers of Mahomet in general: though the use of the bath is frequent, it is not all that is required. Our travelling companion, a very good specimen of Russian high life, at first rather amused us with the mode of making his ablutions; but, after a time, when he endeavoured to persuade us to adopt it, disgusted us. The assistance of your servant is indispensable to wash the face, but they are certainly independent of many other things we require for the toilet. The first operation is to wash the hands, for which no basin or anything corresponding to it is necessary; the patient sits down on a chair, and on another, opposite to him, some recipient, it matters not what, is placed to catch the water; he then takes a piece of soap, over which his servant pours the water two or three times, till the hands are considered washed, when he presents a towel, and they are wiped. Then the face has its turn, water is again poured into the hollow of the hands, which are pressed together to make them as water-tight as possible, a portion of it is imbibed, and kept in the mouth, the rest thrown over the face; this is repeated two or three times, after which the forefinger is put into the mouth, and with its assistance, which supersedes the use of the tooth-brush, the mouth is rinsed out, and the toilet is completed. Never have we seen more beautiful or whiter teeth than our companion's, in spite of this process of keeping them so.

Coming on of Insanity. The management of the early stage of insanity requires on the part of the physician great delicacy, discrimination, and judgment. Under these circumstances, where the brain is in an irritable condition, and the mind is struggling between sanity and insanity, the person being conscious that his "wits" are beginning "to turn," the medical attendant should proceed cautiously in his examination. If the patient is led to believe, from the conduct of the physician, or from anything which falls from him, that derangement of mind is suspected, the most painful and disastrous consequences may ensue. In the early stage of insanity the patient's suspicions are morbidly excited. He has a dread of "going mad," expresses a horror of such a calamity, and often most postively refuses to allow himself to be questioned on the subject of his health. Should the patient believe that he is suspected to be deranged, he will sometimes exhibit great violence and excitement, and denounce his friends and family, charging them with a conspiracy against his life and liberty.—F. Winslow's "Health of Body and Mind."

Russian Merchants and Morality.—With these natural good qualities, and some talent besides, the one is eclipsed by, and the other prostituted to, the extraordinary love of cheating in their dealings with others. The best class of Russian merchants, and lowest mujik who has anything to sell, agree in this, and they seem equally indifferent as to the amount, so long as they can maintain the principle of overreaching. All their cunning, knowledge, and advantages, are employed in this one engrossing object. We believe they are made happy by the thought of having succeeded in ever so trifling a degree.

Dr. Whitfield, the celebrated botanist, sailed last week for the African coast, in search of natural curiosities, having received a carte blanche from the Earl of Derby. His Lordship's collection at Knowsley-park consists of every animal and bird in the known world. The ground they now occupy exceeds 500 acres.

Reverence for the Bible.—It is of the greatest importance that we should resist the temptation, frequently so strong, of annexing familiar, facetious, or irreverent ideas to a scriptural usage, a scriptural expression, a scripture text, or a scripture name. Nor should we hold ourselves guiltless, though we have been misled by mere negligence or want of reflection Every person of good taste will avoid reading a travestie of a beautiful poem, because the recollection of the degraded likeness will always obtrude itself upon the memories, when we wish to derive pleasure from the the contemplation of the elegance of the original. But how much more urgent is the duty by which we are bound to keep the sacred pages of the Bible clear of any impression tending to diminish the blessing of habitual respect and reverence towards the written laws and precepts of our Great Creator. Do not on any occasion whatever be tempted to quote a single word or phrase of the Bible to illustrate any profane conversation or writing. Let these sacred words (1 Samuel, ii. 30.) be thoroughly impressed on your heart and be present with you constantly and for ever, — "Them that honour Me I will honour: and they that despise Me shall be lightly esteemed."

Chinese Women.—On one occasion, while I was living at Macao, the female relatives of the chief magistrates of that place honoured Mr. Beale with their presence. The party amounted to about fourteen, and came with a long train of female servants, all of them maids as well as mistresses borne in the capacious and elegant sedans which in China form an admirable substitute for the carriage. Apart from the train of "honourable women" were several well dressed men, who not only form the escort, but discharged little offices of attention when necessary. I well remember the act of graceful obeisance with which one presented an elegant pipe to one of the ladies that he had just lighted for her. In addition to the waiting ladies and gentlemen were the insignia of office, the shout of a noisy gang of harbingers, and the din of the farresounding gong, all which always precede the magistrate himself; in a word, there was nothing omitted to show that custom allowed the ladies a free participation in all the honorary appendages of office, while the duties thereof were of course confined to their husbands. The ladies were handed out of their chairs by the female attendants, and led up the steps by the same hands, the small size of the foot making such assistance by no means superfluous. Their attire was gorgeous in the extreme, the richest embroidery upon the most showy colours—but it formed a striking contrast to the admirable simplicity of their whole demeanour. Not a shade of affectation could be seen, nor could the eye of scrutiny detect any hint to show that they were conscious of the display they were making.—Lay's Chinese as they are

Black Drop. The following is said to be the original recipe published by Dr. Armstrong for black drop- Take of opium half a pound, good verjuice 3 pints, nutmegs, 1½ oz., saffron ½ oz. Boil to a proper thickness, then add two spoonsful of yeast: set the whole in a warm place near the fire for six or eight weeks, then in the open air, till it becomes (the consistence of) a syrup, when it is to be decanted, filtered, and bottled up, with a little sugar added to each bottle; one drop equals three of tincture of opium. Medical Times

A report has been received that St. Domingo had been the scene of a revolution. The following is extracted from a New York paper of the 23rd ult.:—"The Philadelphia Evening Journal of Tuesday, learns from Cape Hill, of the brig William Thatcher, which arrived there from St. Croix on Saturday, which place she left on the 7th inst., that just before his departure he was informed by one of the most respectable citizens of St. Croix, that letters had just been received by an arrival from St. Domingo, giving the important information that a revolution had taken place in the island—that President Boyer had been deposed, and either had been or would be, put to death. In the hurry of departure Captain Hill did not make very particular enquiries. The impression, however, is strong on his mind, that his informant said that President Boyer had been put to death, but of this he is not positive."

Russian Thieves.—Here, also, we are robbed of the gold head of our walking-stick, which might be worth £5. It was, of course, massive and solidly fixed, and must have required some trouble to get off: the "innate ingenium" was replaced in the carriage, and we did not immediately discover the loss. Singularly enough, the general had said to us the day before, "Now we have entered Russia, we must place a sentinel to guard the baggage."

Kyphonism.—A species of punishment was inflicted on the primitive martyrs called kyphonism, wherein the body of the sufferer was anointed with honey, and so exposed to the sun that the flies and wasps might be tempted to torment him. Suidas gives us the fragment of an ancient law, which punished those who contemned the laws with kyphonism for twenty days; after which they were to be precipitated from a rock, dressed in woman's clothes.

Etiquette Defeated.—George the Third went to a watering-place, on the return of sanity. One thing (says Miss Burney) happened a little unluckily. The mayor and burgesses came with an address, and requested leave to kiss hands. This was graciously accorded; but the mayor, advancing in a common way to take the Queen's hand, as he might that of any lady mayoress, Col. Gwynn, who stood by, whispered, "You must kneel, sir." He found, however, that his worship took no notice of this hint, but kissed the Queen's hand erect. As he passed him on his way back, the colonel said, "You should have knelt, sir." "Sir," answered the poor mayor, "I cannot." "Every body does, sir." "Sir, I have a wooden leg!" Poor man! 'twas such a surprise! and such an excuse as no one could dispute. But the absurdity of the matter followed; all the rest did the same; taking the same privilege by the example, without the same or any excuse.

Russian Aristocracy.—Play is the ruling passion among all classes, sexes, and ages, in Russia. High play is not more common than in other places; but all play at cards, and, generally, games of chance, but we never saw dice or roulette. That the majority of Russians have as high a sense of honour and play as fairly as their neighbours, we are convinced; but, unfortunately, notorious cases of the reverse, which have occurred, have given them a bad reputation abroad, which we believe, in the main, to be most unjust. But public opinion, again, is no check here; there are people of high rank and position who are more than suspected of cheating, and nobody avoids them, or refuses to play with them. This is also the case in other matters, to which it is not necessary to allude in distinct terms; and, strange to say, in other points, persons, who would be utterly incapable of doing them themselves, and have as strong a sense of their atrocity as can be felt in any country, never show their reprobation by avoiding the acquaintance of those who are notoriously addicted to them.

Ispahan.—The eyes of the villagers were greeted by a view of the tall minarets, the shining domes, and gilded pinnacles of Ispahan rising high in the dusty air, above the dull sea of mud-built houses, and the boundless expanse of gardens and orchards with which they are surrounded. But evening had already fallen ere the humble train of deputies, having threaded their way among numberless enclosures, jostled by large cavalcades which moved on with imposing state, or almost overrun by the gay gallants who spurred their splendidly caparisoned chargers hither and thither, covered with the dust raised caravans and trains of loaded mules, camels, and other beasts of burden, and lost among the gradually thickening crowd, which filled every avenue to this immense capital; at length entered the Der Tokches, and passing unquestioned amidst the living stream, were sucked with it into the channel of one of those seemingly interminable bazaars, that traverse the city from side to side, filled with the concentrated riches, and, as it seemed, with half the congregated multitudes of the east. It was, in fact, the hour when the mass of that dense population, which still in these days filled this enormous metropolis, having quitted the labours and occupations for the day, went forth to make their purchases for the night's meal and the morning wants, or to seek for amusements in the variety of objects abroad; and the lights which glittered in abundance from the booths and shops of the bazaars, gave to view a crowded and most motley assemblage, to which the dust and dimness of the atmosphere lent a mystery yet more imposing. The caps, turbans, helmets, scarfs, shawls, cloaks, coats, and splendid Boroumies of the rich, the noble, and the military, were there or glanced in every variety of colour, intermingled with the sober costumes of the Moollahs, or the dull grey felt of the peasantry. Charger and yaboo mingled together. The Arab, the Toorkoman, and Koordish steeds of the courtly cavaliers jostled with the mules and asses of the Cherwadars and peasantry, or shied and kicked at the long-necked camels, which, laden with the produce of many lands, came crowding in from Khorassan from Yezd, or from Kerman.—Fraser's Magazine.

A Singular Legacy. We learn from the New Hampshire Patriot, that a merchant residing somewhere in the United States, has by his will directed 30,000 dollars to be placed in the hands of three trustees, and by them safely invested. Of the interest arising from this fund, 500 dollars is "to be given annually to the person who shall compose the best essay advocating the total abolition of paper money, and the adoption of pure metallic currency;" and 300 dollars is "to be given annually to the person who shall compose the best essay advocating free trade and direct taxation, the total abolition of all impost duties and tariff laws, and the support of government by direct taxation, laid mainly on property." Upon the demise of the wife of the devisor, the estate bequeathed to her will go into this fund, and so will the respective portions of his two children, in case either or both may die before reaching twenty-one years of age. This accession to the fund would increase it to about 50,000 dollars. It is then provided that the whole amount of the bequest shall be given to the school fund of that State of the Union which shall first permanently abolish and exclude paper money, and adopt "a pure metallic currency."

Cleanliness.—A white-yellow cravat or shirt on a man, speaks at once the character of his wife; and, be you assured, that she will not take with your dress pains which she has never taken with her own. Then, the manner of putting on the dress is no bad foundation for judging: if it be carelessly, slovenly, if it do not fit properly. No matter for its mean genius: mean as it may be, it may be neatly and trimly put on; and if it be not, take care of yourself, for, as you will soon find to your cost, a sloven in one thing is a sloven in all things. The country people judge greatly from the state of the covering of the ancles; and if that be not clean and tight, they conclude that all out of sight is not what it ought to be. Look at the shoes. If they be trodden on one side, loose on the foot, or run down at heel, it is a very bad sign; and, as to slip-shod, though at coming down in the morning, and even before daylight, make up your mind to a rope, rather than live with a slip-shod wife. Oh! how much do women lose by inattention to these matters! Men, in general, say nothing about it to their wives; but they think about it; they envy their luckier neighbours; and, in numerous cases, consequences the most serious arise from this apparently trifling cause. Beauty is valuable; it is one of the ties, and a strong tie too; that, however, cannot last to an old age; but the charm of cleanliness never ends but with life itself.—Cobbett.

Lasting Wear.—A friend complaining to Warde, the actor, that his clothes did not wear well, said he must change his tailor and inquired if he could recommend him anywhere where he could meet with apparel more durable. "Yes," said Warde, "I recommend you to Chancery; there you may have a suit that will last you your life."

ANGLING.

To the Editor of the Illustrated London News.

THE PIKE.

This fish is properly called the fresh-water wolf, or shark, for certainly it is the most bold, merciless, and voracious, of all the fish in our rivers. They spawn in March, though sometimes in the last week in February, or the early part of April, according as the weather may be more or less mild. They are very rapid in their growth, and are very long-lived. Gesner writes of one that was taken at Halibran, in in Suabia, in the year 1497, with a brazen ring attached to it, with this inscription in Greek:—"I am the fish which was first of all put into this lake, by the hands of the governor of the universe, Frederick II., the 5th October, 1230." So that this fish, therefore, had lived 267 years, and was said to have weighed the enormous weight of 350 lbs. As soon as the spawning is over, they return from the heavy masses of weeds generally growing at the edges of the waters, and during the middle of the day lie on the surface, basking, in a state of torpidity, enjoying the warmth, and mostly with their faces towards the sun. It is a great peculiarity among the pike that the largest fish are most apt to indulge in basking. The blood of all fish is cold; but I consider that the blood of the pike is peculiarly so. Possibly this is occasioned by their living wholly upon animal food; for the pike does not, I believe, at any season of the year, partake of the vegetable sustenance on which most fish, at least, partially subsist. At the time he is basking, however, he will frequently take the bait, seemingly with great eagerness, but immediately relinquish it.

When the pike are thus shy, the angler must take them at the snap—that is, he must be quick in striking as soon as the bait is seized. This requires a particular kind of tackle, which the fish rarely escapes, under proper management. The snap tackle may consist of a single hook, large and stout, which being fastened to a strong gimp, is inserted at the mouth of a dead gudgeon, or other small fish, and brought out either at the middle of his side, or just before the vent. But the treble snap is by far the best, being made of three such hooks, tied fast together, and secured to a piece of gimp, which, being inserted, by means of a baiting-needle, at the vent, and carried out at the mouth, which is afterwards sewed up, and perforated with a lip hook, the three hooks being spread out in different directions, it is a thousand to one but that the pike is hooked. According to Hofland, spinning a bleak is a very favourite way of fishing for pike. The hook for this kind of tackle should be No. 8 or 9, tied on to a line of gimp about twelve inches long with a loop at the end. The lip-hook is moveable, to suit the size of the bait; and the space the other hooks occupy ought also to be suitable to the size of the fish used. One of the end double hooks must be fixed in the bait's tail, which must be slightly bent (to cause it to spin), and then fixed, by inserting the single reversed hook in the side of the bait. One of the second double hooks must then be entered in the back of the fish; then the third; and, lastly, the lip-hook, which is moveable, by hair loops, to suit the size of the bait. The hook must be passed through the lips of the bait, and a small shot placed under it to keep it steady.

Stand at the top of a stream, and let your bait drop in as near the middle as you can, pulling it gently towards you, about a yard at a time, across the stream, turning your rod up the water, within half a yard of its surface, keeping your eye on the bait; and, when the pike seizes it, he generally hooks himself. These tackles may be purchased at most of the fishing-tackle shops, as may also artificial minnows, which will answer well when the water is rather discoloured, or in sharp streams. Whatever be the length and strength of your line, you will always find it necessary to have a swivel on it somewhere, if within a yard of the hooks the better. You must be very careful how you manage him when hooked, for he will, if possible, run into the most desperate situations, and try the strength of your tackle by various stratagems. I shall not have room to finish with the pike, this week, but shall next week describe the gorge hook, live-bait fishing, and two or three other modes of fishing for pike.

GARDENING OPERATIONS FOR THE WEEK.

VEGETABLE GARDEN.

Artichokes.—Clear the stools from decayed leaves, and loosen the surface of the soil about them with the hoe.

Cauliflowers.—Earth up those that were put in the beginning of last month; plant more for coming into use in the autumn.

Celery.—The main crops should now be got out; loosen the earth about the early crops, and give it good supplies of water if there is not sufficient rain to keep the soil quite moist.

Cucumbers.—Keep the linings of the frames made up, so as to transmit a gentle warmth through the bed.

Mushrooms. Save and prepare horse-droppings for beds to produce through the autumn and winter.

FRUIT GARDEN.

Pinery.—A few of the largest suckers may be taken off those plants which fruited early, and potted, after which they should be immediately plunged into a brisk heat, and kept shaded during the middle of the day; they will not require water at the roots until they begin to grow, but they may be slightly sprinkled overhead once or twice a week, according as the weather may be fine or otherwise.

Vinery.—Continue to keep the atmosphere of the late houses very moist in fine weather.

Peach-house.—Pay every attention to the late houses in training in the young shoots, watering, and syringing the trees overhead.

FLOWER GARDEN.

Stove.—Pot and encourage the growth of all choice plants; above all things, keep them from insects.

Sow biennial flower seeds. Continue to propagate herbaceous plants, pinks, carnations, &c. Carefully tie up those plants that require it. Thin out the late-sown annuals; sow seed of the early flowering ones. Let cleanliness reign throughout this department.

SCIENCE

Verily is ours the age for invention. We have long had instruments for measuring heat, moisture, electricity, &c., the imponderable agents by which our planet is surrounded and acted on; and to this list we have now to add an instrument for measuring the quantity of light which has fallen in any given period. This instrument, to which its inventor (Mr. Baggs) gives the name of PHOTOMETER, may be seen at the Polytechnic Institution; but we have been kindly favoured by the proprietors with such particulars as will enable our less scientific readers to understand its construction. When equal volumes of chlorine and hydrogen gases are exposed to the daylight, they gradually enter into combination, and form hydro-chloric acid; and, if the mixture be confined in a glass tube about nalf an inch in diameter and three feet long, the tube being inverted in a vessel of water saturated with common salt, the rise of the liquid in the tube will indicate the precise amount of light which has fallen upon the apparatus in a given time—for the combination takes place in exact proportion to the intensity of the light, and as fast as the hydro-chloric acid is formed it is absorbed by the solution in which it is placed. The use of the salt added to the water is to prevent the absorption of the chlorine, which would otherwise take place previously to combination, and so give a fallacious indication.

A mixture of gases still more sensitive to the action of light than the one of which we have spoken is produced by equal volumes of chlorine and carbonic oxide. The combination in this case takes place with such rapidity in the sunshine, that the upward motion of the liquid may readily be perceived The result is the production of chloric-carbonic acid, or phosgene gas, which occupies exactly half the space of its original elements. An instrument constructed on this principle may be advantageously employed to determine the precise quantity of light which falls upon a given spot within a given time—say, for example, twelve hours—and would thus offer to the meteorologist a means of ascertaining with great accuracy the comparative cloudiness of the atmosphere for every day in the year. For, in the case of the tube above named, it would only be necessary to cover it to such an extent as to render its action capable of being extended through a period of twelve hours. The height of the liquid would, of course, indicate the amount of light transmitted through the photometer within the period. To render the instrument still more delicate, the tube may terminate at the top in a large glass bulb, so as to expose a greater quantity of the mixture to the solar action. It would then be applicable to many nice experiments on the destruction of light in passing through different media. In order to ensure great accuracy, it would, of course, be advisable to use the instrument always at one temperature, so that the chemical action may not be accelerated by heat more at one time than at another, and also that the indications of the instrument may not be affected by the expansion or contraction of the included gases by any change of temperature: this latter point can, doubtless, be effected in many ways. Altogether, the instrument promises to be of great utility in scientific researches.

THE BENEFIT OF CHANGE OF AIR.—It will be recollected that Dr. Collier defended an action brought against him by the Westminster School, on the ground of the alleged neglect of his son's education. That had has, however, since carried nearly all the prizes at the school in which he was placed on his removal from Westminster.

IMPROVEMENTS IN THE REGENT'S PARK.—Last week the two new suspension-bridges which cross the Regent's Canal, for the purpose of uniting Primrose Hill with the Regent's Park, were thrown open to the public. They are very neat structures, and similar to those near the mansion of Sir L. Goldsmid, but of greater elevation, so as to allow sailing barges to pass under without lowering their sails. One is situated near the Meet-water-bridge, and the other between that and the Macclesfield-bridge.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—We have been fairly supplied with wheat of home produce since our last report, while the demand, owing chiefly to the general quality of the supply being good, and to the accounts from the provinces being favourable as regards the growing crops, has been in a very depressed state, and, in order to effect sales, an abatement of from 1s to, in some few instances, 3s per quarter has been submitted to by the factors. In free foreign wheat next to nothing has been passing, and the rates may be considered quite as per quarter lower; white bonded parcels have met little or no attention. Barley and malt have sold slowly, while the secondary kinds of oats have suffered an abatement of 6d per quarter. Beans, peas, and flour may be noted also at stationary

PRESERVATION OF DOMESTIC PEACE.

The country begins to wear an alarming aspect, but we must frankly declare that this does not arise solely from the simple elements of distress. We believe there is more danger in the desperate alternatives of a blinded and headlong agitation, than in the deep, unalleviated, and afflicting misery which thousands of the poorer classes—but too unquestionably endure. It is not likely that we shall be charged with any want of sympathy with that misery. We have condoled with it sincerely—we have pictured it strongly—dwelt upon it indignantly—and invoked the best impulses of humanity and the surest wisdom of policy in its behalf. We have urged relief, general, immediate, and active, upon the wide-spread benevolence of the community, and the central legislation of the land; and we shall continue to act in this spirit of earnestly proclaimed championship of the poor.

But we confine ourselves to stating and advocating the relief of their condition—to the proclamation of their wrongs—to the upholding of their rights—and the maintaining for them a fair and legitimate position as that class to which numbers give power, in the constitution of a happily balanced and limited monarchy. We go thus far—and we know that reason, justice, and humanity proclaim it to be far enough; but we know, also, that the incarnate mischief of revolutionary restlessness is driving much, very much, beyond this legitimate goal; and that to its bad and bitter spirit is owing the wild and sudden cry of alarm and rebellion, which has been within the last few days so openly mooted in the columns of the press, at the proceedings of the public meetings, and even to the very beard of the prime minister himself. The cry has been coupled in country districts with partial outbreaks of incendiarism, some riots, and a few stoppages of mills; and it demands from the honest public writer some reflections for the rich, and some wholesome reasoning for the poor.

The strife-maker is the curse of every country. His voice ever rises with the wants or sorrows of the community, and his mischief is always loudest to provoke when conciliation should be aiding endurance, and the patience of Christianity sustaining the woes of the world. The strife-makers were never busier in England than now—and their task is the easier, as it is also the more wicked, because the people were never more severely ground down and paralysed by poverty and want. There is nothing more wholesome than fair agitation—there is a moral dignity in the higher class of political contentions—and it is a fine thing to see men conscientiously striving after the end of their own convictions—either to maintain a government which they believe to be good, or to cripple one which they fear to be either mistaken or corrupt. Their very enthusiasm, too, is cheering; and the State derives service from the freedom of their discussions and the boldness of their views. But thus far again Liberty lances her weapon, and no further. By the overbounding of her own barrier, by her loudest declaimers, she is beaten and destroyed—her oracles become dumb amid the roar of revolutionary thunder; and when demagogues make the sign of blood upon her altars, the inspiration of her high-priestess is abashed and mute.

There can be no liberty in anarchy: of this the people may be sure—nor can we hope to redress one series of wrongs by committing a thousand others. The reign of terror, which political writers and demagogues are now attempting to set up, admits and has given rise to the application of all these remarks.

The Anti-Corn-Law League, we at once proclaim, is exercising too fierce, dangerous and illegitimate a power—a power which the reason of the people should put down. We are not going to quarrel here with the principles of that active association, although we are not mad enough to attribute all the evils that now attack the poor to the pressure of corn-laws alone—nor to take repeal as the panacea for all the public grievances of the land: we repeat, we will not quarrel with their principles, and we should admire to see them working out their convictions, amid the strife of parties, by fair means; but we do quarrel heartily with their present style of agitation—we do execrate and detest the mischievous spirit which seizes upon the bitter agony of the enduring pauper, to fill his soul with a malignity that shall threaten to break forth into revolt. The goading a man with the acuteness of his own sufferings, is at once the most heartless and malicious of human alternatives of vengeance; but when it is adopted, to turn the retribution of God's visitation, or man's imprudence, back in a tide of blood and sorrow upon the community—when it is to swell the stream of human misery instead of to soften and suppress, it becomes a crime so black in dye, that its enormity palsies eloquence, and passes the bounds of language to describe. Yet it is some such dire end as this which the Anti-Corn-Law League is threatening violently to achieve. A body of its representatives—respectable deputies who profess to deplore the results they speak of with such undreading familiarity—tell Sir Robert Peel in his own house, that if the demands of their million constituents be not shortly complied with, they will not answer another hour for the peace of the country—they will not promise to control (as though they were now actually controlling) that madness of the suffering mob which is threatening rebellion on every side. Now, the mention of such a responsibility as these respectable deputies confess to having, though to not being able to maintain, implies a power quite dangerous and unconstitutional. It is not a question of corn-law, but one of revolution, which they pretend to grasp; and although they declare that they seek to keep back the waves that are bursting upon us, yet such forbearance in the leaders is by no means followed by their troops. At the daily meetings of the Anti-Corn-Law League, we are informed that speeches of treason are uttered which the press dare not report; that the outbreak of the starving million upon the strongholds of property is the prominent theme of the furious and illiterate declamation of the excited multitudes; and that the open discussion of the revolutionary topic is at once violent and unconcealed.

It is against this sad and horrible species of agitation that we have chosen to take up our pen. All poor men should shrink from it—all family men set their faces against it. It will neither beget peace nor plenty, happiness nor food. It is cruel; in a word, terribly cruel, to all classes alike.

Yet upon the strength of the tumultuous proceedings we have alluded to, the seeds of riot have been scattered in the country, and practical mischiefs have begun. We hope the initiative of such a disaster will also be the end. Let the spirit that goads and tortures it into action either retire or be quelled. Heaven knows the poor have enough to bear, without magnifying the evil into a vision of blood!

Humanity must not disregard them—legislation cannot afford to tamper with them—relief must hasten to them under man's speedy exertion and God's divine guidance—the voice of the patriot must be loud in their behalf, and religion must spread her wings to heaven for their aid; but even during the evil pressure of the hour, let endurance keep its temper and passion its control, and let us have only the complaints that move to pity, and not the despairful menace that oozes more in malice than in agony out of the blacker ulcers of the heart.

Let no associated band of agitators pollute the streams of poverty with poison too; nor, on the other hand, let the Government lose one moment in devising, expediting, and consummating some prompt and generous measure of national relief. Without the performance of this sacred duty the session should never close.

THE DUKE OF ORLEANS AT CONSTANTINE.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE. PARIS, July 15.—In circles where diplomatists do most congregate, as well as the politicians, the question of the Regency is uppermost. Very conflicting statements and opinions are afloat on this important subject. Intrigues are already actually at work, and it is anticipated that there will be a desperate party struggle.

The Thiers party is most anxious that the Regency should be placed in the sole hands of the Duchess of Orleans. The opponents of her sole Regency are numerous; first, because the Salic law excludes women from the throne of France; and, secondly, because she is a Protestant.

It has, however, long been rumoured that the Duchess of Orleans (if not already converted, through the influence of the Queen and the Princess Adelaide, the King's sister) is ready to enter the pale of the Roman Catholic Church.

A second Regency talked of is that of the Duke of Nemours, with the guardianship of the Count of Paris and the Duke de Chartres to be left in the hands of the widowed mother. But the Duke de Nemours is disliked in the army, and has few partisans. He is of a reserved, haughty temperament. It is known to be very partial to the banished branch of the Bourbons. He calls the Duke of Bordeaux his "dear cousin;" and is said to have written a letter of condolence on the accident of the latter, from the effects of which it is now supposed that he has entirely recovered.

The Molé party will support the Regency of the Duke of Nemours.

The Duke of Bordeaux's name is now universally canvassed. The Royalists look forward to his coming to the throne as a certainty, and the Liberals are heard discussing its probabilities, with an absence of the bitter feeling so long exhibited against the elder branch.

Amongst the curious reports which are hunted in one, that a marriage might be accomplished between the Duke of Bordeaux and the Princess Clementine, the youngest and only unmarried daughter of the King of the French; in the event of there being no issue, the crown to revert to the Count of Paris, now the Royal. This scheme, improbable, and even absurd as it is, is not the less discussed by some persons as practicable.

The Legitimatists assert that the Duke of Bordeaux will contract a marriage instantly, not, however, with a princess of the Czar's family, but with some German princess, however obscure, and the more obscure the better, in order to create no continental jealousies. Austria, for instance, would never have supported of a Russian marriage for the Duke of Bordeaux. These general reports and speculations will afford some notion of the gallant Duke of Orleans—"un chevalier sans peur et sans reproche."

SATURDAY, July 16.—The melancholy catastrophe of last Wednesday, and its probable results, continue to be the all-absorbing topic of conversation and speculation. Leaving, however, the imaginative sayings for the moment, it is highly necessary to look a little to the future; and, of course, the first question is, "What the new chambers (convoked for next Tuesday week, instead of August 3, as originally decreed) will do with the Regency Bill?"

Be the King's intentions what they may, prior to Wednesday's catastrophe, it is certain that the Cabinet would have fallen on the first important discussion; and this result would have happened for the following reason: M. Thiers, feeling that he had competently lost caste in the country, had resolved to hold aloof from affairs—that is, not to intrigue to get back to office, but he had made up his mind to give all his support to the Molé party, in order to oust M. Guizot from the Government. The Dufaure-Passy-Dupin party having determined, also, to act with the right or Molé party, there was, consequently, an end of the present Ministry, constituted as the chamber is as nearly as possible as the last one was.

Thus stood matters up to Wednesday morning; but "L'homme propose, Dieu dispose." A dreadful calamity occurred, and now the face of affairs has changed in the new chamber

The Duke of Orleans was the great hope of M. Thiers, the latter being the legitimate offspring of the July Revolution—its very incarnation, in fact. Not only did M. Thiers enjoy the personal confidence of the late Prince Royal, he obtained the most extraordinary ascendancy over the mind of the Duchess of Orleans, who is a bas bleu. Now that Providence has disposed, in his wisdom, of the eldest-born of the King of the French, M. Thiers sees no chance for himself but in one course, namely, the nomination of the Duchess of Orleans as sole Regent by the Legislature.

M. Thiers had an interview with the King of the French on the very day of his arrival from the Vichy waters, namely, Sunday last. His conference lasted several hours, and, contrary to the expectation of his friends, M. Thiers had declared in favour of the regency of the Duke of Nemours, and the guardianship of the Duchess of Orleans, instead of the widowed mother's sole regency. More than this: Thiers has endeavoured to ensnare M. Odilon Barrot to take the same views; but the latter, on the suggestion of the Duke, would not have been strongly expressed in the Siècle and Courrier Français, has hitherto declined to co-operate with M. Thiers on this question. This may lead to a split between M. Thiers and Odilon Barrot. Popular opinion is certainly in favour of the Regency Bill, which is backed by the bourgeoisie or epuiers of the revolution, who dislike the Duke of Nemours because he has uttered sentences against the three days, and also because he is more aristocratic than any member of his family.

It is quite true, as stated by the Presse, that the Duke of Orleans's will, which is very long, is in favour of the regency of his brother the Duke of Nemours.

The King will positively open the new parliament in person, holding the Count of Paris in his right hand. This is too much of a coup de théâtre for English taste; but his Majesty knows his countrymen, and the incident is intended to produce unbounded testimonials of loyalty from the deputies. The speech is intended to contain but the allusion to two events the death of the late prince royal and the regency question. The self-possession of the King is wonderful. On the night of his son's death he held a cabinet council and on Thursday he resumes his levees. The cabinet would wish the session to be confined to dynastic affairs; but, from the temper of parties and the intrigues in progress, it is doubtful whether ministers can succeed in preventing some discussion from springing up which may decide its duration or defeat.

TUESDAY, July 19. The capital continues in a perfectly tranquil, although still excited state. The committee of the left, or Odilon Barrot party has prepared a circular, which will see the light in a day or two congratulating the country on the success obtained in the elections, especially in the Paris colleges, and proposing that all the electoral committees shall organise and remodel the permanent corps ready for any event. These are, in point of fact, revolutionary juntas, or committees of public safety and the circular, when known to the head Conservatives, will produce a great effect. It is signed, I understand, by Odilon Barrot, Garnier Pagès, Marrast, Goudchaux de Remilly, Pierons Albatucci, Taimel, and Chamballe (editor of the Siècle).

PORTUGAL.—LISBON, Monday, July 11.—The extraordinary session of the Cortes under Don Pedro's Charter, was opened yesterday by the Queen in person, when the following speech was read by her Majesty from the throne:—"Worthy Peers of the realm, and Deputies of the Portuguese nation. The national wish, spontaneously manifested in these kingdoms, determined me, in the discharge of a most sacred duty, to declare in vigour, as the fundamental law of the state, the Constitutional Charter of the Monarchy, granted by my august father, my beloved country. It is your mission to consolidate it, and I confide in your redeeming this pledge. I continue to receive from the Sovereigns, my allies, satisfactory demonstrations of friendship and harmony, and my government does not cease to endeavour to extend our political and commercial relations. I saw with the fullest satisfaction the Interunncio of his Holiness arrive at this Court. The many virtues and lights of the chief Pontiff are a very secure pledge of concord, and of the Lusitanian church, without detriment to the privileges of the Crown, which my government will ever maintain, enjoying that peace which is needed so much for the conservation of order, and the tranquillizing of consciences. It is also with great pleasure I announce to you the arrival at this court of representatives of the Kings of Prussia and Sardinia, who have presented their credentials. Two treaties are signed, and will be presented to you immediately after they are ratified, which I have celebrated with her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain—one for the repression of the traffic in slaves, the other to strengthen our mutual relations of commerce and navigation. The estimate of the receipt and expenditure for the current economical year will be presented to you. I hope from the patriotism of the Cortes all diligence in the discharge of their functions, to fix definitively the basis of our financial system, to give new development to the important resources of my ultra-marine possessions, and perfect every branch of the administration of these kingdoms. The session is opened."

BERLIN, July 13.—Accounts from Petersburgh of the 7th state, that his Majesty the King of Prussia is in perfect health at the palace of Peterhof, where he is treated in the most cordial and affectionate manner by all the Imperial family.

SWITZERLAND.—The Borne Constitutionnel states, that on the 4th inst the inhabitants of Verrières Suisses were much astonished at seeing a troop of French Lancers entering the village. They were about to traverse the Val de Travers, when the mayor asked the French officer the motive of his violating the Swiss territory. The officer replied, that he did not consider he required permission to enter a friendly country. He immediately, however, returned to France. The government of Neufchatel were instantly apprised of this violation of their territory, but the result had not transpired.

According to the Augsburg Gazette, of the 15th inst., it would seem that the Circassians had gained an important advantage over the Russians. It states, that a division of the army of Circassia, under the command of General Grabbe, had been attacked in a forest by the Lesghians and cut to pieces. The Russian loss is estimated at 1500 men and 25 officers. The artillery, which was in the rear, was preserved from falling into the hands of the enemy.

PIACAS AT FLORENCE.—A considerable sensation has been produced in the Tuscan capital by a fracas between Mr. Delamore, an English gentleman of large property, residing with his family at Florence, and Mr. Baldwin, an American of fortune, also living lately in the same capital. Mr. Delamore and Mr. Baldwin were at one time very intimate, and were in the habit of playing together at cards and dice for small stakes. The former having been a winner, Mr. Baldwin resolved him to play for large stakes, as high as 100 louis a throw. After repeated trials, Mr. Delamore left off a winner of £6000 and upwards, for which Mr. Baldwin gave his bill at sight, with the understanding that he was to be allowed time to pay his losses. The payment in April, but in May Mr. Baldwin, in company with a Mr. Taylor, accused Mr. Delamore of playing with false cards and dice. The latter immediately sent a friend to Mr. Baldwin, and on the latter declining to meet him, posted him in the Florence Gazette, publishing at the same time a detailed account of the whole affair. Mr. Baker Dawson, a gentleman well known in the English sporting world, followed Mr. Baldwin to Pisa, and on the part of Mr. Delamore, delivered a letter declaring the American must consider himself horsewhipped, under which imaginary infliction Mr. Baldwin has remained passive. Mr. Delamore, who was by no means a player habitually, and who never played but for small stakes prior to being taunted by Mr. Baldwin, although he has been severely blamed for gambling to such an extent, has public feeling with him in Tuscany. A statement of the facts has been submitted to Lord Holland, the ambassador, Mr. Delamore having expressed his willingness to have the affair thoroughly investigated. The cards and dice are under seal at Nash's and Plowden's banking-house, but Mr. Baldwin has declined to have them opened and examined before any of his friends.

The Nuremberg Correspondent states that the town of Bezenow, in Galitza, has been totally consumed by fire. The loss is estimated at 300,000 florins.

The Frankfort Journal announces that a singular duel was fought at Cologne on the 10th inst., between a Prussian officer and a priest, in which the officer was wounded

AMERICA.—The Britannia mail steamer is arrived with New York letters to the 1st July inclusive. Trade was very dull, and likely to continue so for some time to come. Money was abundant, but confidence in public securities was losing ground, as many of the States had failed to provide the means to pay their interest due on the 1st inst. The most important piece of information is that of the rejection of the new Texian law by the veto of the President, who has authorised the Secretary of the Treasury to issue circulars to the collectors of customs, directing them to collect duties at 50 per cent. ad valorem, after June 30.

Some uneasiness has been felt at the delay in concluding the negotiations at Washington about the disputed boundary. A letter from Boston, under date of 2nd July, has been received at the North and South America Coffee-house, giving the following report on the subject:—"Major Crookes is a passenger in the Britannia, and takes important despatches from Lord Ashburton to the British Government. It is said that the dispatches relate to the situation of the boundary difficulty, and that both the above gentlemen are of opinion sunposed a few weeks since. However, I have seen a letter today from a most respectable quarter in Washington, which states that Mr. Webster and the several commissioners from this State and Maine had agreed upon the terms of Major's Bill, with the future and exclusive navigation of the St. John's River and its principal tributaries"

INDIA.—Sir Charles Napier, now commanding the Poona division of the Indian army, is to proceed to Affghanistan in October next. There is a desire to permit General Pollock to reap the harvest for which he has so well toiled; but Lord Ellenborough has determined, we understand, to place that part of our dominions a large European force, and a tried general in the rougher sort of warfare than that to which Indian generals are exposed. Little doubt seems to be entertained in India that Dost Mahommed would be replaced on the throne of Cabul; indeed, eastern history shows it, that the first step to the throne has frequently been through a prison.—Naval and Military Gazette.

In the list of the killed at the battle between the British forces and the Affghans, at Jugdallock, on the 12th of January, 1842, appears the name of Lieutenant John Byron Hobhouse, of the Queen's 13th regiment—the regiment of the gallant Sale. This young officer had been on sick leave at Cabul, but distinguished himself, as mentioned by Lady Sale in her celebrated letters, by covering an attack, with a few others, on an Affghan fort, before the English quitted Cabul. He was the eldest son of Mr. Henry William Hobhouse, and eldest nephew of Sir John Hobhouse. He is the second of the family who has, within a few years, died in the service of their country. His uncle, Captain B. Hobhouse, Sir John's next brother, of the 66th Regiment, who was actively employed under Lord Hill, on detached service in the Peninsular war, was one of the few surviving officers of the 57th Regiment in the sanguinary battle of Albuera, was killed in the battle of the 16th of June, 1815, the action immediately preceding the battle of Waterloo. He then acted as aide-de-camp to Major Gen. Sir Galbraith. The young officer who has fallen was born at Rome, in 1816. Lord Byron was present at his baptism, and was one of his godfathers.

CHINA.—By the Great Liverpool from Alexandria, we have received private letters from China, which mention the return of Sir Henry Pottinger to Hong-Kong from MACAO, and his intention to join the expedition in the north in ten days, and proceed with it to PEKIN. The general opinion at Macao and Hong-Kong was, that the Emperor would be resolved to take all reasonable ground for an armistice, and direct the most decisive measures to be adopted to bring the war to a close, by a simultaneous attack on Pekin by the land and sea forces. The Plenipotentiary's well-known firmness of purpose, and his tact in keeping the naval and military authorities in good humour, promise the most happy results; and we may soon expect to hear of the British flag being planted in PEKIN, and the Emperor of China having acceded to the reasonable terms our arms have lent sent to enforce. We have good reason for stating that two or three of the most important positions for trade will be retained, and that a large naval and military force will be permanently stationed in China for the future security of British commerce.—Naval and Military Gazette.

FATE OF FAMILY PORTRAITS.—I remember, when a boy, walking with an elderly gentleman, and passing a broker's stall, there was the portrait of a fine, florid gentleman, in regimentals; he stopped to look at it; he might have bought it for a few shillings. After we had gone away, "That," said he, "is the portrait of my wife's great uncle, member for the county, and colonel of militia; you see how he is degraded in these steps." "Why do you not rescue him, sir?" said I. "Because he left me nothing," was the reply. A relative of mine, an old lady, hit upon a happy device; the example is worth following. Her husband was the last of his race, for she had no children. She took all the family portraits out of their frames, rolled up the pictures, and put them into the coffin with the deceased. No one was more honourably accompanied to the grave, and so he slept with his fathers."—Blackwood.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—SATURDAY.

The royal assent was given, by commission, to the Queen's Protection Bill, the British Possessions Abroad Bill, the Stock-in-trade Rating Bill, the Witnesses Indemnity (Sudbury Election) Bill, the London-bridge Approaches and Royal Exchange Avenues Bill, the London and Greenwich Railway Bill, and several private bills. Some other bills were forwarded a stage, and their lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—SATURDAY.

Sir JAMES GRAHAM, in answer to Mr. Ricardo, said that reports of some disturbances which had recently occurred in the pottery districts had reached the Government, but he was happy to state that there was nothing of an alarming nature in those reports.

Sir JAMES GRAHAM also stated it was not intended, in the present session, to bring in a bill for the regulation of mills and factories.

The house went into committee on the Licensed Lunatic Asylums Bill, and afterwards on the Fisheries (Ireland) Bill. Both were ordered to be reported on Tuesday.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

A considerable number of petitions were presented for and against the Mines and Collieries Bill, and upon other subjects.

The LORD CHANCELLOR moved the second reading of several bills which he had laid upon the table some time ago; the Bankruptcy Insolvency Bill, the Bill for the Improvement of the Law relating to Lunacy, and the Bill for the establishment of local courts for the recovery of debts to the amount of £20. After hearing high testimony to the excellent effect of the alterations in the law of bankruptcy which Lord Brougham had originated, he explained that the present measure went only to increase the powers of the commission, by including within its operation the counties within fifteen miles of London. The same system would be acted upon throughout the kingdom; and for this purpose he proposed that five central points should be selected, at each of which commissioners, and none other, with the same powers as those employed, should hold jurisdiction over the districts in their neighbourhood. By the second measure—that relating to lunacy—he proposed that two commissioners should be appointed—the one to take cognizance of all cases of lunacy occurring within a circle of twenty miles—the second, of all others throughout the country. He thought that these two would be competent to transact all the necessary business, and began to fear that the establishing the system of taking out writs, and by generally diminishing the expences, which were at present enormous, great advantage to the suitor would arise, while, by another provision of the bill, due superintendence would be enforced, and proper treatment of the lunatic secured. The County Court Bill would also be no substantial innovation upon our ancient judicature. The county clerk, whose power reached only to cases of 40s., formerly presided, but the present measure would give him a jurisdiction to the extent of £5. The persons to be appointed should be men of learning and respectability; they should make six or eight circuits in the year in districts with which they had no local connexion, and should then return to London. He was not moving with the presumption, a uniformity in their decisions might be obtained. These provisions had formed a part of every bill which in the course of the last ten years had been introduced; and the measure differed only from its predecessors in reducing considerably the amount of patronage which they would have placed in the hands of the crown.—Lord COTTENHAM claimed to himself the credit of having brought forward almost every clause in the Bankruptcy and County Courts Bills. He objected both to the former and to that respecting lunacy, as imposing upon the commissioners duties which they could never properly fulfil, but gave a modified assent to that for establishing the county courts.—Lord BROUGHAM generally approved of each of the bills, but regretted that their operation was not sufficiently extended.—Lord WYNFORD supported all three of the bills; but Lord CAMPBELL, although, as he stated, sixty clauses of one bill, and seventy of another, had been taken from those introduced by Lord Cottenham, saw so much ground for objection in the omission of other parts, that he could not approve them.—Lord CHANCELLOR briefly replied, and the three bills were then read a second time.

The Court of Law Fee Fund Bill went through a committee, and was ordered to be reported.

On the motion of the Duke of WELLINGTON, the Railways Bill was read a third time and passed.

Their lordships then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

On the motion of Mr. Leader, leave was given to Mr. Roebuck to appear at the bar of the House of Lords as counsel, in support of the Sudbury Disfranchisement Bill.

Sir R. PEEL stated, in reply to a question from Mr. Hawes, that he should pursue the same course with respect to the motion of his hon friend, the member for Oxford, in favour of Church Extension as he had taken last year, when out of office. Notice of this motion had been given now, as it was then, without consultation. He should vote for the committee to consider of the expediency of increasing her Majesty's income, reserved to himself the right of forming his own opinion as to the form of the address to be presented. If his hon. friend persevered in bringing forward the motion, the subject should have his full consideration. He should not then be disposed to admit that he should be able this session, either to bring forward any measure, or to support any grant of public money.—Sir M. INGLIS said, that after what had fallen from his right hon. friend, it ought to be thought he should best consult the great interest he advocated, if he consented to leave the matter as it stood in the hands of her Majesty's Government.

In reply to Mr. Labouchere, Sir R. PEEL stated, he believed that the Bribery Bill (Lord John Russell's) was in the hands of the Solicitor-General, who, no doubt, would fix a day for the discussion.

The order of the day having been read for going into committee of supply, Mr. BARIL rose to make some animadversion on the policy of the Government in Ireland. That policy, he said, was still tainted with the old spirit of Toryism. Ireland, which the Government now since acknowledged to be his chief difficulty, would always remain so to every minister who should be obliged to govern against the opinion of the majority of the Irish representatives. He referred to the condition of Ireland, which the present Government had been ushered into office, and from which he had inferred that it was about to act independently of the Tory party in Ireland But, he lamented to say, that the days of exclusion were still continued. No valid reason had been assigned for such a high situation. Although Sergeant Greene had been continued in the counsel-ship to the CRATE in the Government of Sir R. Peel in 1835, yet the like forbearance had not been practised in the case of Mr. M'Loughlan, a Roman Catholic, who held the same office on the late change. Liberal professions were made on Lord De Grey's accession, of the Government's resolve to administer justice impartially; the Judge appointed to succeed Mr. Justice Johnson was Mr. Lefroy, an able lawyer, indeed, and a high-minded gentleman, well fitted to have decided Irish appeals in the House of Lords, but too warm a partisan in Irish politics to be fully entrusted with Irish arcanuia. Mr. Shiel then entered into some details respecting particular trials, in order to show that juries still continue to be unfairly composed, and that the Attorney-General opposes undue impediments to challenges. He concluded with a complaint respecting the indulgence shown to Mr. St. George, who had been formerly removed from the magistracy for an indecorous letter to Lord Normanby, while holding the office of representative of the Sovereign of Ireland. Applications had been made to the present Government to restore him. The Irish Chancellor had refused to do so, unless upon condition of an apology or explanation. Mr. St. George had peremptorily refused; and, at last, without any apology or explanation at all, he had been restored. Mr. Shiel's motion was for the correspondence connected with Mr. St. George's case.—Lord ELIOT vindicated, in a very able speech, the conduct of the Irish Government, in reference, not only to the case of Mr. St. George, but of its appointments and exercise of patronage generally.—Sir W. SOMERVILLE censured the conduct of Government in respect to Mr. Justice Johnson's appointment, and supported the motion.—The SOLICITOR-GENERAL for Ireland defended the Government in reply to the preceding speaker.—Mr M. J. O'CONNELL supported the motion.—Lord JOCELYN replied, and Mr. SHEIL commented upon the production of the papers which had been moved for due to the character of the Irish Government.—After a few words from Mr. Gregory and from Lord Eliot in explanation, Sir R. PEEL rid-iculed the commencement of the motion of Mr. Shiel, and continued with the grave charges against the Government of Ireland which had been advanced during the debate, and proceeded to show that those charges were wholly unfounded.—After a few words from Colonel VERNEY, the house divided.

Some votes were then taken in committee of supply on the militia estimates.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER obtained leave to bring in a bill for the further regulating the promulgation and issue of Exchequer bills. The right hon. gentleman stated that the bill was founded on the recommendation of the committee which sat in the beginning of the session on this subject. The right hon. gentleman also stated that the report of the committee on the Exchequer Bills Fraud would be presented to the house in the course of next week.

The house then adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The Charitable Pawn Offices (Ireland) Bill was read a third time and passed.

Lord COTTENHAM gave notice that early next session he would lay upon the table of the house a bill for the abolition of imprisonment for debt, and to provide for the granting in cessio bonorum without previous imprisonment.

The Earl of GALLOWAY presented petitions from colliers in Yorkshire in favour of the Mines and Collieries Bill.

The Duke of HAMILTON, and several other peers, presented petitions from male and female miners in Stirlingshire against the bill.

On the motion of Lord WHARNCLIFFE, in the absence of the President of the Board of Control from indisposition, the house, after some discussion, resolved itself into committee on the Drainage (Ireland) Bill.—A division took place on the clause, enabling the Board of Works to appoint additional paid commissioners, which was opposed by the Marquis of CLANRICARDE.

The other clauses were agreed to, with the exception of clause 47, which was omitted.

The house then resumed.

Other bills were forwarded in their several stages, and their lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

Captain Fitzmaurice took the oaths and his seat for Buckinghamshire.

Coward's Divorce Bill and the Mersey Conservancy Bill were read a third time and passed.

Lord STANLEY declined to answer a question put to him by Sir R. INGLIS, as to the determination of Government to insist, in the pending negotiations with America, upon the principle that the moment a slave touched the soil of Britain he became free. To another question put by the hon member, his lordsh p replied that the surrender of criminals who had escaped from the United States into Canada was regulated by treaty.

Sir J. GRAHAM, previous to moving the order of the day for the committee on the Poor-law Bill, stated that it was not the intention of Government to urge the enactment of more than the first five clauses.—Mr. FIELDEN objected to the proposed course, by which the objectionable clauses would become law, while the mitigating clauses were omitted.—Mr. S. CRAWFORD moved that it be an instruction to the committee, that power should be given to the commissioners in order relief to be administered to the poor in Ireland on the terms of the out-door relief test.—The house divided :—

For the instruction	11
Against it	112
Majority	—101

Mr. FIELDEN moved a string of resolutions referring to certain declarations of Lord Althorp (now Earl Spencer) as to the consequences to be expected from the Poor-law Bill, and declaring the expediency of an inquiry as to the fulfilment of these predictions before the bill should be put the house be permitted to proceed further.—After some discussion the house divided —

Majority	— 117

The house then resolved itself into committee. On clause 2 being put, Mr T DUNCOMBE proposed to add a proviso that parties appearing before the assistant commissioners should be heard by counsel or agents.—A desultory discussion ensued, in the course of which Sir J. GRAHAM and Sir R. PEEL opposed the amendment.—The committee divided upon the clause :—

For the clause	59
Against it	9
Majority	— 50

Clauses 3 and 4 were agreed to. Clause 5 was postponed. The clauses from 6 to 22, inclusive, were, on the motion of Sir J. GRAHAM, negatived without a division. On clause 23 being put, Mr. R. YORKE suggested an alteration, modifying the power of the commissioners respecting the punishment of the paupers for misdemeanours committed in the union.—After discussion, the house divided —

For the clause	84
Against it	8
Majority	— 76

The remaining clauses of the bill were severally disposed of in conformity with the plan announced by Sir J. Graham.—Mr. DARBY moved the addition of a clause to the following effect :—" That from and after the passing of this act the commissioners shall not interfere with loans sums unless two-thirds at least of the guardians consent thereto." After discussion the committee divided—

For Mr. Darby's clause	42
Against it	91
Majority	— 49

The house resumed, the Chairman reported progress, and the report was ordered to be read next day

On the motion of Lord STANLEY, the house went into committee on the South Australian Bill. After a few words from Mr Hume, Lord Stanley, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Mr. B Wood, Mr. Hume expressed his strong disapprobation of the manner in which the colony had been governed from the time of Lord Glenelg downwards, and moved that the clause relieving it from its liability be omitted. Lord STANLEY opposed the motion. The committee divided, and the numbers were—

For the amendment	10
Against it	73
Majority in favour of the clause	— 63

On the motion of Lord STANLEY, a clause was added providing against the colony being made a penal colony The house then resumed.

On the motion of the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, leave was given to bring in a bi.l to transfer the stamp duty on game certificates in Ireland to the excise.

The house then adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—WEDNESDAY

The house did not sit

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY

On the motion of Mr. GLADSTONE, the Lords' amendments to the Railway Bill were read and agreed to.

Lord G. SOMERSET brought up the report of the General Committee of Elections, naming the members to serve on the select committees to try the merits of the petitions against the returns from Newcastle-under-Lyne and Ipswich. Both committees were called to the table and sworn.

Mr ROEBUCK gave notice that, on Thursday week, he should bring under the consideration of the house a series of resolutions, in consequence of the report now laid on the table of the house by the election proceedings committee.

In reply to three questions from Lord ASHLEY, on the state of our relations with the United States, Sir R. PEEL said, with respect to the boundary question nothing has yet been definitely settled, nor are the papers relating to it prepared to be laid before the house. The delay, I believe, has chiefly arisen from the necessity of some barometrical observations being completed. The negotiations on the subject of a convention for the surrender of convicts are still going on, and on this part of the question I cannot, therefore, say more at present. With regard to the slave trade convention, the papers, letter A, have, I think, been already laid on the table, and those of letter B will be ready, I doubt not, in a few days.

In reply to a question from Mr. D. BARCLAY, Sir J. GRAHAM said he must postpone the introduction of a measure on the subject of medical charters until the commencement of the next session.

Mr. GLADSTONE moved the second reading of the Bonded Corn Bill (No 2) He regretted that he had formerly opposed a similar bill, but a full investigation of the subject convinced him that, without injuring the agricultural interest, the measure would be beneficial to the trade of the country. He intended to introduce some amendments in committee.—Colonel RICHARDSON opposed the bill, as injurious to the agricultural interest, and moved, as an amendment, that it be read a second time that day three months. After some discussion the house divided—

For the amendment	77
Against it	125
Majority for the second reading	— 48

On the suggestion of Sir J. Graham, Mr. TUFNELL consented to the postponement of the Buildings Regulation Bill until the next session, and the order of the day for the committee on the bill was ordered to be read that day three months

Sir J. GRAHAM moved the bringing up of the report of the Poor law Amendment Bill.—Mr. ESCOTT rose to move the addition of the following clause :— "That it shall be lawful for all boards of guardians of the poor in England and Wales to grant such relief as in their judgment shall be necessary, to poor persons at their own houses, any rule, order, or regulation of the Poor law Commissioners notwithstanding." The hon. member supported his motion in a speech of considerable ability.—Sir J. GRAHAM, in opposition to the motion, entered into a general defence of the bill, and showed by official returns, that the order of the commissioners discouraging out-door relief was not harshly enforced.—A discussion ensued, involving the general character of the measure before the house. On the division the numbers were—

For the clause	55
Against it	161
Majority against the clause	— 106

Several verbal amendments were then made in the clauses of the bill, on the motion of Sir J. GRAHAM, after which the report was agreed to, and the bill ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time on Friday.

The house then resolved itself into a committee of supply, and Sir GEORGE CLERK proceeded with the Irish estimates. On the estimate for the Roman Catholic College of Maynooth, £9000, Mr. PLUMPTRE objected; but from the low tone in which he spoke, it was difficult to collect the tenor of his arguments. Lord CLEMENT HILL commanded why gentlemen did not attend to the Protestant population in Ireland, instead of trying to persecute the Roman Catholics! Mr BATE spoke thought a state ought not to maintain an establishment which fostered prejudice hostile to its constitution. The object for which Maynooth was constituted had wholly failed; and the priests educated there had become leading agitators.—Mr. HAWES advocated the grant.—Mr COCHRANE maintained the fitness of encouraging it. If the college ought to receive a grant at all, it ought to receive a much larger one.—Mr. MILNES saw no such present danger to the American Church as ought to withhold him from voting for the grant. As to the books complained of, no man need forget who he was said, that to the pure all things are pure. He could not go the length of refusing all provision for the religious education of the Irish people. The Irish priesthood would not be less dangerous if they were educated in any of the continental states.—Colonel VERNER thought the house would not be justified in passing this grant until inquiry had been made into the grave charges adduced against the institution. He gave some historical details respecting the foundation of the college, and questioned the correctness of Lord Eliot's statement, made on a former evening, that the priests had always been instrumental towards preventing disturbance. Ireland—I rejoiced to hear it—supported the grant.—Lord ELIOT explained and defended the statement he had previously made. He was in some degree pledged to it now that he was returned out by how to accept. Mr O'CONNELL said that if the priests were to be excluded from the grant, how would they be prepared for the discharge of their duties? Christians should not be made to pay for the religious instruction of others. Besides, the grant was partly in aid only, and was annually carried to the Protestant account. The Roman Catholic religion After a few words from Mr A CAMPBELL, the committee divided, and agreed to the grant by a majority of 76 to 18.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

The Lunacy Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Duke of SUTHERLAND presented a petition from Huddersfield against the employment of females and young children in mines.

Several bills were forwarded a stage, and their lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY

Sir ROBERT PEEL explained to Mr. Hutt, that he could not, while negotiations were pending, give him (Mr. H.) any information respecting the Stable Duties; but he trusted that the house would not misconstrue his silence

Mr. HUME obtained leave for copies of some papers respecting the late Raja of Sattara

Captain PECHELL called the attention of the house to the case of Mrs. Forbes, whose husband, a lieutenant of the navy, is in the Lunatic Asylum at Haslar Hospital.

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE then brought forward the motion of which he had given notice, to address the Queen on the subject of the prevalent distress.—Mr. D ISRAELI opposed the motion.—Mr. EWART, in a long argumentative speech, supported the motion.—Sir J. GRAHAM opposed the motion.—Mr. MARK PHILLIPS, Mr. HAWES, and Mr. TPORNELY, severally supported the motion. It was in vain, perseverance was the prerogative of the Crown.—Lord PALMERSTON supported the motion, and took an opportunity of observing, that with regard to foreign relations, the present government had only followed out the negotiations commenced and conducted by the late government, whose policy he defended.—Mr. HUME moved the adjournment of the debate, which was seconded by Mr. MILNER GIBSON.—Mr. CORDEN supported the question of adjournment.—Mr. STANSFIELD supported the motion.—Mr. HUME withdrew the motion for adjournment, and Mr. DUNCOMBE replied.—Strangers were then ordered to withdraw, when there appeared—

For the motion	91
Against it	147
Majority	—56

Mr. GREENE brought up the report of the committee of supply, and the resolutions, which were agreed to.

The Grand Jury Presentment (Ireland) Bill went through committee, and was ordered to be reported to-morrow (Friday).

The other orders of the day were then disposed of, and the house adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

Their lordships met at 5 o'clock, the Earl of Shaftesbury on the woolsack, in the place of the Lord Chancellor.

The Marquis of CLANRICARDE postponed to Monday the second reading of the Sudbury Disfranchisement Bill.

Lord SKELMERSDALE gave notice that on the next stage of the Mines and Collieries Bill, he should move that women of mature age, who had been constructed to work in mines and coll'eries, should be allowed to continue in that employment if they chose.—Lord WHARNCLIFFE presented a petition against the bill.

Some conversation took place between Lords RADNOR and WHARNCLIFFE on the Corn-laws and the Tariff, which Lord Wharncliffe had wound, if allowed a fair trial, do much good.

The County Courts Bill and the Bankruptcy Law Amendment Bill went through committee

Several bills were advanced a stage.—Adjourned to Saturday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY

Lord ASHLEY reported to the house the decision of the Newcastle Election Committee :—" That J. G. Harris, Esq., was not duly elected at the last election for Newcastle under-Lyme, and ought not to have been returned; and that J. C. Colquhoun, Esq., was duly elected and ought to have been returned."

Mr. S. CRAWFORD gave notice that he should, on Thursday next, move, in pursuance of a petition which he had presented from a number of electors, that a new writ do forthwith issue for Nottingham

Sir R. PEEL, in reply to questions, said he hoped that the bribery bill would be passed during the present session.

Mr. C. BULLER called attention to the difference of punishment in the Exchequer-bills Preparation Bill; and the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER promised to consider the point.

The house then proceeded with the third reading of the Poor law Amendment Bill, which was strongly opposed by Mr. Fielden, Mr. S. Crawford, and other members.—After the divisions, the bill passed.

On the house going into a committee of supply, Mr. M. GIBSON moved as an amendment that the house resolve itself into a committee of the whole house to consider the distress of the country, with a view to provide a remedy.—Dr. Bowring, Sir John Easthope, Mr. Hume, Mr. Fielden, Mr. Villiers, Mr. Muntz, and Mr. M. Philips supported the motion.—The house was about to divide on the main question, when Mr. CORDEN moved the adjournment of the debate.—The house divided—

For the motion	33
Against it	188
Majority	—155

Sir R. PEEL vindicated ministers from the charge of treating the subject with contempt, and denounced the unfair conduct of the opposition —The discussion proceeded for some time in a desultory manner, when the house divided on Mr Gibson's amendment.

For going into supply	156
For the amendment	64
Majority	—92

The house then went into committee of supply pro forma Adjourned.

THE CHURCH.

The following appointments have taken place :—The Rev. John Gale Dalton Thring, LL.B., of St. John's College, to be Assistant Rural Dean for the district of Cary, within the diocese of Bath and Wells. The Rev Richard Hagarth, M.A., Fellow of Clare Hall, to the Rectory of Fornham All Saints, with Westley, in the county of Suffolk. The Rev. James Gorle, M.A., of Clare Hall, Curate of Shelden, Warwickshire. The Rev. J. Bellers, Rectory of Whatcote. The Rev. Mark Garfit, M.A., of Trinity College, to the Rectory of Stretton, in the county of Rutland. The Rev. William Ramsden Smith, M.A., of Queen's College, Curate of Trinity Church, St. Giles-in-the-Fields, London, to the Rectory of Hulcot, Bucks. The Rev. Beaumont Dixie, M.A., of Emmanual College, to the Rectory of Market Bosworth, Leicestershire. The Rev. Weeden Butler, M.A., of Trinity College, Curate of Creaton, Northamptonshire, to the Vicarage of the Wickham Market. The Rev. R. W. Evans, B.D., one of the Senior Fellows of Trinity College, to the Vicarage of Barnwell. The Rev. James Kendall, M.A., of St. John's College, to the Vicarage of Laurence by Fowey. The Rev. Henry Robert Lloyd, M.A., of Trinity College, late assistant master of the Charter-house, West Grimstead and Plaitford, Wilts, and now Perpetual Curate of Talvaris, in the county of Carmarthen, to the Vicarage of Carew, in the county of Pembroke. The Rev. W. T. Hart, M.A., of Trinity College, to the Vicarage of Sutton-cum-Sound, Notts. The Rev. Thomas Moore, M.A., of St. Peter's College, to the Vicarage of West Harptree, in the county of Somerset. The Rev. Joseph Grisdale, B.A., of Emmanuel College, to the Perpetual Curacy of Burton Hastings, in the county of Warwick. The Rev. William Fisson, M.A., of St. John's College, to the Perpetual Curacy of New Buckenham, in the county of Norfolk.

THE UNIVERSITIES.

The Rev. W. S. Richards, late of Jesus College, has been presented to the rectory of Terwick, in the county of Sussex. The Rev. T. L. Claughton, Vicar of Kidderminster, has presented the Rev. John Downhall, late of Magdalen Hall, to the perpetual curacy of St. George, Kidderminster. The Rev. Robert Powell, of Worcester College, has been presented to the perpetual curacy of St. Peter's, Blackburn, Lancashire. The Lord Chancellor has presented the Rev. E. W. Hughes to the rectory of Welton-le-Wold, Lincolnshire. Sir G. Heathcote, Bart., has presented the Rev. M. Garfit to the Rectory of Stretton, Rutlandshire.

CAMBRIDGE, July 16.—At a recent meeting held at the Vice-Chancellor's, a number of members of the University were chosen commissioners under the Income-tax Act. Lieutenant-Colonel Wreck Shortland, R N., of Pembroke College, has been elected a foundation fellow of that society. Charles Sangster, B.A., Scholar of St. John's College, has been appointed head master of the Rochester and Chatham Classical and Mathematical Institution.

BUST OF THE CHANCELLOR.—A model bust of his grace, by Gough, has been executed here that bespeaks leading artists.—Mr. HAWES advocated the grant.—Mr COCHRANE maintained the fitness of encouraging it. If the college ought to receive a grant at all, it ought to receive a much larger one.—Mr. MILNES saw no such present danger to the American Church as ought to withhold him from voting for the grant. As to the books complained of, no man need forget who he was said, that to the pure all things are pure. He could not go the length of refusing all provision for the religious education of the Irish people. The Irish priesthood would not be less dangerous if they were educated in any of the continental states.—Colonel VERNER thought the house would not be justified in passing this grant until inquiry had been made into the grave charges adduced against the institution. He gave some historical details respecting the foundation of the college, and questioned the correctness of Lord Eliot's statement, made on a former evening, that the priests had always been instrumental towards preventing disturbance. Ireland—I rejoiced to hear it—supported the grant.—Lord ELIOT explained and defended the statement he had previously made. He was in some degree pledged to it now that he was returned out by how to accept. Mr O'CONNELL said that if the priests were to be excluded from the grant, how would they be prepared for the discharge of their duties? Christians should not be made to pay for the religious instruction of others. Besides, the grant was partly in aid only, and was annually carried to the Protestant account. The Roman Catholic religion After a few words from Mr A CAMPBELL, the committee divided, and agreed to the grant by a majority of 76 to 18.

MODEL OF THE TAGE MUHAL, AT AGRA.—A magnificent ivory model of this Indian temple has been presented to the University by Mr. Richard Burney, M.A., of Christ's College, and has been placed in the Pit Press The value of the model is stated to be about £7000. On the 10th of October a grace will be offered to the senate to affix the seal to a letter of thanks to Mr. Burney, for his valuable present. A similar grace will be offered on the same day, to affix the seal to a letter of thanks to Messrs. Rundell, Bridge and Co., of London, for a bronze cast of the shield of Achilles, by Flaxman, lately presented by them to the University.

MAGDALEN COLLEGE, OXFORD.—The election of Fellows at Magdalen College, Oxford, has been erroneously announced for (this day) Saturday, the 23rd instant. It will not take place until Wednesday, the 27th, and the vacancies for demyships will be filled up on the previous evening. The examination for demyships commences on Saturday, the 23rd, and that for Fellows on Monday, the 25th.

ADVICE TO CONGREGATIONS.—Listen to the instructions delivered from the pulpit with the humility of disciples, and not with the pride of critics. Whatever be the abilities of the preacher he is invested with a commission from God to teach you your duties: and unless you execute his commission well or ill, you are not his judges. If you bring with you to the house that submission, docility, and gratitude, stances, the grace of heaven may in your regard supply the defects of the preacher, but all the eloquence in the world will be exerted in vain on the proud, self-sufficient censorious hearer. When there is nothing in the manner of the preacher to praise, refrain at least, from condemning; and when you think that approbation is due, show it in the amendment of your lives, rather than in empty panegyric. The former alone should be the object of the preacher; if he court the latter, he is undeserving of it.

KÖRNER'S PRAYER DURING THE BATTLE.

(Translated from the German.)

Oh, Father, Lord! on thee I call;
Artillery fires about me fall;
The lightning fork'd around me moves;
Oh, God of War! on thee I call,
To guide me, one who well you loves!
Oh, Father, Lord! do thou me lead
To die, or gain the victory's meed;
Oh, Lord! thy sway I have confest,
God! as thou wilt—for thee I tread:
Lord! I acknowledge thy behest.
Thou, Father high! I know thy power!
As in Autumn's murmuring hour,
So 'mid battle's thund'ring clangs;
Well-spring of grace, immortal tower!
Bless me, oh, God! and calm my pangs.
Bless me, divine, all-powerful Lord!
My life hangs on thy blessed word;
Thou canst it take, thou hast it given:
May I praise thee, omniscient Lord!
In life, in death, or e'en in heav'n!
Thy praises, God! I will declare;
We fight not for the riches here;
Our sword the Holy One does guard:
In death or victory thou't my care
So I resign me to the Lord.
Oh, God! I give myself to thee,
When death's around and misery;
And when my veins exposed flow,
Then have compassion, God! on me:—
Father, Lord! to thee I'll go!

REMARKABLE INSTANCE OF ABSENCE OF MIND.

Miss Angelina Spiffleberry, an old lady who keeps the Fox Indian Tomahawk, a sporting temperance hotel, at Big-bone-lick, near Brandywine Springs, State of Virginia, besides having a cork leg has one of the most powerful squinting or screw eyes in this or any other country. With this screw eye she can take off her cork leg, with a single glance, and screw the cork out of any bottle to which she takes a fancy. One day, being seized with absence of mind, she mistook a Monongahela whisky-bottle for a stomachic cordial, and unscrewed the cork with her eye as usual; but instead of putting the right cork back again, she jammed the toe of her cork leg quite tight into the bottle, and did not discover her mistake until the spirit had made her leg so intoxicated that she could not stand.—Ainsworth's Magazine.

READING ALOUD.

One of the accomplishments which we wish to see cultivated among females, and which is greatly neglected or wholly overlooked, is the art of reading aloud. It is a most healthy employment when used discreetly, since exercise is as advantageous to the lungs as to all other parts of the human frame. The ability to read aloud agreeably is also a truly domestic acquirement; it will be another link in the chain which binds men to their hearths; it will amuse the young, cheer the old, and instruct the ignorant.—Journal of Education.

SWEETNESS OF TEMPER.

The first and most important quality is sweetness of temper. Heaven did not give to the female sex insinuation and persuasion, in order to be surly; it did not make them weak, in order to be imperious; it did not give them a sweet voice, in order to be employed in scolding nor did it provide them with delicate features, in order to be disfigured.

EXPERIENCE TEACHES.

"No man," says Bacon, "can be so thoroughly convinced by argument that fire will burn, as by thrusting his hand into the flames."

ADVANTAGES OF EARLY RISING.

The habit of early rising is one which conduces much to health, and ought to be encouraged by all proper means, among the denizens of schools, and the young generally. It tends to produce that cheerful, buoyant state of mind so essential to the full enjoyment of every blessing, and so beneficial an influence over the bodily condition, that whatever is calculated to promote it deserves to be practised and enforced. It is valuable also, inasmuch as it necessarily prevents the contrary habit of sitting up late; one which is too frequently contracted at this period of life by the ardent-minded student.—Curtis on Health.

CHART OF HEALTH.

Love.—A complaint of the heart, growing out of an inordinate longing after something difficult to obtain. It attacks persons of both sexes, generally between the ages of fifteen and thirty; some have been known to have it at sixty. Symptoms :—Absence of mind; giving things wrong names; calling tears nectar, and sighs zephyrs; a fondness of poetry and music; gazing on the moon and stars; a loss of appetite; neglect of business; loathing for all things save one; bloodshot eyes; and a constant desire to sigh. Effect :—A strong heartburn; pulse high; stupidly eloquent eyes; sleepiness and all that sort of thing. At times, imagination bright—bowers of roses, winged cupids, and buttered peas; and then again, oceans of despair, rack, torments, and pistols. Cure :—Get married.

THE MIDDLE CLASSES.

It in the middle classes of Society that all the finest feelings, and the most amiable propensities of our nature, do principally flourish and abound. For the good opinion of our fellow-men is the strongest, though not the purest motive to virtue. The privations of poverty render us too cold and callous, and the privileges of property too arrogant and consequential, to feel; the first places us beneath the influence of opinion, and the second above it.

BATHING.

For youth of both sexes, cold bathing in summer, and tepid in winter, is highly useful, and ought to be frequently indulged in; but great care is to be observed that bathing in rivers be not commenced too early in summer, before the water has acquired a proper degree of temperature; and, at all times, that there be not too great a difference between the temperature of the body and that of the water. Exposure to great and sudden varieties of temperature is always dangerous.—Curtis on Health.

LINES,

Written upon seeing one of Mrs. Beard's Photographic Portraits of a very Beautiful Girl.

The smile is on her lip,
And the brightness in her eye
Her bosom seems to swell
With a soft and gentle sigh;
Like some blissful vision,
She is shadow'd forth a grace,
While the heart's affection
Seems to lighten o'er her face.

Must the dark world change thee,
All beauteous as thou'rt now?
Must time paint his wrinkles
On that fair and placid brow?
Yet my spirit whispers,
From amid life's fading scene,
Some fond heart will cherish
What thy beauty once has been!

HOW TO DIE.

So live, that when thy summons comes to join
The innumerable caravan, that moves
To the pale realms of shade, where each shall take
His chamber in the silent halls of Death,
Thou go not, like the quarry slave at night,
Scourged to his dungeon; but, sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave,
Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.

VIEW OF NOTTINGHAM.

NOTTINGHAM.

Few of the towns of England can boast of a higher antiquity than the town of Nottingham; it still retains many vestiges that attest its right to be called one of the "olden time." The remarkable excavations in the rock on which it stands, are supposed to speak of the aboriginal inhabitants of England, who had a settlement on its site; its name has also been traced to these works, the old Saxon word "Snoddenzaham," having, by time and careless tongues, been corrupted into Nottingham. There is abundant proof that it was a town of some importance during the sway of the Romans, in the remains of their roads, and a pottery discovered within the walls. It was, at a later period, an object of struggle between the Danes and Saxons, being held by the former against Burthred, Ethelred, and Elfred, the Murcian and West Saxon Kings. It was fortified by Edward the Elder, but few remains of the works exist. In the monkish period of its history, it contained three religious houses and three parish churches; the chief holders of its ecclesiastical endowments were the White and Grey Friars, by whom, in addition to the studies of the age, the science of architecture was studied, and forwarded in that progress towards perfection, which attained its full glory in a York Cathedral and Westminster Abbey. Nor must we forget, in a notice of Nottingham, the very conspicuous part it plays in the history of Robin Hood. "Nottinghame towne" occurs over and over again in the ballads that record the deeds of the forest-ranging freebooter, and the "Sheriffe of Nottinghame" was, next to the "Bishop," the person he most delighted to circumvent, braving the law, in the person of its officer, with consummate coolness and bravery. The office of Sheriff of Nottingham could have been no sinecure in the days of the "stout Earl of Huntingdon." In the troubled times of the civil wars, Nottingham bore its full share of the conflict. It was here that Charles I. raised his standard in defiance of his people, in the struggle that terminated in his own destruction. The church of the town was demolished during this war, being destroyed by artillery from the castle. The old castle itself was an important place, from its size and position, and its many historical associations. It stands on the top of a precipitous rock, which rises to the height of 133

ST. MARY'S CHURCH.

feet above the level of the adjacent meadows, and is a continuation of the rock on which the town stands. When William the Conqueror gave it to his son Peverell, it was so reduced that only 156 inhabitants are recorded as dwelling there. Stephen pillaged and burnt it. Richard I. besieged and took his brother John here a few years after. Here the guilty Mortimer was found, with his paramour Isabella, by Edward III., and met the fate due to his crimes. In the castle dungeons David, King of Scotland, and Owen Glendower languished many years. In after ages many ferocious battles were fought here between the cavaliers and the Parliamentary forces, the former fighting from the top of St. Nicholas's church, and the latter from the castle. The present castle is a modern mansion, belonging to the Duke of Newcastle, and, it may be remembered, was attacked by an infuriated mob in the time of the Reform crisis, and nearly destroyed by fire. Within the more modern period of its history, Nottingham has had five new churches erected within its walls, one of which is the church of St. Mary, an engraving of which we have taken as an illustration. It is a fabric of more than ordinary beauty, and has lately been restored and improved under the superintending taste of Archdeacon Wilkins. The town itself has increased in size, as it increased in commercial importance, till the once green fields of Lenton and Radford have become busy streets of trade and traffic. We must not omit to add that it is distinguished for its spacious market-place, and remarkable for the excellence of its ale. It is one of the principal seats of the lace and hosiery trade; of the latter branch a great quantity of the finer sorts of silk and cotton are manufactured here. It returns two members to Parliament, but one of the seats is at present vacant, the borough being one of those places that have fallen under the cognizance of Mr. Roebuck's committee, and the issue of the writ is suspended till the report of that mysterious tribunal shall be made known. The late elections for this borough have attracted more attention than those of any other town of England, it having been represented by Mr. Walters, of the Times, who will probably again stand for it, opposed by Joseph Sturge. The population, at the late census, was 52,000, not including the suburbs, which make it about 70,000.

CRICKET MATCH AT LORD'S GROUNDS.

CRICKET MATCH.

On Monday an interesting match took place at Lord's Grounds, wherein the relative merits of the fast and slow systems of bowling were tried by eight gentlemen and players with three bowlers on the new system, and the same number with three slow bowlers. The same event has been contested on four previous occasions, and the match excited considerable interest. The fast bowlers were Alfred Mynn, Esq., —— Redgate, and —— Dean, with E. Bayley, William Felix, R. W Keate, and F. Thackeray, Esqrs., Box, Butler, Dorrington. and Guy, against Lillywhite, Hillier, and Nixon, with the Hon. R. Grimston, R. Kynaston, and —— Anson, Esqrs., with G. Lee, Hammond, Pilch, and Wenman, on the old systems. The first innings only was completed on each side, when the wickets were struck—the result being in favour of the fast bowlers by 115 runs to 89. Of the players on the swift bowling side, Box secured 35 runs, and W. Felix, Esq., 23; while the Hon. R. Grimston scored 41 runs, and carried his bat out, at the conclusion of the innings of the opposing party. The match was concluded on Tuesday, the fast bowlers coming off victorious by a majority of 47 runs on the two innings. The number scored by the players on the new, or over-hand system, was 194, while their opponents scored only 147.

As a proof of the rapidity with which intelligence is conveyed from one part of the world to another, it may be mentioned that the news of the melancholy death of the Duke of Orleans was published nearly as early in London as in Paris —the sad occurrence appearing simultaneously in the Thursday's papers of both capitals.

Innate Propensity.—The last time the honourable member for Wareham was out with his hounds in the neighbourhood of Bere-Regis, a boy, about eight or nine years of age, was keeping sheep for a gentleman. On the hounds passing in full cry, the young shepherd forsook his flock, and followed the pack, so that he did not reach his home till dark. On the gentleman reproving him, he merely observed, "Lord, master! I wish I was a foxhound."

Admiral Sir Charles Malcolm, accompanied by his son, came passengers by the Antwerp Company's steamer Bruges, Captain Main, which arrived on Tuesday morning at St. Katherine's Wharf, Tower, from Ostend, in barely twelve hours.

VIEW OF BEYROUT.

SYRIA AND LEBANON.

We are enabled to present to our readers two or three engravings, illustrative of a country and people which have latterly, by the mooting of the Syrian question, attracted no small share of the attention of the rest of the globe. We commence with a view of Beyrout, the scene of so much active enterprise, both in the way of attack and defence, during the late Syrian warfare.

Beyrout was a Phœnician city of great antiquity, but now contains few traces of its former splendour. A bath, pieces of granite columns, several of which were standing when Pococke visited the place, and a few other fragments, are all that now remain. But a great number of granite columns may be seen along the shore beneath the water, and part of the present mole is composed of them. From the débris without the present walls, it appears that the ancient town occupied a larger space than the modern, which is but a small place.

The walls are strengthened by several towers, and there are five gates to the city. It receives a copious supply of water from a small river called Nahr Beirut, which rises in Mount Libanus, and flows into the sea a short distance from the town; the water is conveyed by the canal before mentioned, and received into reservoirs and fountains. The streets are narrow and dirty, like those of all Turkish towns; the houses are mostly built of stone. The town is commanded by some low hills to the S.E. Its population is estimated at 6000 souls, of whom the Turks form one-third. There is a large and well-built mosque in the city, formerly a Christian church, dedicated to St. John, and there was a Capuchin convent. The suburbs of the town are as large as the city itself.

In point of locality, Beyrout is as pleasantly situated as any town in Syria. It stands at the verge of a beautiful plain, varied with small hills, and extending to the foot of Mount Libanus. The surrounding country is covered with kiosks, and enriched with groves of vines, olives, palms, and orange, lemon, and mulberry trees; behind which rises the lofty chain of Libanus. No corn is produced around the town; a small red wine is made on Mount Libanus, which is cheap and good; but raw silk is the staple, which, with cotton, olives, and figs, is exported to Cairo, Damascus, and Aleppo. Game is abundant, the beef from Libanus is excellent, and supplies of all sorts may be procured good and cheap.

In a work just written by Sir Charles Napier, that gallant officer gives an interesting description of the whole of this part of the country, and, among other objects of interest, selects for notice Emir Bechir's palace of Ibtedeen.

The narrative of Napier's visit to this place is amusing and characteristic, and we take from it the following descriptive episode:—

> As active operations seemed now entirely at an end, notwithstanding the reinforcements which were constantly arriving, some of whom were sent to Sydon and Tyre, but none to the mountains, I obtained leave from the admiral to pay a visit to the grand prince's palace, and was accompanied by his nephew, a fine young man of about twenty-two, and next heir to the government of Lebanon.
> After a long ride of eight hours, through a most beautiful mountainous country, we arrived at Deir el Kammar, the capital of Lebanon, a tolerably well-built small town; as the plague was said to exist there, we passed on without entering it, and, on rounding a projecting cliff, the palace of the prince opened to our view. It is situated halfway up the mountain, and has a very grand appearance. Above it stands another palace, smaller than the first, and the houses of two of the emir's sons. They were all in an unfinished state; the large palace had been originally constructed in wood, but the late emir had been many years employed in converting it into a more solid shape.
> The entrance into the court-yard is very strong, and capable of resisting anything but artillery, which could not easily be brought against it; the court-yard is large, and is surrounded by a high wall, and in the time of the late prince seven hundred armed men were constantly kept in the barracks adjoining, and a body of horse, richly caparisoned in the Eastern style, were always ready in the yard. Some of the rooms are handsome, particularly those of the harem, but mostly unfurnished, the emir having removed everything he could to Sidon, and from thence to Malta. The stables were large, and capable of containing five hundred horses, the greater part of which were gone; the emir's stud had been magnificent; and, although the whole of his property was guaranteed to him, many of the best horses fell into the hands of the Turks.
> We were well received by some of the family who remained, and tolerably well entertained; but even in the palace of the grand prince of Lebanon our slumbers were much disturbed by the occupants he had left behind. After dinner we visited the small palaces, which were also in an unfinished state, though built in a tasteful style.

To this notice of the residence of Emir Bechir, we add a characteristic grouping of other Lebanon chiefs.

The two foreground figures of this picture are represented as having personal identity with the two chieftains of Lebanon now on a visit to this country, and, we believe, sojourning in the metropolis.

LEBANON CHIEFS.

CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. III.

ST. GEORGE'S, HANOVER-SQUARE.

The Church of St. George, Hanover-square, is probably better known, by name, throughout England, and beyond its shores wherever English newspapers penetrate, than any other church of the Metropolis, with the exception of St. Paul's. This celebrity does not arise from its antiquity—for it is a modern structure; nor from the historical associations connected with it—for it has none of these.

Our fair readers will probably be the first to guess to what the true cause of the renown of St. George's is to be attributed. Its name is a necessary part of those paragraphs in the fashionable journals which so frequently appear during "the season," headed "Marriages in High Life." It is the aristocratic temple of Hymen; the torch he carries here has been lit at the chandeliers of Almack's, and fanned by the breezes of a Chiswick fête. It is here he puts on his brightest array; and, though at less distinguished altars the happy knot can be quite as securely tied, it is here he hides the fetters with brilliants, and covers the yoke with a wreath of orange blossom. It is here he delighteth to have a bishop for his minister, and troops of the noble and titled to say amen to the blessing. In short, the account of a fashionable marriage would read lamely and imperfectly, did it not commence in the usual form—"Yesterday, at St. George's, Hanover-square."

As the reader passes under that portal which stretches over the pavement of the very throng and mart of fashion, to the great accommodation of the dark-eyed vendor of plaster medallions, and many other wanderers, whose callings occupy an equivocal line between trade and mendicancy, he may find much food for reflection, though it dates from but yesterday in comparison with the old Gothic piles, whose portals are paved with the tombstones of crusaders, and lead to an interior which has echoed to the solemn and majestic service of a worship that owns the sacred building no more. The stones of that porch, reader, have been pressed by the sandalled feet of many a bride of patrician rank and queenly beauty, attended by all the splendour that the wealth of the most wealthy aristocracy of the world can throw around a ceremony that scarcely needs such adjuncts to make it interesting. To some that splendour came but as a thing of course, scarcely differing from that which passed around them in their daily life; to others, that brilliancy was the object to be gained, and for it, perhaps, were bartered early hopes, present affections, and future peace a heavy price, but one which is too often paid for wealth and advancement.

Some have purchased all that surrounds them willingly, and have triumphed in doing so, and, were it given to man to read the heart as a book, would be most deservedly despised. Others may have been the victims of authority too powerful to be resisted, too harsh to be submitted to without a struggle—and what shall be said of these? The beggar who stands on the kerb-stone, and gazes on all that bright array as at any pageant of another world, is more to be envied in the comparison. Let us hope that many, very many, of the "happy pairs" who have from this porch set out on their joint journey through life, have fully realized the hopes and anticipations that went with them on their way; but many, too, have passed forth to coldness, estrangement, and neglect, and found that the bright vista before them was terminated by a blighted name, dishonour, and Doctors' Commons. But speculations (for which the reader will hardly thank us) are leading us away from facts.

The history of St. George's, Hanover-square—there is something very Morning-Post-like in the repetition of the title—is soon told, nor does it puzzle the narrator with much research. The parish to which it belongs was taken, "a monstrous cantle," out of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, when this parish was found to be too populous for all reasonable church accommodation or parochial management.

The church was built in 1724, and the structure dedicated to St. George the Martyr, but whether this saint is the St. George of "merrie England," we really cannot tell. The building is sufficiently elegant, without being of mark enough to make for itself an artistic reputation. The portico, the most prominent portion of it, is supported by Corinthian columns, of rather large diameter. Two towers, of the same style of architecture, surmount the portico, and the body of the building is again crowned by a dome, terminated by a ball and vane. The ground on which it is built was given by Lieutenant-General Stewart, and the living is a rectory, in the patronage of the Bishop of London. We are not aware of the value of the living, but from the circumstance before alluded to, the surplice fees must amount to something handsome.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"A Subscriber," Stockport.—He is recommended to order the edition to leave London by Saturday's post.

The Second Part of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, price 2*s.* 6*d.*, is now ready, and may be had by order of all booksellers.

"T. R." Manchester.—The cost of the Engravings expressly for this newspaper have amounted to upwards of £1500 in the numbers already issued; so much for his surmise of using old engravings. Really it seems as if some people are never satisfied.

"W. H.," Mount Sorrel.—Why not give a regular order for the paper by Saturday's post? Any newsman or bookseller in his neighbourhood will receive the order.

"T. Wilson," Abbotsford-place, Glasgow, will perceive, by a notice in our journal this week, that his wish will be complied with in our next.

"W. Ramsbottom," Sunderland.—We cannot just at present say when the view he desires will be given; but probably in the course of a month or two.

"X. Y. Z."—We know of nothing better than a strong hot solution of salt.

"M. Milburn," York.—Many thanks for this gentleman's courteous letter. Its purport and suggestion shall be attended to.

"A Subscriber," Chatham.—We shall present our readers next week with a spirited engraving of the Launch of the Goliath, which takes place at Chatham on Monday next.

Goodwood Races.—Our sporting intelligence of Saturday next will be embellished with a beautiful engraving of Goodwood House (the seat of the Duke of Richmond), the Grand Stand and the Goodwood Cup; and we shall also give the racing news up to the latest hour.

"A Knight."—We may shortly fall into our correspondent's suggestion.

"A. M.," Rochester.—We have repeatedly stated that there is an abundance of wrappers in the office; but that, as they bear no stamp, and cannot go postage free with the papers, they must be procured through the medium of booksellers' parcels. Any bookseller or newsman can get them this way, as with the magazines.

"An Executor."—The income derivable from the £150 capital surely cannot legally be taxed. Appeal.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 23, 1842.

The distress of the country is still the paramount theme. This absorbing topic forces itself upon the consideration of the Legislature, and originates, night after night, discussions in Parliament that will, we hope, eventually lead to something like a remedy for the affliction which oppresses our poor. The details of absolute starvation, in many districts of the empire are appalling. They thicken upon us with only too forcible a conviction of their misery and truth:—they come home, we hope, to the bosoms of even the most cold-blooded political economists, and make a demand upon humanity, which it should indeed be too just, sympathising, and generous to refuse. We must awaken ourselves to the wretched condition of our poorer fellow-creatures, and probe the resources of the empire for the means of bringing them relief. We are imperatively called upon to resort to some unusual measure—to evoke some new principle of legislation, to put food into the mouths of the suffering people, and there can be no eloquence too powerful to plead that melancholy cause which has hunger and wretchedness for its handmaidens—and is rife and teeming with all the dreadful concomitants of want. A partial measure of relief has been propounded during the week by the emancipation of foreign corn from bond—but, this is, after all, only a political expedient for the moment. What is wanted is direct legislation—a positive act of charity and grace—a boon to meet starvation and distress. It is aggravating that the House of Commons should be sensibly impressed with the prevailing misery, and yet pause in the good work of remedial law. The motion of Mr. Duncombe, on Thursday night, elicited a discussion which fully proved how entirely convinced are all parties in the state alike of the sad condition of the suffering population. So far it was available for good, but no further. Alas! it was vague, indefinite, and indirect—it had a party, and not a philanthropical, tendency—and went further to censure the ministry than to relieve the poor. But why not propound some plain, intelligible plan, that can be at once acted upon with benevolence—that shall let sunlight in upon the hearts of the people, and pour a ray of cheerfulness upon the drooping despondency of the land? The grief and melancholy of the lower classes is truly heart-rending. They are fairly paralysed with want, and there is no tax which their betters in condition should not cheerfully pay for their relief. We do trust that some thing will be immediately done in their behalf—and that the latent energies of Parliament will be roused to meet the crisis of distress. The prosperity of earth, and the blessings of Heaven, cannot be expected to fall upon a country that neglects its poor.

It is not, however, by votes of censure upon political opponents that the miseries of the pauper are to be alleviated. The Poor-laws and the Corn-laws are two keys to the sad secrets of distress, and a revisal of these iniquitous measures may avert its repetition. But it is some positive and instant remedy that is wanted now. You must stop the bleeding before you begin to heal the wound. Food must be the precursor of wisdom—and the hunger of the starving must be satisfied before the enactments are moulded, that shall for the future keep the wolf from their door. In Heaven's name let the present crisis of poverty be looked to and relieved.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

The Press had grown to giant might—
The world before its spirit bowed:
It sped its way on wings of light,
And nations with its fame were loud.
It gathered in its wondrous clasp
The million themes that move mankind,
As though its godlike strength would grasp
The sway of universal mind.

Old Wisdom brought it words of gold;
Young Genius flashed it thoughts of fire;
Sterd History on its page enrolled
Her records; and the Muse's lyre
Rang there, with inspiration warm;
Intelligence into its heart
Rolled all her rivers—still a charm
Seemed wanted in the crown of Art!

Art, that unto the Press should be
A very fair and jewelled bride,
Wooed—not as Doges wooed the sea,
By throwing gems into its tide;
But as a proud gem-bringer—come
Fresh as the Venus of the wave;
And bearing from the pearly home
The riches of each treasure cave!

At last, so came she; but first went
A summons for her presence forth;
Loud, and long-dwelling, till it spent
Its south-born echoes in the north!
She answered; and, with joy divine,
We robed her in her bridal dress,
Upled her to her nuptial shrine,
And wedded Art unto the Press!

Anon, the glowing bride must choose
A royal dwelling of her own—
She found within our LONDON NEWS
Temple and palace, home and throne!
And here her smiling spirit pours
Its beautiful enchantment round;
And here the thousand pictured stores
That crown and deck her path abound!

Let the world rush upon our coast,
And gather all, and prize the least;
We only strew our treasure-host;
We only claim to be her priest.
Fancy or truth she may disport;
No single ray will we repress,
Since all adorn, and all support
Our old and honoured friend—the Press!

Let foreign war, with front of rage,
Uprear its gaunt and grisly form,
Art's faithful pencil on our page,
Points to the battle, siege, and storm!
Or when great enterprise shall spread
Its mantle o'er the lands of earth,
By pictured paths the eye is led
To places where its fruits have birth!

The cities of the world are here,
The homes of commerce crowned with wealth,
Land of the blessing, or the bier—
Plague-spot, or paradise of health!
And those to whom our fairer shore
Has been one envied-home, may have
Pictorial impress of such lore,
As travellers earned beyond the wave!

Peace sheds her gentle light, and now
Her retinue swells far our train;
Steam, fire, the axe, the loom, the plough,
Are busy on our page again.
All that invention's brain conceives,
Art by reflection brings to view,
While science, lurking in our leaves,
Smiles joy to find the mirror true!

High festivals that glad the land,
Are they not grand in their array?
Transfix'd by Art's unerring hand,
Who hence shall sweep their pomp away?
Proud celebrations of our clime,
The nation's landmarks of each year,
Like feathers from the wings of Time,
Fleet not—but have endurance here!

The pastimes of our people, yes—
The gala, race, review, or fair.
Light joys that for a moment bless
The toiling crowd whose joy is rare:
These have their happy reflex—these
Kind Art to glean is proud and sure,
And by her pencil, we would please
Blend with, amuse, and glad the poor.

Our fine old, grand cathedral halls,
Wherein the solemn organ swells;
Our rustic church, whose music falls
More oft from humble village bells;
God's home, beneath whose roof is breathed
The hushed prayer of the city's heart,
Or that which stands by foliage wreathed
'Mid trees embosomed and apart.

The moss-grown abbeys of the isle—
The mansions of the olden time—
Whereon the sunlight's faintest smile
Breaks but 'mid shadows more sublime.
The castle that o'ergrows the steep—
Once some proud noble's strong domain—
Crown of the cliffs that fringe our deep,
And frowning back its rage again!

The modern houses of the great,
Our towns, our ports, our harbours fair,
Our architectural halls of state,
Our palaces, all places rare—
All things of fine device. The high
Trophies we raise unto our brave,
Which point their pathway to the sky,
That canopies their mortal grave!

All these Art's pencil shall enshrine
Here for all future time;
And thus a presence half divine,
And influence half sublime,
Shed lustre on the pen—array
Its glories in new dress,
And make more vivid, real, and gay,
The Spirit of the Press!

But this great consummation—mark!
Has been our work alone;
Art, in the press, has suffered yet
No rival near her throne.
Our LONDON NEWS has wrought at length
This unexpected feat;
And what it has commenced with strength,
With pride it shall comp'ete!

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

The Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by their Serene Highnesses the Hereditary Prince and Princess of Saxe Coburg Gotha, arrived in town at ten minutes before five o'clock on Monday afternoon, in an open carriage and four, escorted by a party of Hussars, from Claremont. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Baron Gerstorff, the Saxon Minister, Lady Anna Maria Dawson, Earl of Aberdeen, Sir George Couper, Bart., and Captain Francis Seymour, Scots Fusilier Guards, had the honour of joining the royal circle at Buckingham Palace, at dinner in the evening.

Sir Robert Peel arrived in town on Monday afternoon from his seat, Drayton Park, Staffordshire.

Despatches from the Governors of Canada, New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia, were received at the Colonial Office.

The Duke and Duchess of Richmond and family, have left Portland-place, for Goodwood-park, Sussex, for the races, when the noble Duke and Duchess will receive a distinguished circle during the race week. A ball is to be given, and there will be a succession of dinner parties.

ELOPEMENT IN HIGH LIFE.—The following case of elopement has caused no small degree of excitement in some of the fashionable circles of society at the West-end. The facts of the affair are briefly these:—On Monday morning last, about seven o'clock, a young lady of great personal attractions, and between eighteen and nineteen years of age, the daughter of a wealthy baronet, residing in Portland-place, was suddenly missed from the mansion, and it was immediately discovered that she had taken with her the whole of her jewellery, which was of considerable value. Every possible enquiry was promptly instituted, with the view of finding out the retreat of the fair fugitive, but no tidings could be gained respecting her by any of those members of the family whose anxious solicitude for her welfare prompted them to be on the alert. The "mystery," however, was, in the course of a few hours, cleared up by the arrival of the lady, who returned to her parental roof (which she had so unceremoniously fled from) in a handsome carriage, and by her side was seated a dashing young Irish gentleman of fortune, to whom she had on the same morning been united in bonds indissoluble, at a church not far distant. The "happy couple" alighted, and entered the dwelling, when the lady acquainted papa with the fact that she was married, and that she and her husband were about to quit London for the Emerald Isle. Whether a reconciliation took place between the fair runaway and his daughter, we are unable to say with any degree of certainty; but we believe that the "error" has been forgiven.—Morning Post.

Lord Hill had an audience of the Queen on Tuesday, at Buckingham Palace.

Their Serene Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Saxe Coburg Gotha, attended by Colonel Bouverie, honoured the British Institution with a visit on Tuesday. Their Serene Highnesses afterwards took an airing in a phaeton. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent visited her Majesty in the afternoon. Her Majesty and Prince Albert walked in the royal gardens in the afternoon

COURT MOURNING.—(From Tuesday's night's Gazette.)—Orders for the Court's going into mourning, on Thursday, the 21st instant, for his late Royal Highness the Duke of Orleans, Prince Royal of France, viz.—The ladies to wear black silk, fringed or plain linen, white gloves, necklaces and earrings, black or white shoes, fans and tippets. The gentlemen to wear black, full trimmed, fringed or plain linen, black swords and buckles.

The Court to change the mourning on Thursday, the 28th instant, viz.—The ladies to wear black silk or velvet, coloured ribbons, fans and tippets, or plain white, or white and gold, or white and silver stuffs, with black ribbons. The gentlemen to wear black coats, and black or plain white, or white and gold, or white and silver stuff waistcoats, full trimmed, colour and buckles. And on Thursday, the 4th of August next, the Court to go out of mourning.

Tuesday, being the birthday of the Princess Augusta, eldest daughter of their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge, who completed her twentieth year, the Duke and Duchess, on this interesting occasion, received a select circle to luncheon. The party assembled shortly after two, and broke up at half-past five o'clock. Her Majesty the Queen Dowager came in the morning from Bushy to pay a congratulatory visit to her youthful and amiable niece.

We hear from undoubted authority that when the truly sad and distressing intelligence of the death of the Duke of Orleans was conveyed to the Queen at Claremont, her Majesty could not refrain from weeping. Autograph letters of condolence from her Majesty and Prince Albert to the afflicted royal family of France have already been despatched.

The marriage of Prince Armand de Polignac, son of the ill-fated French minister of that name, who resides in comparative retirement on the estate purchased after his release from his state imprisonment, near Nantes, to Mlle. de Crillon, daughter of the Duke de Crillon, is fixed to take place in the course of the ensuing month.

PROJECTED ALLIANCE IN HIGH LIFE. It is rumoured in the circles of ton, that a noble lord holding office under the late administration is the accepted suitor of one of the fairest débûtantes of the present season, nearly related to a distinguished and venerable nobleman, chief minister to his late Majesty, and granddaughter of a celebrated deceased Whig statesman. His lordship, who is heir-apparent to a Scottish earldom, is in his 32nd year.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent visited her Majesty on Wednesday, at Buckingham Palace.

The Queen and the Princess of Saxe Coburg Gotha took an airing in the afternoon, in an open carriage and four, Her Royal Highness Prince Albert and the hereditary Prince of Saxe Coburg Gotha riding out on horseback at the same time.

The royal dinner party at Buckingham Palace, on Wednesday evening, included Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, their Serene Highnesses the Hereditary Prince and Princess of Saxe Coburg Gotha, the Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch, Lady Charlotte Dundas, the Earl Delaware, and Sir Robert Peel.

MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.—At St. James's Church, on Wednesday, the 20th, the Earl of Bective, eldest son of the Marquis of Headfort, to Amelia, the only child of William Thompson, Esq., M.P. for the county of Westmoreland. The ceremony was performed by the Lord Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol. After the performance of the happy ceremony, an elegant déjeûné was given by Mr. and Mrs. Thompson, at their residence in Whitehall-place. A three o'clock the bride and bridegroom started in an elegant chariot and four, for Tunbridge Wells, to spend the honeymoon.

SIR C. METCALFE.—Sir Charles last week went under the operation of having a tumour removed from his cheek, from the inconvenience of which he has suffered for many years past. Sir B. Brodie, Dr. Chambers, and Mr. Martin, attended at Mivart's Hotel on Sir Charles, when the tumour was skilfully removed by Sir Benjamin. Sir Charles is going on very favourably.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

TEACHING THE BLIND TO READ.—An interesting public meeting took place on Monday last, in the Pensioners' Library, Greenwich Hospital, Admiral the Hon. Sir Robert Stopford, G.C.B., Governor of the Hospital, in the chair, when five old blind pensioners, instructed on the phonetic principle, or by Mrs. Frere's system of teaching the blind to read by the combination of elementary sounds, read the Scriptures before a numerous assembly. One of these pensioners, aged seventy-eight, who learned at the age of seventy-five, had the honour of reading before her Majesty the Queen Dowager, on the occasion of her last visit to Greenwich. Another, who had never been able to read when possessed of eyesight, learned to read the Testament embossed upon this principle, when blind, in five lessons. Several other blind persons, not belonging to the Hospital, also read.

COLLEGE FOR CIVIL ENGINEERS, PUTNEY, SURREY.—The annual distribution of prizes at this admirable establishment was held on Wednesday, at two o'clock. The company was numerous, and disposed to be pleased with the very effective state of the College. After some time spent in examining the different drawings and plans —many of which did the various pupils high credit, more especially the working drawings of machinery, and the architectural plans—the company descended into the room where the prizes were to be distributed. The president, his Grace the Duke of Buccleuch, presided, and at his right sat his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, who not only took a lively interest in the business of the day, but exhibited that interest in the pertinent questions he put to the young prizemen. The Earl of Devon, on behalf of the council, read the report, which stated the examinations to be highly creditable to the students, and also eulogised their excellent conduct. At the conclusion of the report, which was received with much applause, the distribution of the prizes took place.

METROPOLITAN IMPROVEMENTS.—A petition, most respectably signed, was presented some months ago for widening that part of Piccadilly between Bolton-street and Park-lane, and her Majesty was pleased to grant the land of the Green Park necessary for that purpose. An obstacle is, however, stated to have arisen from the squabble of St. George's and St. Martin's vestries as to which parish shall keep in repair these few feet of additional carriage way, and the consequence is, that the public seem destined to lose the advantage of this improvement by the ill-judged parsimony of one or other of these bodies.

The parish of St. George, Hanover-square, have resolved to pave Piccadilly with wood, from the Black Bear to Lord Ashburton's, at the corner of Bolton-street, the work to commence at the close of the season.

LORD FITZGERALD.—The illness of the noble President of the Board of Control is not of a dangerous character. His lordship has for some days been gradually recovering.

Sunday morning, during divine service in St. Clement's, Strand, the congregation were thrown into excitement by a lady named Smith, wife of a stone-mason, in Clement's-lane, being suddenly seized with apoplexy. She was removed into the vestry and medical assistance procured, but life was extinct. When she quitted home she appeared in perfect health.

On Tuesday the Lord Mayor, accompanied by his lady, attended at Haggerstone, and laid the foundation-stone for the building of an infant school.

Mr and Mrs Charles Kean having concluded their engagement at the Haymarket Theatre, have proceeded on a tour up the Rhine for a few weeks. They left the Brunswick Wharf, Blackwall, on Sunday, in the steam ship Wilberforce, for Antwerp.

The steam ship Antwerpen, under the command of Captain Jackson, started from the St. Katharine's Wharf, as usual, and the passengers who took their departure by her were so numerous as to amount to upwards of 120. A considerable part of them were persons of rank and fashion, bound for the Rhine; and Mdlle. Rachel with her parents, Monsieur David, and others of the French troupe, also proceeded by her on their way to Brussels

THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON AND THE ANTI-CORN-LAW LEAGUE. The following curt answer of the Duke of Wellington to repeated applications from the Anti-Corn League has met with review appeared in the Morning Chronicle of Tuesday. "The thing," says the Times, "is done so admirably that we insert it for the amusement of our readers:—London, July 16, 1842.—Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington presents his compliments to Mr. ——. He is not in office in the Queen's political service. He is not intrusted with the exercise of political power. He has no control over those who are. He begs to be excused for declining to receive visits of deputations from associations, or of individual gentlemen, in order to converse with him upon public affairs. But if any gentleman thinks proper to give him, in writing, information or instruction upon the subject, he will peruse the same with attention.—D. A. Taylor, Esq., Brown's Hotel."

EXTRAORDINARY RAILWAY TRAIN.—On Thursday the six o'clock train A.M., from Paddington to Taunton, carried the immense and unprecedented number of 2115 passengers! the great attraction being the agricultural meeting at Bristol.

THE NEW TARIFF.—The first importation of horned cattle under the new measure passed the Custom-house on Monday last, it consisted of four bulls from Switzerland of the celebrated Dun breed, which is produced in that country, and during the summer months is pastured upon the lower acclivities of the mountains. They reached London from Rotterdam, and had been brought down the course of the Rhine. Their value was estimated (of course for the purpose of the breeder) at about £80 per head.

GENERAL TURNPIKE ACT.—On Monday a decision, under the General Turnpike Act, of considerable public importance, was come to by the magistrates of the Kensington police court. George Eley, a common carrier, was summoned before Mr. G. Clive, the sitting magistrate, by the toll-collector at the Notting-hill turnpike, for evading toll. It appeared that on the 2nd instant a boy passed through the gate with a basket, the contents of which were not known. He shortly afterwards returned with the empty basket, and on being followed, went to a cart drawn by one horse, and driven by the defendant, which was standing at the Swan public-house, Kensington Gravel-pits, about 150 yards from the turnpike. Mr Levy, solicitor, son of the lessee of tolls, attended to support the charge. Mr. Paynter said that his colleague and himself had given the case every consideration, and they were of opinion that the case was not one contemplated by the clause of the act of parliament, or else every gentleman who sent his servant through a gate with a card and waited with his carriage on the other side, would be liable to toll. Mr. Levy contended that every gentleman who did so was liable to a penalty for evading toll. He had had several convicted, amongst whom was a surgeon, who had left his servant to pay the toll at the turnpike while he went through and visited a patient. Mr. Paynter said the 20th section of the act prevented the possibility of a conviction in this case, as it spoke of a waggoner who shall unload a considerable quantity of goods; now, the defendant only removed a basket. The charge against the defendant was not for using the road, but for the evading of passing through the gate. He did not think the case proved, and he should therefore dismiss the summons.

SERIOUS COLLISION ON THE RIVER.—On Sunday morning, the Victory steamer, on her way from London to Gravesend, with upwards of four hundred passengers on board, was going down the river, when she met with a collier brig proceeding in the same direction in the lower part of Barking-shelf, and while the brig was standing over from the northward, the steamer, which ought to have gone astern of her, came in collision with the vessel, and if it had not been for the promptness of the crew of the brig, who, at the risk of throwing her masts over the side, threw all their sails aback, the Victory would have been sunk. The steamer received a severe blow, and sustained considerable damage. The confusion on board was frightful, and several women fainted away. Many of the passengers got up from the steamer on to the brig's bow when the collision took place, and were taken back in the ship's boat. The Victory was delayed for some time on her passage.

MYSTERIOUS DISAPPEARANCE. On Tuesday the following information was circulated throughout the police districts:—"Missing, since three o'clock on Sunday afternoon, a young lady, nineteen years of age, and a servant girl, aged seventeen. The young lady is tall, with auburn hair, very good looking, but rather pale; wore a muslin dress (a red ground with white flowers), a pink silk drawn bonnet, a black silk shawl, and new shoes, in which are the makers' names, 'Rood and Son, 8, Lower Grosvenor-street.' The servant is described as short and thin, dressed in a blue spotted frock, white straw bonnet, and light Cashmere shawl. They left home for the supposed purpose of going to church, and had with them a bible, in which was written the name, 'Mary Ann,' &c."

On Sunday prayers were offered up at the French and Spanish Catholic chapels for the repose of the soul of the late Duke of Orleans.

SATISFACTORY.—Capitalists are much annoyed by the temporary superabundance of money, which makes it very difficult for them to obtain a moderate rate of interest for loans on any description of securities. This abundance of money, coupled with the passing of the new Tariff Bill, has certainly given a stimulus to many branches of business; whilst the favourable prospects for the wheat harvest give reason to hope that the improvement may now prove to be of a permanent nature.—The Globe.

FIRE AT THE LONDON AND VAUXHALL GAS WORKS.—Tuesday afternoon a fire broke out at the London and Vauxhall Gas Works, situated at the back entrance of Vauxhall Gardens. From the inflammable nature of the material the flames shot up with great rapidity, and the building where it originated was soon destroyed. The Company's men fortunately succeeded in subduing the fire, and prevented it from doing any further mischief.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE AT TOTTENHAM.—TEN HOUSES DESTROYED OR DAMAGED.—Between eleven and twelve o'clock on Wednesday night a most extensive fire broke out in the village of Tottenham, which, before it was subdued, extended to ten houses, whilst amongst the property destroyed were several valuable horses. The fire is stated to have broken out in the bakehouse of Mr. Finney. The loss of property is estimated at about £1000.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

The Cleopatra, 26, Captain C. Wyvill, arrived at Portsmouth on Friday from Sheerness. She is under orders to proceed to China, and will touch at the Mauritius, to which island she is about to convey the newly-appointed governor, Major-General Sir W. Gomm, and suite.

The Lady Rafles freight ship, sailed on Saturday, with bread and stores for the use of the naval and military forces in China.

The Rhadamanthus steam transport sailed same day for the river. She left Halifax on the 18th ult, and did not reach Plymouth until the 8th inst., having been twenty days on her passage.

The Talbot, 26, Captain Sir Thomas Thompson, was paid in advance on Tuesday, and sailed on Thursday evening for South America.

The Calcutta, 78, Captain Rich, is expected home in a short time from the Mediterranean.

The Goliath, 80, and Virago, a large class steamer, will be launched from the dockyard at Chatham on Monday, the 25th inst. The Goliath is to mount 68 32-pounders, long guns, and 12 6-inch guns. The length of her gun-deck, 180 feet; her breadth extreme, 50 feet; and burden in tons, 2599. The Virago is to mount two long guns, 84-pounders, and 4 32-pounders. Her length on deck is 180 feet; breadth extreme, 36 feet; and burden in tons, 1000.

PORTSMOUTH, Monday Night.—The Satellite, 18, Commander Gambier, got under weigh this afternoon, and proceeded down Channel with a favourable but light wind. She is bound to the Pacific, and will form one of the squadron under the command of Rear-Admiral Thomas.

It is stated that the St. Vincent, 120, Captain Codrington, with the flag of the commander-in-chief, Admiral Sir E. Codrington, is to be fully equipped and proceed to Spithead, where she is to take up her moorings, instead of lying in the harbour. It is also stated that the flag-ship at Sheerness, the Camperdown, 104, Vice-Admiral Sir Edward Brace, is to take her station at the Nore, and that the flag-ship at Plymouth, the Caledonia, 120, Admiral Sir D. Milne, is to be moored in the Sound, instead of Hamoaze.

The Wellesley, 72, Captain J. Maitland, is hourly looked for from China, as she left Singapore on the 7th of March, on her passage home.

The Hon. Major-General H. Murray, military commander of the western district, has returned to Plymouth to resume his duties after leave of absence.

Rear-Admiral the Hon. D. P. Bouverie, the admiral superintendent of this dockyard, will resign his office in a few days, as his time for holding it will then expire. It is not yet known who will supersede him.

John Elliott, Esq., R.N., of Devonport, has been appointed assistant store-keeper of the Victualling Department at Deptford.

PORTSMOUTH, Tuesday Night.—The Sulphur, 8, Capt. E. Belcher, arrived this afternoon from China and the East Indies, where she has been engaged surveying nearly six years. The Sulphur will be paid off forthwith.

The Alligator, 16, Commander Reginald York, got under weigh this morning, and proceeded on her voyage to Canada.

ANNUAL INSPECTION OF THE ROYAL ARTILLERY AT WOOLWICH.—The Royal Horse Artillery, under the command of Lieut.-Colonel Wyld, C.B., and the field batteries, under the command of Colonel Cleaveland, assembled on Wednesday morning, in heavy marching order, on the common, and in a few minutes afterwards Lieut.-General Lord Bloomfield, G.C.B. and G.C.H., attended by Major Sandilands and Brigade-Major Coppinger, arrived on the ground, and were received by the troops drawn up in line with the usual salute. His lordship then proceeded along the line in front and rear, and minutely inspected the whole of the men, their horses and appointments. The troops afterwards marched past at slow time, in single file, the guns of the Royal Horse Artillery, drawn by six horses each, two abreast, and the guns of the field batteries by four horses, two abreast, and had a fine effect. The men attached to the riding-school establishment, under the command of Colonel R. Jones, with the horses in training for the use of the service, also marched past, and the whole were afterwards formed into squares, where the Lieut.-General addressed them in the most complimentary manner on their superior cleanliness in person and appointments, and efficient and soldier-like appearance.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

SAILING OF THE MAIL STEAMER COLUMBIA. The steamer Columbia, Captain Judkins, left Liverpool shortly after six o'clock on Wednesday evening. She carries out the mails for Halifax and Boston, and also a fair number of passengers. She steamed down the river in excellent style.

PORTSMOUTH, July 19.—Her Majesty's ship Sulphur, arrived here from China, fell in with the wreck of a vessel that had been burnt, and apparently a long time in the water (the stem and fore part only floating), having white streak on the starboard side, and two or three narrow white streaks on the larboard, on the 12th instant, in lat. 40, long. 11.

FALMOUTH, July 17.—The Oriental, Christmas, arrived here from Malta, was run into by the Meteore (French steamer), from Algiers to Toulon, 7th ult., and received considerable damage in her hull, &c., and was towed into Port Mahon, to repair.

DOVER, July 20. The steam-boat from Boulogne this morning, the Sir William Wallace, was in sight with this afternoon by the French packet from Calais, having one engine out of order, and unable to steam; she landed here about sixty passengers. The Sir William Wallace was in sight about six or seven miles from Dover, under sail.

DEPARTURE OF THE GREAT WESTERN.—The noble steam-ship, Great Western, sailed from Kingsroad, Bristol, on Saturday last, at one o'clock, carrying sixty passengers, and a fair cargo. The ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, containing a full account of the great Agricultural Meeting, held at Bristol on the three previous days, illustrated by a number of engravings, was received by the early train, and was forwarded by express on board the steamer.

POSTSCRIPT.

Saturday Morning.

DEPARTURE OF HER MAJESTY FOR WINDSOR CASTLE.—The Court is expected to leave Buckingham Palace this afternoon, immediately after luncheon, for Windsor Castle, where her Majesty is expected to arrive between five and six o'clock. Her Majesty is not expected to proceed to Brighton this year. The Court, however, will occasionally, while at Windsor, pay a visit to Claremont during the autumn. It is not supposed that her Majesty will return to Buckingham Palace until November.

LAUNCH OF THE QUEEN, AT BLACKWALL.—The Queen, East Indiaman, was launched on Thursday, at Blackwall. Miss Stopford, daughter of Sir R. Stopford, in the usual manner, named the vessel "the Queen." There were upwards of 500 persons, the majority ladies, on the decks. The vessel is 195 feet 5 inches in length, 39 feet 9 inches in width; and between decks, of which there are three, 6 feet 11 inches. She is pierced for 54 guns.

ACCIDENT TO THE PRINCE ROYAL OF PRUSSIA.—A Berlin letter gives an account of an accident which happened to the Prince Royal of Prussia, on his journey to St. Petersburg. At one of the first stages within the Russian territory the horses ran away. His servant stopped them, but in doing so fell, and broke his leg, and was carried to a neighbouring village.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT.—The day now named for the prorogation of Parliament is the 11th or 12th of August. The labours of the session will consequently terminate in three weeks.—Globe.

MILITARY INSPECTION.—Thursday morning his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, K.G., G.C.B., &c., and staff, reviewed, on the parade in the Tower, the Coldstream Guards, at present stationed in that garrison, and afterwards inspected the barracks, &c.

The Admiralty have issued an order that henceforth all hired men employed in her Majesty's dockyards shall receive half-pay and medical attendance during illness

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—Cerito took her benefit last night, in one of the most crowded houses of the season. The Opera was Lucia di Lammermoor, followed by a divertissement. The Pas de Fleurs concluded the entertainments: Cerito again gained golden opinions—boxes, pit, and gallery applauding her to the echo.

INDISPOSITION OF THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—On Thursday, during the judicial proceedings of the House of Lords, the Lord Chancellor was so much indisposed as to be obliged to leave the House, and the Earl of Shaftesbury presided.

The trial of Bean, for the attack on her Majesty's life, will take place on Thursday, the 25th of August next. The sessions of the Central Criminal Court commence on the 22nd. Mr. Justice Williams will, it is expected, adjudicate on the occasion, with Mr. Justice Erskine and Lord Abinger.

THE NIGER EXPEDITION.—PORTSMOUTH, Friday Evening.—From the accounts brought from the coast of Africa, by the Fermagant, 3, Com. Seagrim, which left Ascension on the 25th of May, this expedition had not proceeded up the Niger a second time, in consequence of there not being sufficient water to admit of it until after the rainy season, which has only now terminated. The Albert was lying at Ascension, but the Soudan and Wilberforce, under the command of Capt. W. Allen, were on the coast. Capt. Allen intended to proceed, as soon as the depth of water would admit of it, up the river, as far as the model farm; but whether he would continue his voyage higher up would entirely depend upon the state of his crew when at that point.

INDIAN WARS.—Several large vessels are further being taken up for the conveyance of troops to India; and enlisting for the artillery, and other regiments, is actively going on INSPECTION BY THE AGENCY OF THE RIVERS THAMES AND MEDWAY.—On Thursday forenoon, at eleven o'clock, the Lord Mayor, Sir John Pirie, Bart., accompanied by a numerous party, embarked on board the steam-packet Mercury, which was moored off the Tower, splendidly decorated with flags, and having a country band, and soon afterwards proceeded for the usual view of Old Father Thames and the waters of the Medway.

THE POTTERIES, Thursday Morning. The colliers are still out here, and without any prospect of returning to work. It is said that the aspect of affairs has assumed a more alarming appearance, and fresh troops were sent for last night.

BIRMINGHAM, Thursday Evening.—Intelligence arrived here that the colliers in Ketley, on the estate of the Duke of Sutherland, had turned out, and were going about the country in large bodies. The news from the Potteries is equally unsatisfactory. The dispute has not been settled, nor was there this morning any probability of an amicable arrangement being coming to. Mr. Sparrow, it is reported, intends closing his extensive works, no doubt from inability to make the demand equal to the required wages. The troops and cavalry have been removed to Newcastle, and it is said that at three o'clock this morning additional soldiers were sent for.

The packet-ship Oxford, Captain Rathbone, which sailed from New York on the 15th inst., was off Liverpool on Thursday morning. Among the passengers by her is Major-General Clitherow, recently in command of the troops in Canada.

A mass for his late Royal Highness the Duke of Orleans was celebrated on Thursday, at the French Chapel, in the presence of the Chargé d'Affaires and gentlemen of the Embassy and Consulate-General of France. The principal French residents in London also attended.

AFFAIR OF HONOUR.—A meeting took place near Boulogne, on the 18th instant, between Lieutenant Colonel Bradshaw, 57th Regiment, and Major Orange, 67th, attended by Captains Grignon and Brown. Lieutenant Colonel Bradshaw having received Major's fire without effect, discharged his pistol in the air, when the parties left the ground.

AFFAIR OF HONOUR.—BOTH PARTIES WOUNDED.—On Wednesday morning at five o'clock, a hostile meeting (and which terminated by both parties being wounded, one severely) took place on Putney Heath, betwen Alexander Pollington, Esq., residing at Barossaville, St. John's-wood, Regent's-park, and Augustus James Talbot, Esq., residing in Upper Gloucester-place, Dorset-square, Regent's-park. The meeting arose from a political dispute, relative to a recent investigation of some elections before the committees of the House of Commons.

NEW CITY OF LONDON RACES.—Thursday. The sweepstakes of 3 sovs. each, and 30 added, was won by Mr. Balchin's Dromedary. The New Cross Sweepstakes of 5 sovs. each, and 30 added, was won by Mr. Hallimore's Solomon.—A Sweepstakes of 3 sovs. each, and 20 added, was won by Mr. Templeton's Little Fany. Buckle, the jockey, was thrown in a race, but fortunately not much injured.

POLICE. Mr Little, of the firm of Gibbons and Little, Redcross-street, appeared on Thursday at Guildhall, to answer the complaint of Mr. Grafton, vendor of Mint weights, in Chancery-lane, for selling two counterfeit balances for the weighing of the gold coin of the realm, knowing them to be such, and by which he was liable to a penalty of £20. Mr. Grafton, however, not pressing to conviction, and the defendant undertaking to sell no more of those weights, the complaint was allowed to drop, unless the officers of the Mint chose to enforce the fine.

The Francis Needham appeared at the same office, on the same day, charged with using threats of violence in a letter, and sending a parcel containing a halter and a cat-o'-nine-tails, to Mr Bristow, a magistrate of Nottinghamshire. The parties are related by marriage, and litigants in Chancery. On the defendant's retracting his expression, and being bound to keep the peace for one year, in the sum of £1000, Lord Blayney and Captain Kincaird becoming his securities, he was dismissed.

A deodand of £50 was passed on the Royal William, Margate steamer, on Thursday, at the inquest held at the White Hart Inn, Kent, on the body of John M'Millan, whose death was caused accidentally by the collision of that vessel, in Erith Reach, with a sailing barge of London.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE.—On Friday morning a fire broke out on the premises of Mr. Prescott, No. 209, Whitecross-street. The premises of Mr. Prescott were, together with his stock and furniture, completely destroyed. The fire communicated to the premises of Mr. Harper, which were materially damaged. Mr. Yearly, No. 208, on the other side, escaped with slight injury, but he sustained much damage by removal of furniture. No cause can be assigned for the origin of the fire.

TWENTY HOUSES CONSUMED.—The various fire-offices in the Metropolis have received, on Friday, information of the following deplorable fires:—On Tuesday morning a fire was discovered raging amongst a pile of stabling, situate in North Arlington, near Bridport, which afterwards extended to a row of houses in the neighbourhood. The flames were not arrested until eleven houses were wholly consumed. None of the tenents were insured. The buildings are insured in the Sun Fire-office.—On Wednesday a large fire happened at Twyminster, supposed to be the work of an incendiary, which consumed four houses and other premises. On Thursday a fire occurred in the village of Twynill, Devonshire, occasioned by a stack of new hay overheating. The premises were entirely burned down, together with four dwellings attached to the farm. Only a portion of the property is insured.

FRANCE.—The Paris papers of Wednesday have arrived. The Regency question, and other matters consequent upon the death of the Duke of Orleans, are the only theme.

It would appear that M. Thiers has promised the King to support the Regency Bill (which contemplates the nomination of the Duke de Nemours to the office of Regent). The would argue the acquiescence of his party in that important act; but the Courrier Français declares, that unless the chiefs of the Opposition be propitiated, Ministers might find themselves in a minority.

The Madrid journals of the 13th have reached us. They contain no news of importance. The combination of the operative printers still continued; and the journals are published in a incomplete state.

THE DUKE OF ORLEANS.

We had last week the melancholy task of recording the death of this promising young prince—the hope of the French nation. The sad intelligence of that most distressing event had then just reached our metropolis by the Paris express, and we had only time to announce the catastrophe, with a few added words of regretful comment upon the bereavement which the people and the royal family of France had sustained. But the interval of a week has poured in upon the public all the details of the afflicting calamity, and we now present them to our readers, accompanied by such imaginative illustrations as particular episodes of the gloomy but affecting narrative appeared to suggest. The death of the Duke of Orleans is, in all senses, to be most deeply deplored. As his poor mother exclaimed, amid her grief and tears, "What an affliction has fallen upon his family, but how much greater the misfortune for France!" The prince was not only heir to the throne of his illustrious father, but, with bright intelligence, a noble disposition, and soldier-like qualities and distinction, he had found his way into the heart of the people, and stood in the breach between the stability of the monarchy and the dangers of the revolutionary change. He has left children, and thus a long regency will ensue—a regency, which we hope, rather than believe, will be unstained by the bloodshed of anarchy, unsullied by any new outbreaks of crime. It is of good omen that the popular voice of France should be raised in favour of the election of the Duke of Nemours, the eldest surviving brother of the departed prince; and it bespoke forethought and discretion in the poor Duke of Orleans himself, that his will should have indicated a wish that the destinies of the kingdom should be committed to the charge of those who would have vigour, energy, and decision for all the emergencies of state. His widow, the mournfully bereaved Duchess, will, therefore, take no share in the future Government of France.

The Duke of Orleans is a loss to society, as well as to the nation. He seems to have been a good son—a good husband—a good father—a good soldier—a good prince. In all the relations of life, his conduct is reported as exemplary; and there is no doubt but he was most fondly regarded by his family and by France. Those who knew him in private life, speak of him with respect, with affection, and with regret. A thousand little traits are remembered of him which shed light upon his character, and lustre upon the gentle benevolence of his heart. His generosity was munificent—his enterprise noble—and his ambition worthy of a soldier and a prince. He was most favourably disposed towards England, and was endeavouring to cement the good disposition between the two countries by many an interchange of social regard. He patronised our arts and literature, and even adopted our manly sports. He introduced horse-racing upon a grand scale into France, and British artists to make drawings of his stud, and employed a British publisher to mult ply them in the English metropolis. We find, too, that he intended to try the generous contention upon our own course, and that two of his horses are entered to run at Epsom for the next Derby Stakes.

The short memoir which we have gathered of this lamented Prince, and which will be found to follow the details of his melancholy death, makes allusion to his soldierly career. It was a brief, but noble one. He participated in whatever glories attended the French arms in Algiers, leading with the resolution of a dauntless valour, and fighting with the proverbial gallantry of his race. His chief achievement was at Constantine—a memorial of which will be found in the engraving on our first page where he won and fired the hearts of his soldiery, and displayed a daring bravery of spirit worthy of a scion of the house of Louis Philippe.

In pointing attention to the whole narrative of his death, we make no further introductory comment of our own. The following description of the melancholy event, as we have copied it from Galignani's journal, is one of the most touching and eloquent we have ever perused. It is impossible to read it without emotions that make one respond to the sorrow it portrays. We must all feel for the calamity that has fallen upon France, and all join in a generous condolence with her bereavement and her grief.

The late Duke of Orleans was the eldest son of the King of the French, and of her present Majesty the Queen of the French, who is daughter of Ferdinand, King of the Two Sicilies. The deceased was a native of Palermo, having been born in that city on the 2nd of September, 1810. On the restoration of the House of Bourbon to the throne of their ancestors, the Orleans branch of that family immediately returned to their native country, where the young Prince, now so unhappily removed from this life, commenced his education as a pupil of the public Lyceums in Paris; for his father, whose early life had been spent under the guidance of Madame de Genlis, was resolved that his son should not be brought up in what Dr. Johnson calls "ignorance of princely education," and for the first time a French Prince entered an academic class, exposed himself to the fellowship of schoolboys, and contended with the sons of the nobility and gentry of France in the rivalry proper to a place of public education. He has, however, been less distinguished in literature than in arms, having served with considerable reputation in the African war.

When the news of that revolution which placed his father on a throne reached him, he was at Joigny with his regiment. Of course, he lost no time in attempting to join his relatives: he was, however, detained by the Mayor of Montrouge, but was speedily liberated by an order from Lafayette, and he then thought it expedient to return to his regiment, instead of proceeding to Neuilly, where his father then was. On his return he met the Duchess d'Angoulême, who expressed a hope that he would support the cause of that portion of the family to which she belonged. His characteristic reply was, that under all circumstances he would do his duty, regardless of the consequences.

Louis Philippe I., the King of the French, has now a family of six children (exclusive of the late lamented Duke of Orleans), four of whom are sons, viz., the Duke de Nemours, the Prince de Joinville, the Duke d'Aumale, and the Duke de Montpensier. The present heir apparent to the throne of France is the young Comte de Paris, the eldest child of the late Duke of Orleans, who was born in August 1838, and is consequently in his fourth year. His younger brother, the infant Duke de Chartres, was born on the 9th November, 1840.

The late Duke of Orleans married, in June 1837, the Princess Helena of Mecklenburgh-Schwerin, by whom he had the two sons above mentioned. He always entertained a marked predilection for military employment, and a strong love of military glory; and was understood to be much beloved by the soldiers under his command, many of whom—sturdy veterans of the Napoleon armies—shed tears as his lifeless body was carried from the fatal spot.

It is curious to remark the hapless fate which has been attendant upon so many of the youthful scions of royalty in France.

In the first place, there was the unfortunate Dauphin, the son of Louis XVI., who, after undergoing the most horrible sufferings, perished in the prison of the Temple, at the age of about eight years. Although, however, he never came to the throne, the title of Louis XVII. has been nevertheless assigned him.

The next youthful heir to the French crown was the Duke de Reichstadt, or, as he was called, "the King of Rome," whom Napoleon wished to place on the throne when he abdicated in 1814 and 1815. This, however, the conquerors of France would never listen to, and the young prince was consequently compelled to retire with his imperial mother to Austria, where he lived for some years, under the protection of his maternal grandfather, the late Emperor Francis I. He finally died of pulmonary consumption, in the year 1832, aged twenty-one years.

Louis XVIII. having died in 1824 without issue, he was succeeded by his brother, Charles X., who, as all our readers are aware, was compelled to abdicate his throne in July 1830. His eldest son, the Dauphin (entitled the Duke d'Angoulême), at the same time resigned his pretensions to the throne in favour of his nephew, the young Duke de Bordeaux, whose father, the Duke de Berri, was assassinated at the Opera-house by Louvel, in the year 1820, thereby affording another instance of the evil destiny of the Bourbon race.

THE ACCIDENT.

The Duc de Bordeaux has, however, been compelled, like the son of Napoleon, to wander abroad for twelve years, an exile from his native land, with very little prospect of ever recovering the throne of his ancestors.

(From Galignani's Messenger).

The details of the calamity are as follows. Yesterday (July 13), at twelve o'clock, the Duke of Orleans was to leave Paris for St. Omer, where he was to inspect several regiments intended for the corps of operation on the Marne. His equipages were ordered, and his attendants in readiness. Every preparation was made at the Pavillon Marsan for the journey, after which his royal highness was to join the Duchess of Orleans at Pombières. At eleven the prince got into a carriage, intending to go to Neuilly, to take leave of the King and Queen and the royal family. This carriage was a four-wheeled cabriolet, or caléche, drawn by two horses à la demi-Daumont—that is, driven by a postillion. It was the conveyance usually taken by the prince when going short distances round Paris. He was quite alone, not having suffered one of his officers to accompany him. On arriving near the Porte Maillot, the horse rode by the postillion took fright, and broke into a gallop. The carriage was soon taken with great velocity up the Chemin de la Révolte. The prince, seeing that the postillion was unable to master the horses, put his foot on the step, which is very near the ground, and jumped down on the road, when about half way along the road which runs direct from the Porte Maillot. The prince touched the ground with both feet, but the impulse was so great, that he staggered, and fell with his head on the pavement. The effect of the fall was terrible, for his royal highness remained senseless on the spot. Persons instantly ran to his assistance, and carried him into a grocer's by the wayside, a short distance off, opposite Lord Seymour's stables. In the meantime the postillion succeeded in getting command over his horses, turned the carriage round, and came to the door of the house where the prince was lying. His Royal Highness never recovered his senses. He was placed on a bed in a room on the ground floor, and surgical assistance was sent for. Dr. Baumy, a physician in the neighbourhood, was the first who came. He bled the royal sufferer, but this produced no good effect. The news of the accident was conveyed to Neuilly. The Queen immediately set out on foot, and the King followed her. His Majesty was to be at Paris at twelve o'clock, to hold a council of Ministers. His carriages, which were ready, soon overtook their Majesties, who entered them, with Madame Adelaide and the Princess Clementine. They proceeded to the house into which the Duke of Orleans had been taken. He by that time was nearly lifeless. It may be easy to imagine, but it will be impossible for any one to describe the grief of their Majesties and Royal Highnesses at the spectacle they beheld. Dr. Pasquier, junior, the Prince Royal's first surgeon, had just arrived. Soon afterwards the Dukes d'Aumale and Montpensier came from Courbevoie and Vincennes. Dr Pasquier was very soon compelled to announce that the case was of the most serious nature, for every symptom showed that there was an effusion on the brain, and every minute the evil seemed to increase. A few words pronounced by the Prince in the German language gave a momentary hope, but they as quickly vanished. Marshal Soult, Marshal Gerard, the Ministers of Justice, Foreign Affairs, the Interior, the Marine, Finances, and Public Works arrived, and were admitted into the destined chamber of the royal Duke. The Chancellor, the Prefet of Police, Generals Pajol and Aupick, with the officers of the households of their Majesties and Princes, hastened to the spot, and remained outside the house in a space kept clear by sentinels stationed around. At two o'clock, as the case became more and more desperate, the King sent for the Duchess de Nemours, who had remained at Neuilly. She came, attended by her ladies in waiting. No pen can paint the afflicting scene presented by the chamber when the Duchess de Nemours came, and added her bitter tears to those of the rest of the family. The Queen and princesses were on their knees by the bedside, praying and bathing with their tears the hands of their departing son and brother, so intensely beloved. The princes were speechless, and sobbing almost to suffocation. The King stood by silent and motionless, watching with painful anxiety every fluctuation in the countenance of his expiring heir. Outside the house the crowd continued every minute to increase, every one overwhelmed with consternation. The curé of Neuilly and his clergy immediately obeyed the King's summons, and came to Sablonville. Under the influence of powerful medicaments, the agony of the dying prince was prolonged. Life withdrew, but very slowly, and not without struggling powerfully against the utter destruction of so much youthful strength. For a moment respiration became more free, and the beating of the pulse was perceptible. As the slightest hopes are grasped at by hearts torn with despair, this scene of desolation was interrupted by a momentary calm, but the gleam soon passed away. At four o'clock the Prince showed the unequivocal symptoms of departing life, and in another half hour he rendered his soul to God, dying in the arms of his King and father, who, at the last moment, pressed his lips on the forehead of his lost child, hallowed by the tears of his afflicted mother, and the sobs and lamentations of the whole of his family.

The prince being dead, the King drew the Queen into an adjoining room, where the ministers and marshals assembled threw themselves at her feet, and endeavoured to offer her consolation. Her Majesty exclaimed, "What a dreadful misfortune has fallen upon our family, but how much greater is it for France!" Her voice was then stopped by her sobs and tears. The King seeing Marshal Gerard absorbed in grief, took his hand, pressed it with an expression showing his sense of his bereavement, but, at the same time, a firmness and magnanimity truly royal. The mortal remains of the prince were placed on a litter covered with a white sheet. The Queen refused to get into the carriage, declaring her resolution to follow the corpse of her son to the chapel at Neuilly, where she wished it to be carried. Consequently, a company of the 17th Light Infantry was hastily marched down from Courbevoie to line the procession on each side, and thus those brave men who had shared with the prince in all the dangers of the passage of the Iron Gates and the heights of Mouzaia, in Africa, served as the escort of his now lifeless body. Several of the men wept, and called back to their minds the brilliant valour with which the Duke of Orleans had assailed the enemy, and, at the same time, the mild and delicate beneficence with which he had ever tempered the necessary rigour of command. At five o'clock the mournful procession moved towards the chapel at Neuilly. General Athalin walked at the head of the bier, which was carried by four non-commissioned officers. Behind followed the King, Queen, Princess Adelaide, Duchess de Nemours, Princess Clementine, Duke d'Aumale, and Duke de Montpensier. Then came Marshals Soult and Gerard, the ministers, the General officers, the household of the king and princes, and an immense number of other persons. The sad and solemn procession moved along the Avenue de Sablonville, and crossing the old Neuilly road, entered the royal park, and traversed its whole length to the chapel. Here their Majesties and princes and princesses, after prostrating themselves before the altar, left their beloved child and brother under the guardianship of God. In the evening the royal family remained in seclusion, except that the King conferred with his ministers. At seven o'clock M. Bertin de Vaux, one of the deceased prince's orderly officers, and M Chomel, who was his royal highness's first physician, set out for Plombieres, where the Duchess of Orleans is taking the waters. Amidst all their own affliction, during this disastrous day the thought of the deprivation sustained by this unfortunate princess was never out of the minds of her royal relations, and her name was repeatedly invoked in their lamentations. At length it was resolved that the Duchess de Nemours and the Princess Clementine should go to her with letters from the King and Queen. Their royal highnesses commenced their journey at nine o'clock, attended by Mademoiselle Angelet and General de Rumigny. At ten o'clock the Duc d'Aumale, accompanied by the Count de Mornay-on, who was one of the prince royal's aides-de-camp, went to the Pavilion Marsan, and, in obedience to an order from the King, put seals upon all the deceased's papers. Commandant Larue, one of his Majesty's orderly officers, was sent off to the Chateau d'Eu, to bring back the Comte de Paris and the Duke de Chartres, who had been sent there for the bathing season. At eleven o'clock last night the Duke d'Aumale returned to the palace at Neuilly, and there remains, as well as the Duke de Montpensier. One courier was despatched to the Duke de Nemours, and another to Toulon, with orders for a steamer to be despatched to the coast of Sicily, where it is believed the squadron of Admiral Hugon now is, and consequently the Prince de Joinville will be found.

After the above full and minute details, little more remains to be said at present on this astounding occurrence: and, indeed, from other sources we have only been able to glean the following: When the Prince Royal first perceived that the postilion had lost all command over the horses, he stood up in the carriage, and looked with earnest attention along the road before him; but, seeing the road clear, he sat quietly down again; but, rising once more, after running about 150 yards, and observing that his valet, who was in the seat behind, had disappeared, and probably fearing that the man had been thrown off by the violence of the motion, his royal highness took the resolution of getting out. When taken up the royal Duke was found to have a severe contusion on the left temple, and several wounds on his legs. The blood was flowing from his mouth and nose, and even from his eyes. When examined by the surgeons and other medical men called to him, a fracture in the skull was discovered, and left little or no hope. The words which the Prince uttered in German, and which are alluded to above, are said to have been—"Shut the door, there is a fire."

The following letter from Plombieres of July 11, giving an account of the calm and tranquil manner in which the Duchess of Orleans receives her time, is interesting, from the strong contrast it presents to the agony which must take possession of the mind of the unhappy duchess on receiving the intelligence, dreadful in itself, but awfully terrible from its suddenness of her beloved husband's death:—"Her royal highness (says the letter) has derived benefit from the baths of Plombieres. She walks out daily, and the inhabitants, though delighted to see her without attendants or guard quietly passing through the streets, have the delicacy to allow her to pass without indulging unbecoming curiosity. She has visited the principal shops of the place, and made several purchases of the polished steel goods, for which the manufacture of the town is deservedly famous. Her royal highness has also been to see the Stanislaus Hospital, founded by the good king whose name it bears, and expressed her satisfaction at the state in which it is kept. There is every reason to hope that her royal highness's health will soon be perfectly restored. Her affability and charity make her nearly adored here."

In consequence of the melancholy accident which has thrown so much gloom over the capital, orders have been given to suspend for the present the preparations in the Champs Elysées for the fêtes of July.

OFFICIAL ORDERS FOR MOURNING.

The royal family went into mourning for four months.

The following order of the day to the army has been published:

"The King and France are plunged into grief. His Royal Highness the Duke of Orleans expired yesterday, in consequence of a fall from his carriage. The army will share this grief. It will deplore the loss of the prince, the hope of his country, as he was the hope of the army, the more bitterly, inasmuch as he took part in the fatigues and dangers of the soldiery, whom he loved, and to whom he manifested frequent marks of his solicitude, as well as an example of all military virtues—of excellence in command, and the most striking bravery. Mourning will be immediately worn by the army until further orders. Crape will be placed on the colours and standards;

THE LAST MOMENTS.

the drums will be covered with black serge; crape and mufflers will be affixed to the trumpets. Officers will wear crape on their swords. The cruel event which France so much deplores, will excite the devotedness of the army, and will tighten the bonds which unite it to the King and his august family.

(Signed) Marshal Duke of DALMATIE,
"Paris, July 14." "President of the Council and Minister of War.

EMBALMENT OF THE BODY.

(From the Débats of Saturday,

Dr. Pasquier, first surgeon of the prince royal, assisted by M. Pasquier, his father, who is first surgeon to the King, and Messrs. Fauquier, Auvity, Moreau, Blandin, Blache, Destouches, Sauvé, and Sequin, the eminent physicians and surgeons, proceeded yesterday, in the presence of General Baron Athalin, the King's aide-de-camp, specially delegated by his Majesty to perform the autopsy of the body of the Duke of Orleans. It commenced at seven in the morning, and lasted till eleven. The results were:—First, that the death of the prince was caused by a fracture of the posterior part of the skull, extending from one ear to the other, and ascending to the frontal bone, which was almost entirely severed from the head. Secondly, that all the other organs of his Royal Highness were perfectly sound, and in such a state of preservation, as to admit of a belief that the prince, whose constitution was excellent, and whose mode of living was admirably regulated, would have lived to a great age. Another result from the autopsy is a conviction in the minds of the faculty that the head of the prince had sustained all the force of the fall, as no other part of his Royal Highness's person was seriously injured; and hence they infer that he did not jump out of his carriage, but was thrown out suddenly by some violent shock while he was standing up. A procès-verbal of this delicate operation will, of course, be drawn up in due form, and will probably be made public. When the autopsy was completed, the process of embalment was performed by the same medical commission. This occupied five hours more, being perfected by half-past five in the afternoon. At that hour Baron Athalin called in all the household officers of the King and princes then at Neuilly, to be present at and verify the depositing of the remains of the defunct in the coffin prepared to receive them.

SATURDAY, July 16.—The Duchess of Orleans arrived to-day, at noon, from Plombieres. On the road between Epinal and Neufchateau, M. Barten de Veaux, the prince's aide-de-camp, met the duchess's carriage. When her Royal Highness saw him her emotion could not be controlled. She said, "I understand he is dead!" From that moment she gave herself up to dispare, and would receive no consolation. After passing Mercœurt, the Duchess of Weimar and the Princess Clementine were met—she had letters to the duchess from the King and Queen. A most distressing interview ensued. The Duchess of Orleans had a succession of fainting fits. The unfortunate sisters went direct to Neuilly, where the Duchess again became insensible, when she was embraced by the royal parents. It was only at three o'clock this afternoon that she came to her senses, and the royal family is still with her. At half-past three her children were brought to her, and she then was relieved by abundant tears.

(From the Paris Papers of Monday.)

The King and Queen of the Belgians arrived at Neuilly last evening at half-past six o'clock. Their Majesties alighted at the Petit Château, and were received at the door by the King, Queen, Duchess of Orleans, and the rest of the Royal family, to whom the mournful meeting was confined. Their Majesties conducted their august daughter into the chapel, and there remained with her a considerable time. The whole afflicted family then assembled in the Queen's apartments, and there remained till they all retired for the night. The Prince de Joinville is now the only person wanting to complete the family meeting, and he is expected by the end of the month. The Royal family attended divine service in the chapel at nine o'clock yesterday morning.

The Débats says:—"By the King's desire not only the plan of the house in which the Prince Royal breathed his last sigh, but that of a considerable plot of ground immediately adjoining it, has been laid by the Count de Montalivet before his Majesty, who, as we have already announced, intends to erect a chapel upon it, in commemoration of the deplored accident of the 13th inst."

Yesterday, about twelve o'clock, a calèche, containing three persons, was violently overturned at the same spot that proved fatal to the Duke of Orleans. The three persons were carried in a dreadful state to a café near the Porte Maillot. The calèche was broken to pieces, and the horses precipitated themselves over a flight of eight steps into the court-yard of a neighbouring house.

Preparations for the funeral of the Prince Royal are already begun. The hangings will be of purple and gold, similar to those used at the Invalides on the translation of the remains of Napoleon. They will be upon the most magnificent scale. M. Auber is said to be engaged to compose the grand funeral march to be performed on this sadly solemn occasion.

The Gazette des Tribunaux says—"The house in which the Duke of Orleans expired was shut up on the following day by order of the authorities, but M. Cordier, the tenant, notwithstanding, permitted several persons to view the room. This, however, is now finally prevented. Several persons from the Palace went on Saturday, and made a minute plan of the room, marking the precise position of every article it contained, of which a correct inventory was taken. M. Cordier wished to take away a scythe that hung against the wall, but was so earnestly entreated not to do so that he left it. The Queen, it is said, has expressed her desire to have a building, precisely representing this chamber of death, erected at Neuilly, as a memorial of the fatal event. The whole house has been purchased of the landlord. It is to be pulled down, and a chapel is to be erected on its site."

A CURIOUS COINCIDENCE.—A correspondent has sent us the following dates, which have excited some alarm among the credulous:

1791 Fall of Robespierre.
1, 7, 9, 4 } To which add 1794, gives 1815.
1815 Fall of Napoleon.
1, 8, 1, 5 } To which add 1815, gives 1830.
1830 Fall of Charles X.
1, 8, 3, 0 } To which add 1830, gives 1842.

The calculation first appeared in the French Prophetic Almanack of 1841, a sort of Francis Moore; the copy from which we print has been a year and a half in our possession. The next great change, according to this calculation, will be in 1857.

IMPORTANT TO INCOME-TAX PAYERS.—It may be some consolation for those persons who are to be assessed under Schedule D, that they are not obliged to submit themselves to local commissioners, as, under the 31st section of the act, they can deliver their returns sealed, directed to the special commissioners (which cannot be opened either by the general or assistant commissioners), and, upon the amount being determined by them, they can give a certificate to the appellant, so that he may pay his assessment quarterly, under some letter or number, without his name being mentioned.

Last week a gang of highwaymen were captured by a posse of police in a cave in Epping Forest, which, it appears, they had constructed and inhabited for some time past. A correspondent very pertinently inquires, "What has become of the lord warden, master keepers, verderers, reeves, regarders, under keepers, &c. &c., the faithful discharge of whose duties would seem to render such an occurrence impossible? An enormous staff, and, as I believe, at a considerable expense to the public, is appointed to guard the various rights of the Crown and its subjects, as well as for the purposes of police, upon the forest."

BRAZILIAN SUGAR USED FOR MANURE.—Mr. J. B. Moore, an alderman of Liverpool, and the principal partner in a commercial house of long standing in the Brazil trade, has memorialised Government to admit Brazil sugar for agricultural purposes, or, in other words, to manure the land with, and feed swine and calves! The petition states that one great objection to its being tried on an extensive scale has been the great cost; but, since the introduction of nitrate of soda, which sells at £20 per ton, and the guano manure, which is sellling at £16 per ton, this objection has been removed, inasmuch as foreign sugar may now be obtained for less cost than nitrate of soda or guano—say at from 14s. to 15s. per cwt., or about 1½d. per pound. The reply from the Board of Trade was, that they could not recommend any such partial admission of foreign sugar.

Critics must excuse me, if I compare them to certain animals called apes, who, by gnawing vines, originally taught the great advantage of pruning them.—Shenstone.

Socrates called beauty a short-lived tyranny; Plato, a privilege of nature: Domitian said that nothing was more grateful. Aristotle affirmed that beauty was better than all the letters of recommendation in the world. Homer, that it was a glorious gift of nature; and Ovid, alluding to it, calls it a favour bestowed by the gods.

Wine heightens indifference into love, love into jealousy, and jealousy into madness. It often turns the good-natured man into an idiot, and the choleric man into an assassin. It gives bitterness to resentment, it makes vanity insupportable, and displays every little spot of the soul in its utmost deformity.—Addison.

THE THEATRES.

THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

The Rose of Arragon has been withdrawn, on account of the termination of Mr. and Mrs. Kean's present engagement, and the management have fallen back on the old comedies, with the excellent representation of which this little theatre has always been identified. On Monday the School for Scandal, the comedy, par excellence, of the English stage, was played with a very efficient cast, and appeared to be as heartily enjoyed by the audience as if to its sterling merit had been added the charm of novelty.

ENGLISH OPERA HOUSE.

"Cousin Lambkin" has not yet made his début "on account of the indisposition of a principal performer." The only novelty, therefore, has been a grand pas-seul, ballet, entitled, Grisella, Dancing Maid. It is intended as a parody upon Giselle, but, the only praise we can accord it is, that it served to introduce Signor Ozbenini, as the principal dancer. Let the salutatory artistes at Her Majesty's Theatre take care of their laurels; we look in vain for a rival to him, amongst his own sex—he is a male Cerito! On Wednesday evening the performances were the Exile, Day after the Wedding, Deaf as a Post, and Grisella, for the benefit of Mr. J. Vining, the stage-manager. The house was well attended.

NEW STRAND THEATRE.

The "frolicking fairies" have vanished, and Mrs. Keeley is again "playing the devil" at this little theatre. It appears of no consequence whether she is a good or an evil spirit, the public yield to her fascination, and the manager's Lucky Stars predominate. Not satisfied, however, with his present overflowing houses, he announces Legerdemain, or the Conjurer's Wife. As he appears so thoroughly imbued with theatrical magic—perhaps by some supernatural agency, or "sleight of hand," he intends enlarging the theatre, to accommodate the crowds who, at present, are unable to gain admission.

ROYAL SURREY THEATRE.

At Exeter-hall we have singing for the million; at the Surrey Theatre we have not only "singing," but "acting" for the million. Donizetti's opera of the Love Spell, or Bellini's opera of La Sonnambula, with Shakspeare's tragedy of Macbeth, and all for the small charge of "sixpence!" Government ought to grant the manager a patent "for providing cheap and the amusement of the people." The operas are played with the strongest cast of English singers in London; and if we cannot pay so high a compliment to the tragedy, we should recollect that, although they are not the "tragedians of the city," they are better entertainers on the other side of the water; and if now and then deficient in portraying the nicer subtleties of our great bard, give every effect to those passages which admit the display of physical energy. Macready might envy the really "rapturous" applause bestowed on the combat—"Bravo Hughes!" "Bravo, Hicks!"

THE LADY'S DREAM.

By Thomas Hood.

" Of all the hearts that daily break,
Of the tears that hourly fall,
Of the many, many troubles of life,
What grieve this earthly ball—
Disease and Hunger, and Pain and Want,
But now I dreamt of them all!

" For the blind and cripple were there,
And the babe that pined for bread,
And the houseless man, and the widow poor
Who begg'd to bury the dead:
The naked, alas, that I might have clad,
The famished I might have fed!

" The sorrow I might have soothed,
And the unregarded tears;
For many a thronging shape was there,
From long-forgotten years:
Ay, even the poor rejected Moor,
Who raised my childish fears!

" Each pleading look, that long ago
I scann'd with heedless eye,
Each face as plain as plainly there,
As when I passed it by;
Woe, woe for me if the past should be
Thus present when I die!

" No need of sulphurous lake,
Nor need of fiery coal,
But only that crowd of human kind
Who wanted pity and dole—
In everlasting retrospect—
To thrill my sinful soul!

" Alas! I have walked through life
Too heedless where I trod;
Nay, helping to trample my fellow worm,
And fill the burial sod—
Forgetting that even the sparrow falls
Not unmark'd of God!

" I drank the richest draughts;
And ate whatever is good—
Fish, and flesh, and fowl, and fruit,
Supplied my hungry mood;
But I never remember'd the wretched ones
That starve for want of food.

" I dress'd as the noble dress
In cloth of silver and gold,
With silk and satin, and costly furs,
In many a sable fold;
But I never remember'd the naked limbs
That froze with the winter's cold.

" The wounds I might have heal'd!
The human sorrow and smart!
And yet it was not given in my soul
To play so ill a part;
But evil is wrought by want of Thought,
As well as want of Heart!"

She clasp'd her fervent hands,
And the cold tears down stream;
Large, and bitter, and fast they fell,
Remorse was so extreme;
And yet, oh yet, that many a dame
Would dream the Lady's Dream!

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.—Tuesday, July 19.

(Before Commissioner Sir G. F. Williams.)

EX-PARTE COOKE AND GLADSTANES IN RE HITCHCOCK.

The public will remember that, in the case of Wm. Hitchcock, who carried on the business of a linen-draper in Regent-street, and Cooke and Gladstanes had against his estate by Cooke and Gladstanes to a considerable amount. It appeared that, before the bankruptcy, Wm. Hitchcock, wishing to obtain extended credit from Cooke and Gladstanes, was refused, unless he gave the security of his brother, who was one of the firm of Hitchcock and Rogers, of St. Paul's Churchyard, and the which being agreed to, W. Hitchcock obtained the desired extent of credit, to the amount of £7000. It was stated, during the bankruptcy examination of William Hitchcock, that his brother, who had become security for him in the sum claimed by Cooke and Gladstanes, had obtained a lien upon the bankrupt's premises, &c., for the full amount of his guaranty, and Cooke and Gladstanes had recently filed an affidavit in this court stating that the brother of the bankrupt was indebted to them in the sum of £7000, and he was therefore called upon, in pursuance of the terms of the statute 1 and 2 Vic., c. 110, s. 8, to put in affidavit of such sureties as he intended to offer, with twenty-four hours' notice of their sufficiency, the act requiring personal appearance, but merely affidavits of their sufficiency—These affidavits were to be put in, and not being [illegible] were at once admitted.

The trial as to the legality of the debt, or quasi-debt given, by the bankrupt's brother to Messrs Cooke and Gladstanes, by the [illegible] fixed to take place at Guildford, on the 22d inst.

PREROGATIVE COURT [illegible], July 19.

(Before Sir H [illegible].

ELLIOT v. [illegible].

The deceased in this case was the Rev. [illegible] Henry Masterman, and the only remonstrance connected with his life, which [illegible] any bearing on the [illegible] suit is that having made a will, he obtained two attesting witnesses, from whom, however, by folding up the paper in a particular manner, he concealed his own signature. He subsequently took the paper to a third attesting witness, acknowledged to him his signature, and he attested it; and the question now was, whether this was a sufficient acknowledgment under the new Will Act.—Sir H. J. Fust deciding that it was not.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS' COURT.—Tuesday, July 19.

The Hon. Lionel Massey, who was said to be related to a noble Irish family, applied to be discharged under the act.—Mr. Cooke and Mr. Woodruffe supported the application, to which no opposition was made.

IN THE MATTER OF JOHN COATES.—PRO AND CON.

This was a country ball case, in which the attorney for the insolvent was to oppose on the part of the detaining creditor.

The Chief Commissioner said it was singular for an attorney to appear on both sides.—Mr. Cooke remarked that it was somewhat common in large agency offices.

The opposition was allowed, and the same attorney who obtained the order successfully resisted the application.—The bail was rejected.

The court sat till past five o'clock.

ASSIZE INTELLIGENCE.

HOME CIRCUIT.—Maidstone, July 16.

(Nisi Prius Court, before Lord Abinger.)

BURTON V. STEVENSON AND OTHERS.—JETTIES ON THE THAMES.

This was an action to recover damages for an injury sustained by the plaintiff, in consequence of the defendant's vessel having run foul of a jetty at Northfleet, and partly destroyed a house erected on it.—For the plaintiff, Mr. Sergeant Gaselee and Mr. Bosanquet; for the defendants, Mr. Platt and Mr. Peacock.—The defendants pleaded that they had not only not been guilty of any negligence, but that they were quite justified in knocking down the plaintiff's jetty, inasmuch as it was an obstruction to the navigation.—Lord Abinger left it to the jury to say whether they considered the erection in question a nuisance or not. He was of opinion that inasmuch as there was clearly depth of water sufficient to allow vessels to pass over the jetty, if the jetty were in the way, the jetty was an obstruction to the navigation, and that the plaintiff had no right to complain of any injury he might sustain by ships running against it. The jury immediately returned a verdict for the defendants.

OXFORD CIRCUIT.—Worcester, July 18.

(Before Mr. Baron Gurney.)

Matthew Lee and James Lee were charged with highway robbery. Mr. Keating conducted the prosecution. The prisoners were undefended. From the evidence of the prosecutor, named Henry Clemson, it appeared that on the previous Thursday, the prisoners overtook him on the road and asked for money, with threatening gestures, and finally one of them snapped up before him, and engaged his attention, while the other took his hand into his pocket, and abstracted some money therefrom. At the same instant the witness perceived two men, Hall and Prescot, coming up, and the prisoners ran away, were pursued, and captured. It appeared that the prisoners had shortly given the prosecutor's beer, when they solicited him for alms.—The prisoners made a long rambling statement, and endeavoured to prove that the prosecutor was drunk at the time; one of the men then made an objection to the indictment, alleging that the occurrence had taken place in Oxfordshire, and not in Worcestershire. One of the men repeated several times, with much vehemence, that he was "sold like a bullock in Smithfield, and that the case was manufactured by the witnesses and police solely to get the county 'wages' (allowances) for appearing against them."—The jury, after deliberating together a few moments, to the surprise of every one who heard the trial, acquitted the men of felony, and found them guilty of the common assault only, upon which they were sentenced to one month's imprisonment.

NORTHERN CIRCUIT.—Newcastle-upon-Tyne, July 14.

(Before Lord Denman.)

Robbery by a Police Constable.—Robert Leslie, aged 30, was indicted for a burglary in the house of Robert Leadbitter, Esq., and stealing some silver candlesticks and two silver snuff-boxes. The case having been clearly proved against the prisoner, his lordship having summed up, the jury immediately returned a verdict of guilty.—His lordship, in passing sentence, said he thought this one of the very worst cases that had ever come before him. The prisoner had been taken out of the good character he had obtained, and the responsible office in which he had been placed by means of false and fictitious character, for the purpose of plundering the party whose property was under his guardianship, and then of throwing the suspicion of the act upon the innocent servants of the person whom he had robbed. It was a case calling for the severest punishments which the law allowed, and he should sentence the prisoner to be transported for the period of fifteen years.

POLICE.

Mansion house.—On Monday a young man named Thomas Fisher, was brought before the Lord Mayor, charged with having attempted to pluck out the eye of John Ogle. The complainant and defendant are both young men, of that class who are in the habit of waiting in the neighbourhood of steam vessels, and thrusting newspapers in at the doors and windows of omnibuses and other vehicles, with loud eulogiums upon their contents. The defendant, it appeared, was not content with being more boisterous and eloquent in favour of his own commodities, but repeatedly challenged the other to fight for £10, and thus decide the right, which each claimed, to the most lucrative business of London-bridge. The defendant, finding that his antagonist preferred the legitimate way of doing business, sought various other means of provoking him, and trembled him and his newspapers into the kennel, but in performing that feat got floored himself, and, while both were on the ground, endeavouring to gouge or pluck out the eye of Mr. Ogle. Mr. Fisher declared that Mr. Ogle had shown a very paltry spirit of revenge, unsuited to the character of an honourable trader of intelligence.—A policeman described the conduct of Mr. Fisher as that of a most savage and unnatural ruffian.—The Lord Mayor held Mr. Fisher to bail for this very unmanly assault, and said, "I dare say you (Mr. Ogle) will have the additional satisfaction of distributing information to that effect to-morrow morning amongst hundreds of her Majesty's subjects." (Laughter.)—Committed in default of bail.

Guildhall.—On Wednesday a further investigation was made by Sir Peter Laurie into the affairs of the Westminster Loan and Investment Company and Savings' Bank, in Adam-street, Adelphi. Mr. Clarkson, the barrister, attended on behalf of Mr. Smith, of Golden square, solicitor, to assure the magistrate that he had no connexion with the company, except as being applied to by Mr. Nicholls to wind up the affairs, and bond fide taking some steps for that purpose as a professional man, to see what could be done for the benefit of the creditors.—Mr Wells, a barrister, who appeared with Mr. Nicholls, the manager of the company, admitted this was strictly true.—Sir Peter asked whether he would be wise if he threw up the business to-morrow. Sir Peter asked when he began to wind up.—Mr. Clarkson said in the course of last month.—Sir Peter said he wanted the people who had been duped to get their money back.—Mr. Wells said there was no doubt of that, and so would the creditors of Messrs. Wigney's bank, or Messrs. Wrights's, or any other broken bank, which breakings always produced individual cases of great suffering and seeming severity. Sir Peter, developing cases of undoubted villany in the West Middlesex Company, but he must beware of prejudice, and of assuming every case to that, when, in fact, in the case now before him, there was nothing a disguised from the manager of Meadows's or Wright's, or any other bank. Sir Peter had had some stress on his client having changed his name, and that a principal object was to explain that by producing the warrant of King William IV. to do so, on account of some of his ancestors having borne that name. He produced his Majesty's sign manual and license, dated in the year 1831. In answer to Sir Peter Laurie, Mr. Nicholls said he had been presented at court by Lord Falmouth, and that had cost him £6.0 He have no name changed. Four or five persons presented themselves as sufferers by the Investment Company.—George Parr, of No. 5, Norwich-court, East Smithfield, stated that on the 22nd of February he placed £30 in the savings bank, and £27 in the banking department. He saw Mr. Smith, the company's solicitor, on Monday. He said he [illegible] amounted to £4000, and that he contemplated instituting proceedings against Mr. C. O'Brien, but they could not be commenced till November. Mr. Williams took his money at the Savings' Bank.—Mr. Peppercorn said he had been induced, by seeing the high names of the Hon. Mr. Byng and others, to deposit £100 in the bank. He had been referred to Mr. Smith, the solicitor, who said he could not tell him anything about it.—Cross-examined by Mr. Wells: Was not attracted by the largeness of the interest. He was getting more on his investment elsewhere.—A Mr. Holbrook said he had deposited £140 in the bank, having Bridgeman and O'Brien to be honourable and wealthy men. When he afterwards became alarmed at the observation made on the bank, he went to William Lane. He was told the application must be laid before the board of [illegible]. On Tuesday he was told there had not been a full board, but there would certainly be one on Thursday. He went on that day and found the bank closed. There had been a meeting of shareholders, but instead of rescuing your stand he done, they quarrelled and separated.—Cross-examined by Mr Nicholls: You depended on the faith of Mr. O'Brien?—Witness: Aye, coupled with your name. I paid £50 into the bank shortly before it stopped. If they wanted to see what could be done for the bank, they had better not wind it up in its passion or their money in law.—Sir Peter observed that nothing could be more distressful than the trickery of public meetings. He should like to know who the John Grady, Esq., was, who spoke three columns of a weekly newspaper in praise of the Investment Company. [illegible] compared in some way Mr. Nicholls with Lord Brougham.—Mr. Wells reminded the magistrate for the purpose of showing that there were no facts connected with the breaking up of this establishment to distinguish it in criminality from the ordinary stoppages of banking-houses.—Mr. Nicholls, who seemed to be in good spirits, and once exclaimed that this was a glorious day for him, contrived a compliment from Sir Peter for the readiness with which he had attended this hearing.—Sir Peter, however, was not disposed to say anything of the sort.—The hearing was adjourned till Wednesday next.

Marlborough-street.—On Monday, Richard Charles Savage, a "gentleman" of large property, residing a [illegible] Wells-street, St. John's-wood, was brought before Mr Rawlinson, at the instance of Charles Wheeler, secretary to the "Loyles' Association for the more effectual Suppression of Cruelty to Animals," charged with habitually driving horses [illegible] of the facts, Mr. Rawlinson [illegible] signalized the conduct of defendant as most cruel, and inflicted upon him the penalty of 40s., at the same time expressing his regret that it was not in his power to fine him in a much higher amount.—The money was immediately paid by the defendant, who said that he should make his barrens-maker pay the sum he was out of pocket owing to the proceedings which had been instituted against him.

Clerkenwell, Tuesday.—An elderly man named Lechard Legge, decently attired in black, was held to bail at this office to answer a charge made against him of purloining a lady's cambric pocket-handkerchief from a pew in Trinity Church, Cloudesley-square, Islington.—Mr. Street, the pew-opener, said that scarcely a day had passed on which divine service was performed without numerous robberies of books being committed, and the utmost vigilance of the attendants was insufficient to prevent or detect the thieves.

Mr. Thomas St. George Ispter, a gentleman of fortune, residing at 39, Adelaide-place, St. Pancras, appeared on a warrant to answer a charge of assault preferred against him by William Linwood, conductor of a Paddington omnibus, 1063, badge 865. After hearing the witnesses on both sides, Mr. Combe said the evidence was certainly most perplexing and contradictory. He had no doubt in his own mind, and could not conceal his sentiments, that the prosecutor had, and he (Mr. Combe) himself was almost a daily witness of the abominable and dangerous nuisance of omnibus racing, particularly along the New road. Under these circumstances, he should merely fine Mr. Ipster 1s. and the costs.

The "Protective" Force.—Curious Results of a Charge of Felony.—As a policeman of the K division was passed at the bar, before Mr. Combe, charged by Mr. Vincent, the landlord of the King's Arms, Red Lion-passage, Red Lion-square, with having stolen a glass tumbler, value 1s.—It appeared from the evidence of the prosecutor, that the prisoner entered his house with another man, and called for several quartens of gin, and subsequently a glass of glazier-beer, which was served to him by the prosecutor's son. On leaving the house he was observed by a person in the company to put the tumbler into his pocket, and suspecting that he intended to steal it, the circumstance was communicated to the prosecutor, who, knowing that the prisoner lived in the neighbourhood of Portman-square, instantly pursued him with a friend, and found him in a public-house. He taxed him with the theft, and he took the tumbler out of his pocket, threw it away violently, smashed it, and then said, "D— you, now swear to that." The prosecutor gave him into custody.—Mr. Combe remanded the prisoner, and asked the prosecutor into custody to know what he was to do with the other glass that was found upon the prisoner?—Mr. Clarkson and the prisoner's solicitor had entered the court.—Mr. Combe inquired whether the other glass alluded to?—The officer said, that at the prisoner's first examination he said that this glass was given to him, and it belonged to the waiter at the Pomfret Arms. He (the officer) had since made inquiries, and found that the landlord of that house had absconded. [Surely there must be some mistake in the above report. If an ex-policeman's respectability be a sufficient answer to a positive and direct charge of felony, there must be a tremendous surplus in the atmosphere of Scotland-yard. Most certainly, had a common pot-stealer stood in the prisoner's shoes, and had the Licensed Victuallers' Protection Society prosecuted, the case would have inevitably found its way to the Old Bailey.—Ed. I. L. N.]

Queen-square.—James Barnet, a mechanic, was summarily convicted of indecently assaulting two respectable married females, in the Broadway, Westminster, and was sentenced to one month's imprisonment and hard labour.

Marlborough-street.—Another examination of Richard Hanley, whose real name is Richard Manley, for stealing, and Edward Guiford and Sarah Ann Hunt, for receiving 1000 sovereigns and other property, took place on Wednesday before Mr. Maltby. Notwithstanding the full publicity given to this case, and the statement that quantities of every description of valuable property have been found, the prisoner, if not all, of which is undeniably the process of fraud or felony, a very small part has found owners as yet. A number of witnesses were examined who were found over to prosecute. The police having stated they would most likely be able to bring more cases, the prisoners were remanded for a week.

A very handsome young woman, who gave the name of Sarah Howell, but whose real name was Davis, was put to the bar with Manley, charged with having obtained a considerable quantity of goods under false pretences.—Mr. Maltby having heard all the circumstances connected with the case, said it was a matter of trust, and he could not entertain the charge. The woman was liberate., and Manley was remanded

Greenwich.—On Tuesday Dennis Clement was placed at the bar before Mr. Jeremy, on the charge of wounding Sarah Bridget Hollowey, a woman with whom he resided, at a house in Smith's-rents, Greenwich. It appeared by the evidence of Sophia Vincent, who lived in an adjoining tenement, that she heard cries of "murder" about one o'clock on the morning of Sunday, the 10th of July; that she had subsequently seen the deceased, who complained that the prisoner Clement had given her a great beating, and she was sure that he had given her "her death blow." Susan Smith, the wife of a shoemaker, gave similar testimony. Mr. Mitchell and Mr. Burrage, surgeons, deposed that the fourth, fifth, and sixth ribs had been fractured, and that the polished and rugged ends, of the fifth and sixth rib had separated the intercostal muscles and integuments, which was the proximate cause of the deceased's death, but which they had not the slightest doubt had been done by violence.—Mr. Jeremy having cautioned the prisoner, Clement said that he did not know the cause of the injuries the deceased had received—that she had lived with him as his wife, and that he always treated her well; but that she was in the habit of getting drunk and falling about. Mr. Jeremy fully committed Clement for trial at the next Central Criminal Court, notwithstanding the summons Mr. Carter issued for the appearance of the prisoner at the inquest.

CORONERS' INQUESTS.

Death in the Tothill-fields Prison.—On Monday afternoon, Mr. Higgs held an inquest in Tothill-fields prison, on the body of Samuel Lasmuit, aged 26, and lately a messenger in the employment of Sir H. Meux and Co. Mr. Thomas Kirby, clerk of the prison, said deceased had been convicted of felony on the 4th of April, and sentenced to two years' imprisonment. On the 15th ult. he complained of illness, and on examination, he was placed in the infirmary, and was subsequently attacked by cough and diarrhœa. He gradually sank, and died on Friday evening of general decline. Witness had no doubt that his lungs were tuberculated, now that he had ceased of the inveterate disease. He was too weak for an operation, and witness had intended to recommend him for pardon to the Home Secretary of State on medical grounds.—Verdict, "Natural death."

Suicide of a Jewish Butcher.—Great excitement was produced amongst the Jewish community last Saturday in consequence of a member of their body, named David Levy, an orange dealer, aged 50, having committed suicide. On Friday last he was attended with fever at his house and the fruit sales, which he constantly attended, and on close search being made for him towards evening he was found hanging dead behind his bed-room door. On his bed were found an open prayer-book, a new pair of trousers, and some salt, and a phial that had contained laudanum. The jury having been satisfied that the man hanged himself, and that death resulted from his having done so, and not from poison, returned a verdict, "That deceased destroyed himself whilst temporarily insane."

Death of an Old Pensioner by Choking.—On Monday an inquest was held at the Royal Hospital, Chelsea, on view of the body of Thomas Green, aged 65, a pensioner. Elizabeth Neale, matron of the infirmary, stated that the deceased, who was very infirm, enjoyed pretty good health and was able to go about with the aid of a stick. He was of very great habits, and ate his food very quickly. On Friday last he was at dinner, which consisted of roast mutton and potatoes. When putting a piece of meat into his mouth, he endeavoured to "bolt" it, but it stuck in his throat. Witness struck him on the back in an instant, and with it, running up to him, tried to force it down with a spoon, but was unable to move it. The deceased died in less than five minutes. Corroborative testimony having been given, after a few observations from the coroner on the speedy propensities so frequently portrayed by aged people, the jury returned a verdict of "Accidental death."

Murder at Peckham-rye.—On Tuesday evening a lengthened inquiry was gone into at St. Thomas's Hospital, before Mr. Payne, city coroner, concerning the death of James White, a farm labourer, aged 59, in the employ of Messrs. Noble and Mee, of Peckham-rye, which was occasioned by a fellow workman on the morning of Wednesday last, weltering in his blood, in a barn on the premises of the above-named gentleman. The deceased was sensible when found, but unable to speak; he has received a severe wound in the head from a sharp instrument; but was unable to tell by whom it was done. He was conveyed to St. Thomas's Hospital, where he died on the Monday, from the injuries he received. The police having made an examination of the premises, and investigated the circumstances, suspicion fell upon another labourer in the same employ, named William Webb. Not being able to give a satisfactory account of his time for two hours on the night of Tuesday, prior to the discovery of the wounded man, he was arrested, and has remained in custody to await the result of the injuries inflicted on White. A number of witnesses having been examined, the coroner summed up, after deliberation, the jury returned a verdict of wilful murder against Webb, and he was committed to Horsemonger-lane gaol to take his trial.

Caution to Bathers.—An inquest was held on Tuesday before Mr. Baker, at the Gunmakers' Arms, Mile-end Old Town, on the body of Charles Godfrey, aged ten years. From the evidence adduced it appeared that on Monday forenoon deceased, together with several other boys, went into a pond on Bow-common, for the purpose of bathing. He had not been in the water more than five minutes when the enemy seized him, and finding he was sinking, he clung to one of his companions who was near him, for the purpose of saving himself. They both went under water together; and on their making their appearance on the surface, a boy named John Notter, who was standing on the bank, jumped into the water, and managed to rescue the poor lad deceased had laid hold of, and accordingly saved him [illegible]. Deceased then went down, and his body was recovered in half an hour, quite dead. Verdict—"Accidentally

PROVINCIAL.

GOVERNMENT AND THE STRATHBOGIE MINISTERS.—It appears that Government have now taken the persecuted members of the Strathbogie Presbytery under their protection. The Moderator has received a letter from Sir J. Graham, intimating to the majority of that Presbytery, that they would be protected in all their rights and privileges; and that in any legal measures they were forced to have recourse to, they must apply to the Crown agent, who had directions to do whatever was requisite for their interests.—Fife Journal.

THE DISTURBANCES IN THE POTTERIES.—A correspondent of the Times who writes from Hanley, and dates his letter Monday, July 18, states, that the turn-out for a temporary reduction of wages, instead of being, as represented, an event leading to an incipient national revolution, is one of ordinary occurrence, aggravated by the interference of the agents of the Anti-Corn-law League and the Chartists. At Newcastle-under-Lyme detachments of the Cheshire and Staffordshire Yeomanry Cavalry were quartered in all parts of the town and neighbourhood; but beyond this exhibition, somewhat similar to the annual show of the yeomanry in a country town, there did not appear to be the slightest indication of disturbance. The only evidence indicating alarm was the encampment of the military on the Pottery race-course. The novelty of this exhibition, more than any other cause, appeared to attract the attention of the work-people in the neighbourhood. The warlike fires lit up around the encampment presented a very picturesque appearance. In Hanley groups of the unemployed were assembled at the corners of the streets. The most serious event to be dreaded is the non-employed of the potters—a certain contingency, should the colliers continue their turn-out for many days longer. By such an event at least forty thousand persons would be thrown out of employ. At Stoke the turn-out that has taken place appears to have been caused, according to equally good authority, in consequence of the reduction of wages, by Mr. Sparrow, of 10*d.* per day with an increased number of hours of labour; and upon a refusal of the men to comply, his establishments were closed, without the accustomed notice of a fortnight having been given to the men.

Another correspondent, who writes from Newcastle-under-Lyme, dated Tuesday, the 19th, states that, after quitting Stoke yesterday afternoon, knowing that a great point of attraction amongst the working population would be the encampment of the military, I proceeded by way of Shelton, a most densely populated manufacturing district, to the Pottery race-course. On the way there were numerous parties of turn-outs, generally engaged in discussing their grievances, and the cause of the present unpleasant state of affairs. They appeared generally peaceably disposed, and many of them spoke in terms of respect of the great majority of the masters. The prevailing complaint was against the two establishments (those of Mr. Sparrow and Earl Granville) who proposed the reduction of the collier's wages, and the butty-system, as it existed to a great extent throughout the mining country. On arriving at the race-course I found some hundreds of the unemployed assembled to witness the manœuvres of the troops, with which they appeared to be considerably amused. Not the slightest expressions of disrespect escaped the multitude, but all appeared in the best humour. It was understood that Captain Powys, the Earl of Dartmouth, and other county magistrates, who, since the first outbreak, have been constantly on the spot, were at this time in close communication with the owners, butty-masters, and the leaders of the turn-out, with a view to an amicable arrangement. Indeed, there is little doubt, if the opinions of many of the most extensive potters and colliers are to be taken, that the proposed reduction of wages can hardly be justified by present circumstances. With two or three exceptions, the masters are willing to pay the old prices, but unfortunately the men object to return to any, unless they can upon the old terms return to their work at all the collieries. A meeting of the work-people was held in the market-place at Hanley, yesterday evening, and was attended by from 2000 to 3000 persons. The general committee of the turn-outs was held at a house in the neighbourhood, and their constituents waited in the public streets with great impatience to hear their report. About four o'clock, a workman who appeared the mouthpiece of the committee, stated in a few words the terms upon which they were prepared to meet the masters. They had within these few hours given the matter the best consideration, and were disposed to offer the following terms:—If the masters who paid the old wages of four shillings a day would engage not to supply with coal the potters hitherto supplied by Mr. Sparrow and Lord Granville, by this means only possibly present the cause

LITERATURE.

A Summer's Day at Windsor, and a Visit to Eton. By E. Jesse, Esq. John Murray, Albemarle-street.

We last week noticed the "Summer's Day at Hampton Court," by Mr. Jesse, and here we have the companion volume, which takes us to

"Thy forest, Windsor, and thy green retreats;
At once the monarch and the muses' seats;"

And the interest attached to the locality is of a kind to attract many a pilgrim to spend a "summer's day" in visiting the stately castle of which Mr. Jesse thus speaks:—

"There is no necessity for attempting to describe the feeling with which a stranger, and especially an Englishman, first gazes upon Windsor Castle. Strikingly beautiful in its situation, and intimately connected with some of the proudest events of our history, we approach it with mingled feelings of reverence and pleasure. 'It is a place,' says a modern writer, 'full of storied and poetical associations. The very external aspect of the proud old pile is enough to inspire high thought. It rears its irregular walls and massive towers, like a mural crown, round the brow of a lofty ridge, waves its royal banner in the clouds, and looks down, with a lordly air, upon the surrounding world.'

"As we approach, and actually tread its venerable courts, the feelings assume a more distinct shape, and insensibly suit themselves to the habits and disposition of the beholder. The young and light-hearted recall the time when its walls looked down upon the pomp and pageantry of the tournament; the politician regards it as the scene of many a dark intrigue; while the moralist, partaking perhaps the feelings of both, glances over the follies of successive generations, and smiles at the emptiness of human grandeur. Few places indeed can supply such high food for the poet or the philosopher. We gaze alike upon the birth-place and the tomb of many kings—their first and their last home. The very fabric itself is an emblem of the vanity of worldly power. At one moment we are traversing lofty galleries that have been honoured with the presence of the great; and the next we are hurried to the neighbouring chapel, and are told the objects of our admiration are resting beneath our feet.

"Windsor Castle has been the principal seat of British royalty for nearly eight centuries. Long, indeed, previous to the Conquest, the Saxon kings possessed a palace at old Windsor; from the winding of the river at which place, or rather shore, Camden and others have conjectured that it received its name, being styled by some of our old writers, Windleshora. The site of this palace cannot now be ascertained."

The account that follows this extract of the state of the castle under the monarchs by whom it was inhabited, from Edward the Confessor down to the present day, will be read with much interest. Next to the castle, the most attractive part of the building is the Chapel of St. George, of which we give the following description:—

"The earliest intimation that we have of a religious fabric having been erected on the site of the present chapel is in the reign of Henry the First. This building, which was dedicated to Edward the Confessor, was pulled down by Edward the Third, to make room for a more splendid edifice, and one which should be more worthy of the Order and College of St. George. This chapel, from the badness of the materials, having become greatly dilapidated, Edward the Fourth caused the present beautiful fabric to be commenced, and in the year 1474, appointed Richard Beauchamp, Bishop of Salisbury, to superintend its progress. This prelate, who was the first Chancellor of the Order of the Garter, having died before his work was completed, Sir Reginald Bray, Prime Minister to Henry the Seventh, was appointed to succeed him. This munificent knight, who, together with Beauchamp, is buried in the chapel, greatly embellished the choir and other parts of the fabric, and principally at his own expense.

"The interior of the chapel is divided by a screen and organ-gallery into two parts, the body of the chapel and the choir. It is impossible to enter the former without being struck with the elaborate workmanship of the architecture and the beauty of the large window. The ceiling, which is so justly admired, is executed with different devices, amongst which may be traced the arms of Edward the Confessor, Edward the Third, Edward the Black Prince, Henry the Sixth, Edward the Fourth, Henry the Seventh, &c.; the arms of France and England quartered, the holy cross, &c. Amongst these also may be traced the arms of many noble families, whose ancestors were Knights of the Garter.

"The Choir.—This part of the chapel is entered by a door in the centre of the screen already alluded to, when a most imposing sight bursts upon the view, deteriorated, however, by the modern window over the altar. With this exception, the whole of the interior is perfect. Over the stalls on each side hang the motionless banners of the Knights of the Garter; and beneath these again are the mantle, helmet, sword, and crest of their respective owners. In addition to this may be mentioned the marble floor, the rich and minute carving of the stalls and ceiling, the airy lightness of the building itself, and the splendid furniture of the altar. We must remember, too, that we stand upon the very spot where the greatest warriors and statesmen have stood before us; that here every King of England, from Edward the Third, has offered up his adorations; that we tread upon the dust of princes; and that thousands of the great and powerful, who once mingled here in the glittering pageant, are now mouldering beneath our feet. What an emblem have we before our eyes of the vanity of human ambition!—a warrior or a statesman dies, his banner is lowered from the walls, and, before it is replaced by that of another, he has become unlamented, and perhaps forgotten.

"The sovereign's stall is immediately on the right as we enter the choir, and the prince's on the left. The stalls of the other knights are ranged on each side under their respective banners, on the back of which are small brass plates on which their titles and arms are blazoned. This plate remains on the death of a knight, 'as a perpetual memorial to his honour.' These plates are well worthy of being examined, as amongst them may be traced the arms of some of the greatest men which this country has produced.

"A foreigner drew a very just inference on beholding these mementos of the many noble families still existing in this country. 'It is generally believed,' he says, 'abroad, that the ancient nobility of this nation is lost in trade, and that he who has the most money is the first gentleman; but, from the strict examination I made, it is plain that very few nations can boast a more uninterrupted course of ancient nobility, besides an infinite number of gentry, who can prove their pedigrees, some even before the Norman Conquest.'

"On the north side of the choir, close to the altar, is the Queen's closet; and immediately underneath it is the tomb of Edward the Fourth, a beautiful work of art in hammered steel, executed by Quintin Matsys. It is well worthy of notice."

But perhaps the most poetical portion of the whole fabric is the Round Tower, which was formerly the prison of the castle, celebrated as the place of durance of a royal and noble poet—James of Scotland, and the Earl of Surrey. The former thus described his lodging in the 'King's Quair':—

"Now was there made, fast by the tower's wall,
A garden faire, and in the corners set
An arbour green with wandis long and small
Railed about, and so with leaves beset
Was all the place and hawthorn hedges net,
That lyf [person] was none, walkyng there forbye,
That might within scarce any wight espye."

We must here conclude our notice, which we should have extended to greater length, had Mr. Jesse's book stood more in need of any recommendation than its own merit. It is as faithful as a guide-book, but is raised from the commonplace character of guide-books in general by a graceful mingling of historical and poetical lore, presented in a clear, natural, and unambitious style. The getting up of the whole volume is very elegant.

Lays and Lyrics. By Charles Gray, Captain Royal Marines. 12mo. pp. 272. London: 1842. Tilt and Bogue.

We have here an elegant little volume of collected poems, the production of a free-hearted and accomplished soldier, who has put by the sword for the pen, and taken to gather the bay-leaves of poetry instead of the laurels of war. Captain Gray has published the many lyrics which his little work contains in obedience to a round-robin requisition from a whole host of friends—and their gentle persuasion has so far served the literary public, for there are many treasures in the casket before us that our world of readers would not willingly lose. We have indeed been a good deal surprised, as well as gratified, to find, in our perusal of the many charming lyrics which the book contains, some of our old and favourite songs, of which the authorship—much as we have enjoyed and admired them—had been hitherto, to us, unknown. There is a freedom, a buoyancy, a soul, about the composition of these which suits them admirably to be "wed to melody," and we have heard them, in moments of conviviality, most admirably warbled by "some of the choicest spirits under the sun"—though, truth to tell, the sun was seldom shining at the time. With Captain Gray, therefore, we are with an old friend, and hail him warmly accordingly.

Will not our readers go with us, too, after the perusal of these spirited verses, which, many a time and oft, we have heard Ben Morgan, the Irish singer, give, accompanied by a chorus from nobles, gentles, and men of letters, all entering con amore into the genial spirit of the song—which, though a Scotch one, Ben Morgan doth yet most admirably sing.

THE SOCIAL CUP.
Air—Andro and his cutty gun

"Blythe, blythe, and merry are we,
Blythe are we, and a';
Aften hae we cantie been,
But sic a nicht we never saw!
The gloamin saw us s' sit down,
And meikle mirth has been our fa';
Then let the sang and toast gae roun'
Till chanticleer begins to craw!
Blythe, blythe, and merry are we—
Pick and wale o' merry men;
What care we tho' the cock may craw,
We're masters o' the tappit-hen!
"The auld kirk bell has chappit twal—
Wha cares tho' she had chappit twa!
We're licht o' heart and winna part,
Tho' time and tide may rin awa!
Blythe, blythe, and merry are we—
Hearts that care can never ding;
Then let Time pass—we'll steal his glass,
And pu' a feather frae his wing!
"Now is the witchin time o' nicht,
When ghaists, they say, are to be seen:
And fays dance to the glow-worm's licht
Wi' fairies in their gowns of green.
Blythe, blythe, and merry are we—
Ghaists may tak their midnicht stroll;
Witches ride on brooms astride,
While we sit by the witchin bowl!
"Tut! never speir how wears the morn—
The moon 's still blinking i' the sky,
And, gif like her we fill our horn,
I dinna doubt we'll drink it dry!
Blythe, blythe, and merry are we—
Blythe out-owre the barley bree;
And let me tell, the moon hersel
Aft dips her toom horn i' the sea!
"Then fill us up a social cup,
And never mind the dapple dawn;
Just sit awhile, the sun may smile
And licht us a' across the lawn!
Blythe, blythe, and merry are we;—
See! the sun is keekin ben;
Gie Time his glass—for months may pass
Ere we have sic a nicht again!"

Just as good as this are a hundred others in the volume, which is full of the genuine poetry of the heart—fine unstudied natural thoughts that come bounding up from a manly bosom, and touch the reader with their grace and truth. Much of the time of the author has, in the path of his profession, been passed at sea, and he has memories of his old companions, and friendly aspirations for the honour and safety of the very ships in which he has sailed, floating pleasantly over his effusions. One of these he dedicates to the "Vernon," commanded by Captain Symonds, and the song in which it is embodied contains the line—

"The fleet held on for Salamis," illustrated by the pencil of the artist.

There are other illustrations in the volume; and, among them, a fine portrait of the author, and a beautiful electrotyped view of Anstruther, his native place. He is just the sort of acquaintance our dear public will be glad to make—a brother of the sword and pen—gallant with the one and gifted with the other. As a lyric poet Captain Gray certainly deserves to take high rank, and this volume of his effusions will produce popularity to himself, and pleasure to the literary world. Content with awarding him this praise in a spirit of unaffected sincerity, we lay down his book, first filching from it a simile to make a fair finale to our notice of its contents.

A SIMILE.

Say, what is Life—man's empty boast?
A ship at sea sore tempest-tost;
Her sails all spent, her rudder lost,
Her timbers riven:
And what is Death?—the rocky coast
Whereon she's driven!

THE FASHIONS.

Mr. Editor,—In the construction of our elegant and fashionable costumes lately introduced for morning and evening dress, the greatest simplicity is now adopted both at the ball and the promenade; and thus the sumptuous grandeur of the ancient styles, which gleamed and glistened in our saloons, is superseded, for the present, at least.—For the evening, a barège dress of vivid and diversified colours, corsage peaked with rows of plaits, descending from the shoulders, uniting midway to the ceinture, a full skirt without flounces, and very short sleeves, not much below the arm-pit. I must mention also, the organdi dress, richer in its embellishments: on the edges of the skirt are disposed and around, numerous delicate ornaments of leaves and flowrets, continued on the sleeves, which terminate by small frillings. Little bonnets of paille cousue, doubled and trimmed, in green, and adorned with a small russet garland, as an addition to the foulard dresses, are truly pretty and becoming. The head-dress is plainly ranged in plaits of nœuds; a slight coiffure of lace intermingled with ribbon gauze, but in order to preserve the strict ton of the fashion the beautiful comb (peigne Joséphine) is worn, which relieves quite sufficiently by itself, because the hair is exhibited in all its beauty, set off, but not covered by this addition.

Yours, au plotôt, monsieur,
Julie.

Princess Victoria and Mr. Wilberforce.—When first I saw the pale and pretty daughter of the Duke of Kent, she was fatherless. Her fair, light form was sporting in all the redolence of youth and health on the noble sands of old Ramsgate. It was a fine summer day, not so warm as to induce languor, but yet warm enough to render the fanning breezes from the laughing tides, as they broke gently on the sands, agreeable and refreshing. Her dress was simple; a plain straw bonnet, with a white ribbon round the crown, a coloured muslin frock, looking gay and cheerful, and as pretty a pair of shoes on as pretty a pair of feet as I ever remember to have seen from China to Kamtschatka. Rove where you will, in the galleries of the Louvre, of Versailles, in David's atelier, or in the halls and museums of our loved isle, I defy you all my good masters and mistresses, to find me a prettier pair of feet than were those of the belle Victoria, when she played with the pebbles and the tides on Ramsgate sands. Her mother was her companion, and a venerable man, whose name is graven on every human heart that loves its species, and whose undying name is recorded in that eternal book where the actions of men were written with the pen of Truth, walked by her parent's side, and, doubtless, gave those counsels and offered that advice, which none were more able to offer than himself—for it was William Wilberforce!! Yes, there he was,—he, the mighty moral combatant of that now crushed giant, Slavery! who had fought so nobly and so well for the great principle that no man had a right, either real or imaginary, to the person and being of another man! Ah! never shall I forget with what irresistible fortune those lines recurred to my mind, as I gazed on the diminutive and trembling form of that moral Hercules,—

"Were I so tall to reach the pole,
Or grasp the ocean with a span,
I would be measured by my soul,—
The mind's the standard of the man."

Yes, the mind, unchained, unfettered, unenslaved,—the mind, immortal as the Being from which it sprang, and as immortal as the state of existence to which it is destined,—"the mind's the standard of the man." And what a mind was there before me. Wilberforce was not simply the benevolent, the virtuous, and the pious; but he was a great man, with a great mind, occupied about great interests, large and vast questions, and devoted to the glorious mission of raising his fellow-men, in all countries and climes, from degradation, misery, brutality, and bondage.—Fraser's Magazine.

Bishop Heber's lines, beginning with the words, "When are eyes beaming," have been charmingly set to music for two voices by Mrs. Orme.

International Copyright.—We have to acknowledge the receipt of another extra number of the New World, containing the whole of Mr. James's last work, entitled "Morley Ernstein; or, the Tenants of the Heart." From the acknowledged reputation of its author, we have no doubt this work equals any of his former ones, and will meet a ready sale wherever it can be obtained. Mr. Tebbets has received a number of copies of the New World containing this new novel, which he offers to the public at the very low price of 1s. 10½d. The publisher's price in London is 10s. 6d. sterling per volume—here the work is to be procured for three English sixpences!—Montreal Courier.

THEATRICAL PORTRAITS.

FANNY CERITO.

At the commencement of the autumn of 1832, during one of the balmy evenings of the delicious climate of the south, the portico of the San Carlo of Naples was besieged by a crowd of gay, light-hearted beings, each anxious to gain the first admission to that magnificent temple of the Muses. The cause of this unusual excitement was the début of a youthful aspirant to the honours of the dance, in praise of whose grace and beauty every tongue was eloquent, and who, without being the pupil of any school, alone, unassisted, and regardless of the event, was to step that evening from the privacy of domestic life, where she had been nurtured amid all the luxuries of a happy home, to the stage of one of the first theatres in Italy. On that evening, Sept. 28, 1832, La Cerito made her first appearance in public, and laid the foundation of that popularity which was afterwards to attend her, not only in Italy, but in every part of Europe.

Fanny Cerito, the only daughter of her parents, was born at Naples, on Sunday, the 11th of March, 1821. In her infancy she is described as being flexible as the tender plants that yield to every passing breeze; and as she grew up, the disposition she evinced was so animated and playful, her imagination so ardent, and her manner so fascinating and agreeable, that all who knew her predicted the admiration she would excite in every sphere of life. Fanny was the pride of her parents, and the favourite of every one with whom she associated: though young, she was so full of promise that every one spoke to her of the future, of the conquests of love and beauty and virtue. Naturally thoughtful, anticipations of pleasure so fleeting and confined soon ceased to satisfy her mind: as if forewarned of her destiny, she panted for wider distinction, and, previous to her début, seemed to have glimpses of the triumph that awaited her. All who were present on that occasion must remember the astonishment and delight manifested by the habitues of the San Carlo: it was long since success had been more signal or complete. In the ballet in which she came forward, entitled the Horoscope, the archness and vivacity of her action, the striking originality of her style of dancing, and the various and opposite perfections it combined, were the admiration of every body. Crowds flocked to see her, and, for a long time, the youth, surpassing elegance, sweetness, and amiability of the "Angioletta gentilla" formed the prevailing topic of conversation in the public places and every society of Naples.

From Naples she went to Rome, where she danced at the Apollo during the carnival of 1832-3. Nothing could exceed the applause with which she was welcomed at the ancient capital; poets chanted her praises, and verses were inscribed to her, in which she was extolled as the "fourth of the Graces," if not "Venus herself." From Rome she returned to her native city, where additional success was in store for her. She next appeared at the Pergola of Florence, where she remained during the season of the autumn and the carnival of 1834-5. Her name was now familiar to every theatre in Italy; but Rome and Naples again expressed the desire to possess the rising favourite. La Cerito was not suffered to remain long absent from either city. Like the celebrated pictures of the old masters, such is the nature of the admiration she excites, that the oftener she is seen the better she is appreciated.

After repeated solicitations, and loaded with flattering testimonials of regard, she was at length induced to take leave of the San Carlo and proceed to Turin, where she appeared in the autumn of 1835 at the Carignano, and during the following carnival at the Regio, or Royal Theatre. Her reception in both these places was enthusiastic to the last degree; and invitations continued to pour in upon her from the principal theatres in Europe. The director of the Italian Opera of Vienna being requested to engage her on the most liberal terms, she crossed the Alps, and repaired to the imperial capital of Austria, where her success far surpassed that of any other dancer on record. Pressed by the highest authorities to prolong her stay, she remained at Vienna a year and nine months, her popularity increasing to the last representation, when the theatre was literally besieged, and nothing sufficed to satisfy the admiration of the crowds assembled to bid her farewell.

From Vienna she went to Trieste, where she continued during the carnival of 1837-8. At this city, also, she was welcomed with the most extravagant demonstrations of delight; the inhabitants flocked to see her, and every means were employed to celebrate the arrival of the jeune sylphide Italienne.

In the month of April, 1838, La Scala, the magnificent theatre of Milan, which is usually closed during the spring season of the year, was opened expressly to receive her. Preparations were made in a style of the utmost splendour, and the celebrated singer Bocabadati was engaged to appear at the same time. It is impossible to describe the shouts of applause with which the immense audience of La Scala greeted the fair danseuse. Every paper was occupied in her praise. To Cerito, said the Figaro—"Non di danzar, ma di volare è dato." Her success at Milan was most signal and unprecedented; no tribute of admiration was spared, and fresh honours awaited her at each succeeding representation.

We come now to what may be considered the most eventful period in the brilliant career of this celebrated danseuse,—the first season of her engagement in London.

On Saturday, the 2nd of May, 1840, Fanny Cerito made her debut at her Majesty's Theatre in a divertissement. She had been announced for the Thursday previous, but that evening was rendered remarkable for another memorable occurrence, which prevented her appearance—the notorious "Tamburini row," in which so many persons of distinction were concerned. Her reception was highly flattering; she at once established herself firmly in the public favour.

Immediately after the conclusion of the season of 1840, La Cerito left London in company with her parents, and proceeded direct to Italy, where she was already engaged to appear at Bergamo, Verona, and Sarascina. Subsequently she danced at Bologna, Ponte San Marco, Venice, Milan, Genoa, &c. At Ponte San Marco the sensation she created is beyond description,—the theatre was crammed to excess every evening, the audience testifying their admiration in the most enthusiastic manner. After the last representation, in which she was received with an uproar of applause, her carriage was surrounded, the horses were taken out, and the fair danseuse was dragged home amid the deafening shouts of the multitude. In the other places, equally flattering, if less extravagant testimonials of regard were awarded to her. To follow out the eventful career of La Cerito to the latest period, we may state that she again reached London on Thursday, the 13th of May, 1841, and re-appeared at her Majesty's Theatre on the Tuesday following, in the Lac des Fées. On Thursday, the 10th of June, La Sylphide was revived; and herein, also, her success was triumphant.

In all national dances and pas de caractère La Cerito excels. The Styrienne, Lithuanienne, and the Castillanaise, executed by her, have created a perfect furore in the principal theatres of Italy.

She remained in London till the termination of the season of 1841, at her Majesty's Theatre, where, it will not be too much to assert, she continued the chief point of attraction. Her benefit, which took place on Thursday, the 12th of August, drew, notwithstanding the comparatively deserted state of the metropolis, one of the fullest and most fashionable audiences ever assembled within the Opera-house. Her exertions on this occasion were commensurate with the patronage lavished upon her, and never has there been witnessed a more enthusiastic display of admiration. On leaving London she repaired to Liverpool, whither she had been tempted by the most liberal and flattering offers. Her success was signal and unprecedented, and induced the manager to prolong her engagement. On the 19th of September she left England for Vienna, in which imperial city, celebrated above all others for its devotion to the dance, she continued during the winter months, drawing crowds to the opera, and recognised as a universal favourite in the saloons of its most distinguished and noble inhabitants. The Viennese journals vied with each other in praise of her bewitching talent, and the unpresuming modesty of her deportment. On the first night of her arrival, the news spread like wildfire, and her slumbers were interrupted by a serenade played under her windows. A fête, on a larger scale, at which the heads of some of the first families in Vienna were present, was subsequently given by the impresario in honour of the event. She appeared in a succession of ballets, for each of which her talent procured a long career of popularity. Few that enjoyed opportunities of witnessing them, will forget "Le retour de la Sylphide," "L'elève de l'Amour," "La Gitana," and "Le Lac des Fées." In the two latter, and indeed in each, she created a positive furore, but as most of our readers are acquainted with these beautiful specimens as adorned by her engaging charms, it would be superfluous for us to dilate upon them. She left Vienna on the 3rd of April, but not without the most gratifying tokens of private regard as well as public admiration. A most exquisite portfolio, richly embroidered, on which months of patient care must have been bestowed, was presented her by a lady, with some dedicatory lines equally creditable to her imagination and amiability. She was also presented (from an unknown quarter) with a magnificent bracelet of turquoise, and his Royal Highness the Prince of Salerno, uncle of the King of Naples, sent her a superb set of jewels, set with rubies, emeralds, and diamonds of the first water. In May, La Cerito arrived in London, punctual to her engagement. She had passed a few days previous in Paris, where, unfortunately, she was attacked by illness arising from fatigue. From this, however, she rapidly rallied, and when she appeared on the boards of her Majesty's Theatre, she was beautiful and blooming as ever. She was welcomed with an enthusiasm that knew no bounds—the company was the most distinguished assembled during the season, and gave utterance to their delight by reiterated bravos and cheers prolonged again and again. On the 23rd of June a new ballet, entitled, "Alma, ou la fille du feu," was produced, in which she sustained the principal part. Never was a piece more triumphant from beginning to end, and that its chief success was owing to its presiding goddess will be at once acknowledged, when we state that its most original and brilliant pas was composed as well as danced by herself. That ballet, at the time we write, has not yet reached the summit of its popularity, and each succeeding night of its performance fresh honours are heaped on the lovely danseuse. They who have watched the amiable subject of this memoir from the first step of her public career have now witnessed the gradual fulfilment of the hopes to which the early development of her extraordinary talent gave rise. Cerito is now the empress of the ballet: all the fascinating qualities of the other danseuses are in her combined, with the balance in her favour of youth and beauty. We conclude this brief sketch of the last twelve months of her career by the mention of a fact, which will bear testimony at once to her perfect embodiment of the poetry of motion and her excellent private character. The Queen Dowager of England was lately graciously pleased to bestow on her a splendid enamel brooch, set with diamonds, and accompanied by a most flattering message. All those who are acquainted with the taste and discrimination of that illustrious lady well know how to appreciate the value of a gift so generously bestowed.

The St. Katharine Dock Company on Tuesday declared a dividend of 2½ per cent. for the half-year ending the 5th inst., making a reasonable allowance for the payment of the income-tax. It was stated that the business of the dock had, as compared with the former six months, participated to the extent of 10 per cent. in the general increase of shipping entered into the port of London. The return setting forth this showed that the increase in British shipping which has entered the port of London is 220, with 36,000 tonnage; while there is a decrease of 84 foreign ships, with 2750 tonnage: thus making the net increase 136 ships, with 33,250 tonnage.

POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No. VI.

LORD ASHLEY, M.P.

The name of Lord Ashley is neither unknown nor unhonoured; it stands conspicuous among those of the public men of the day, for reasons which, though they may already be known to the reader, we feel much pleasure in being the means of repeating. Lord Ashley is not a prominent party man, he is not a constant, not even a frequent, debater; and though a decided Conservative in politics, he is much more inclined to give his party the benefit of his vote than his voice. Yet few of the busiest politicians of the day have attained a wider fame than he has done, and none, a fame which, in our opinion, is better worth achieving. The path he has marked out for himself in public life, is one altogether independent of party considerations or party conflicts; he has appealed to broader principles, to more general sympathies; he has advocated the cause of common and universal humanity, which, for the credit of our nature, let us hope is the same, and appeals to the same emotions in the breasts of all, of whatsoever party or creed they may be. Lord Ashley is well known as the author and persevering advocate of those legislative measures which are intended to interpose between master and workmen, between capital and labour, so that the power of the former shall not become too oppressive to be borne by the latter Those to whom labour is life, may be compelled by stern necessity, to labour so unremittingly, that life itself may be poisoned, and man, by overtasking both mind and body, become a degraded being, destitute of all that can render life other than an intolerable burden. To rescue whole masses of men from this ever-probable evil, the "Factory Bill" and "Mines and Collieries Bill" of Lord Ashley are framed. The principle of both is this—that capital, all-powerful as it is, should have some limit placed to its power of purchasing; and, great as are the necessities of labour, it should be restricted in its eagerness to sell what capital would buy up, even to the last stage of human exhaustion. In the terrible competition for life, increasing in intensity with our daily increasing population, there may be greater difficulty in interfering by legislative power with these two elements of society, but it is right that some interference should be attempted. Man is doomed "to eat his bread by the sweat of his brow," and for toil, either of hand or head, no man is the worse, if not tasked beyond his strength. But when its excess brings disease, early death, and moral degradation, it is well that the law should step in with a merciful prohibition. The fearful extent to which the children of the poor have been sacrificed, body and soul, to the necessities of their parents, is one of the most melancholy parts of the whole question; and it is in limiting the number of hours during which labour shall be exacted from them, that the chief good of Lord Ashley's Factory Bill consists, though we greatly fear it has not in all cases been efficacious. But it was not in the factories alone that the hand of oppression was forcing from the human heart the cry of suffering. He, therefore, turned from the crowded manufactory, to those districts where

> "God's image disinherited of day, > Plunged deep in mines, forgets a sun was made;"

and applied his active benevolence to the task of ameliorating the condition of those who, being deprived of the light of Heaven, seemed to be also cut off from the mercy of man. We shall not refer to the details of the inquiry that revealed a state of things that would scarcely have been credited, had not the proofs been but too strong and convincing. On that inquiry Lord Ashley founded his "Mines and Collieries Bill," which has been carried through Parliament during the present session. The manner in which it was introduced, and afterwards supported by his Lordship, added much to his former reputation. His speech on laying the measure before the house was temperate in its tone, yet most impressive from its facts; there was neither declamation nor invective, for he seemed to feel that his cause would not have gained strength from either.

Lord Ashley is the eldest son of the Earl of Shaftesbury, the chairman of committees of the House of Lords, a shrewd, active old gentleman, who appears so thoroughly engrossed with the routine of legislation (which he gets through occasionally with astounding rapidity) that he has but little sympathy to spare for the wrongs of the millions, and may possibly be puzzled to account for the existence of it in his son. Lord Ashley is of a tall and commanding figure, with strongly marked features, intelligent and pleasing in their expression; his manner shows he is actuated by conviction and reason as much as by humane feeling, for his speeches are by no means those of an enthusiast. He has held some minor offices of Government, but has not wedded himself to official life. He has represented the county of Dorset since 1831.

THE MAN OF FASHION.

From the "World of London," in "Blackwood's Magazine."

The physique of the true fashionable is peculiar and characteristic. From the toe of his boot to the crown of his hat, there is that unostentatious, undefinable something about him distinctive of his social position. Professional men, everybody knows, have an expression common to their profession. A publicist cyclops could never mistake the expression of an Independent preacher, an universal free-black-nigger Baptist minister, or a Jesuit. Everybody knows an infantry officer, with his "eyes-right" physiognomy, his odious black stock, and his habit of treading on his heels, and can distinguish him from the cavalry man, straddling like a gander at a pond side. Your medical doctor has an obsequious, measly-mouthed, hope-I-see-you-better face, and carries his hands as if he had just taken his fingers from a poultice; while your lawyer is recognised at once by his perking, conceited, cross-examination phiz, the exact counterpart to the expression of an over-indulged jackdaw.

The gentleman of fashion has nothing in common with the professional gentleman, or any other. He stands alone, "like Adam's recollection of his fall." He has an air, it is true, but his air is not a breeze, like the air of a pretender to fashion. The air of the man of fashion is a zephyr.

The expression of the man of fashion is the more difficult to reduce to words, in that it is mostly negative. It is easier to say what this expression is not, than what it is. We can only say, that there is nothing professionally distinctive about it. It is the expression of a man perfectly at ease in his position, and so well aware that he is so, that he does not seem to be aware of it—an absence of all straining after effect; a solicitude rather to avoid than court observation. If there is anything positively indicative in his expression, by which I include his manner, it is that of a good-humoured indifference, an inoffensive, unobtrusive stoicism. He would seem to have adopted the excellent advice given by the apostle to the Thessalonians—"Study to be quiet." This is his rule of life, and he acts upon it upon great and small occasions. He only desires that you will have the goodness to let him alone. If he is cheated by a man of his own set (for he knows that he is cheated, as a matter of course, by tradespeople), he cuts the fellow coolly. If he is insulted, he coolly calls out his man. He falls in love with coolness, marries coolly, and leads a cool connubial life. Whether he wins or loses, whatever happens to disturb the world or himself, he takes coolly, and if he has an aspiration on earth, it is that he may be cool and comfortable.

His philosophy is the mingled Social and Epicurean—"Which him life is a trifle to be gravelly played with—a "tressel child, to be hummered till it falls asleep, and all is over." He makes no difference imputed to him as a crime; but it should not be forgotten that, if there be any fault at all, in the indifference, it is the fault of his position. Fortune is to blame, not he, for setting up a man with no other enemy than time, and no other business than amusement. We do not say that this is the true end of life; we do not enter into the inquiry, which might carry us to leeward of our subject, whether men who have the means of enjoying life, do not show the truest wisdom in pursuing enjoyment. We only know that most men similarly circumstanced would act similarly; and whether there is most vice or greatest misery in the idleness of fashionable life, or in the business of the busy world, as it is carried on in our time, I leave to those who have experience and leisure to determine.

The constitutional and habitual indifference of the man of fashion is generally supposed, by the se who do not know it, to be an effect of pride; but it is, generally speaking, a symptom of something more akin to humility—of timidity, in short. It is part of his system to avoid contact, save with his fellows; and with those who are not his fellows, or of his set, he is altogether out of his element. Therefore, as he is afraid of giving, and incapable of taking offence, he intrenches himself in the unstudied reserve which he finds by experience renders his individuality least assailable, exactly as he surrounds his ornamental woods, his shrubberies, and his parterres with fences, not the less strong because they are invisible.

With adventurous people who are treading upon his kibes, equivocal pretenders who are galling his heel he is hopelessly exclusive, preserving towards them an armed neutrality. His friendship is extended to his equals, and to his equals alone; with these his intercourse is free and unrestrained. These alone see the English man of fashion as he really exists, denuded of that armour of reserve with which he goes cap-a-pie in public. Towards others he is distantly polite; and with such nice tact does he blend a distant manner with politeness, that you cannot carp at the former, or catch at the latter. He lets you see that you cannot be one of them, but in such a way that you may not quarrel with the manner in which he conveys his intimation.

His indifference to the fate and fortunes of deserving men has been, among the vulgar, a common imputation upon the man of fashion, of which class most frequently is the man of power. He is accused of lavishing his favours only upon the toady and the tuft-hunter, and leaving men of independent mind to the caprice of fortune.

This complaint comes with a very bad grace from men who would be thought independent. The man who wants the patronage of the great must go in search of it, whether he call himself independent or no. Men in power are accustomed to be met more than half way; and the independent man, whether he have merit or no, who expects people of rank to come in search of him, and to hunt him out of the obscurity of his garret, will find himself very much mistaken.

None are truly independent while in pursuit of objects which are attainable only by the pleasure of another. The truly independent are those who do not only not solicit favours, but those who do not want them; and there is seen too often, among needy and struggling men of merit, an irritable pride, a "fierté," arising, not from a sense of independence, but a consciousness of neglect; and many men boast of the pleasure of an independent life, as many ladies exalt the delights of single blessedness, only because they never had the offer of changing their condition.

A wealthy cit has as little regard for men of letters as a fashionable, nor has he the same tact of concealing his indifference; the well-bred man of fashion, who is in truly the man of fashion, studies tact above all things, and his tact prevents him ever regarding men of mind with anything approaching contempt.

His friendly offices, which his equals never require, he generally bestows upon men whose position in society is marked and permanent, and who never can by any possibility compete with him; to these, if they be safe—that is, if they keep quiet, and are content to enjoy a sort of unpretending familiarity, without boasting or pluming themselves upon their position, he does the kindest and most liberal things, in the kindest and most liberal way; in a way that no other man than one truly fashionable can accomplish. He confers benefits with an affable and disinterested air, which, while it increases the burden of obligation, seems to demand no acknowledgment; he bestows without seeming to know that he is bestowing, and knowing enough of human nature to be aware that to the deserving, obligations have something humiliating, he wishes to make the burden as light as possible.

One of the most amiable qualities about the aristocracy is their liberality and kindness to their dependents; you seldom or never hear of any one who has served them faithfully and long having reason to complain. To do something for these people is part of their system, and not to see them neglected or in want, a point of honour. This kindly feeling they extend, as far as their power or influence extends—to humble friends, electioneering partisans, poor connexions. They are always kind and considerate, provided only these persons possess that unpresuming quietude of manner, which makes up a considerable part of that character they delight in, and which they call safe. If you introduce to one of these people of fashion, any man who may have an object in view, the first inquiry is, what are his claims—that is, what equivalent has he given, or can he give, for the favours he expects? for it is with the high, as with the low world, nothing for nothing; and secondly, you must be prepared to answer for his safety, so that whatever may be said or done, nothing may, by any possibility, leak out of the protege. The man counts for so many perfumed, be-mugged, purblind, silky fellows being taken in and "done for" by the great; and although these fellows dress like fools and look like fools, depend on't, they are not the fools you take them for: they are aware that nothing so effectually throws off their guard and disarms the great, as a well-carried affectation of gentlemanly effeminacy, and "a still small voice, like a woman's." We happen to know that some of these people, for this very delicacy of air and manner picked out of the dirt, and carried into high places, who are au naturel, as we may say, when they go home, and have laid aside the wigs, silk waistcoats, quizzing glasses, and the rest of their disguise, as honest, friendly, and unaffected fellows, as are in the world—only they do not desire that anybody should say so.

Of a man with a stiff back, black beard, short hair, loud voice, and buff waistcoat, people of fashion, on the contrary, stand in continual awe; his tongue is to them a rattlesnake's tail, wagging only as a signal for them to get out of his way; they quiver like an aspen at the sound of his voice, and for their own particular, would rather hear the sharpening of a saw, if such a one courts their acquaintance, they are hopelessly, despairingly polite; if, as is usual, he then waxes insolent and, as the fast fellows would call it, slangs them, they are delighted with the opportunity of displaying that placid indifference upon which they pride themselves as one of their exclusive accomplishments.

Another peculiarity of truly fashionable people is, that they never say or do spiteful or vindictive things; revenge and spite they consider low, plebeian, and vulgar; besides, vindictiveness of any kind disturbs their equanimity, puts them out of their way, and levels them with the people who may have injured or annoyed them; they cannot endure jaundice of body or mind, and equally abhor anything that sticks out in the guise of "gizzard." Their defensive armour, than which none can be less penetrable, is equanimity; their weapons, unstudied indifference and dignified neglect.

Towards their own "order" they are invariably consistent in kindness and consideration; they stand by, and stand to, one another with a paternal amity, which is only occasionally disturbed by politics; embarrassment or necessity efaces conventional distinctions of politics, and Whig or Tory is always ready to provide for "honest Jack," or "do something" for "poor Fred." But we are not to consider their exertions in this way, accompanied with any self-sacrifice or self-denial; holding in their own hands the means of providing for their friends or relatives, they usually so contrive matters that they lose nothing by it.

In a book published some five-and-thirty years ago, is an account of the then prevailing method of killing a fashionable day; as the pursuit of inanity and folly has a tedious sameness about it, this picture will answer, with a few variations, for the man of fashion of today. About twelve, he (the man of fashion) rises, lolls upon a sofa, skims the newspaper, and curses his stupidity. He is particularly angry if he does not find in it a paragraph which he sent to the agent of a fashionable newspaper, generally the Morning Post, who lives by procuring such sort of intelligence, containing an account of his having dined at table titled much above his day before, with whom, if he has no rank himself, he is particularly anxious to mingle. After swallowing several cups of tea or cocoa, and slices of foreign sausages and fowls, he assumes his riding coat, and sallies out to his stables to inspect his horses, and chat with his coachman and grooms. Having finished this review and audience, he orders his curricle, and, followed by a couple of grooms, he dashes through most of the principal streets, and calls upon the most celebrated coach and harness makers; at the latter he is shown several new bits for his approbation. He then proceeds to his breeches-makers, thence to Tattersall's, where he is sure to meet a great number of friends, with whom he kills another hour in discussing the merits of the different animals he meets with there. These important duties being done, he strolls to an exhibition, or a print-shop, and looks over a portfolio of caricatures; thence he keeps on moving to a fashionable hotel, to take some spruce beer (!) and sandwiches; here, after arranging his parties for the evening, he returns home to dress. After looking over the cards which have been left for him, he proceeds to his toilette with his valet, and is dressed about seven, when his chariot is at the door, and he drives either to some family to dinner, or to the hotel he visited in the morning, where he perhaps formed a party of four. At ten o'clock he enters the opera, and like a butterfly moves from box to box; thence behind the scenes, where he previews the princesses to one or two routs, or some fashionable gaming-house, and about four or five is in bed to recruit himself for a repetition of the same course of pleasure the following day. These loungers have a phraseology peculiar to themselves. A short time since, if one of them was asked how he was, the answer would have been, "very well, thank you, but I did not see you at the opera, "it is my second opera." They also say personally, speaking of some illustrious hero, "he's a fine brave fellow, but he ties his handkerchief most shockingly." I also remember being one day in in Hyde-park with a man who was one of the loungers, and after exchanging salutations, the latter, addressing the latter, I wish much to have the pleasure of seeing you—are you engaged next Wednesday? upon which the other turned round to a half starved groom, and said, "John, am I engaged next Wednesday?" "The women of fashion," observes the same writer, "are just as great and insipid idlers in their way, as are the male triflers. They seldom walk in the streets, but are almost always cooped up in their carriages, driving about the streets, and leaving their cards at the houses of their friends, whether at home or not, during the day, although they may be at home at the time; thence they proceed to the most expensive jewellers, where they order a piece of plate or a trinket; thence to some fashionable milliner." This picture is not altogether like, but some of the features may certainly be easily recognised? if we substitute sherry, a chop, and a club in Pall-mall, for white sauce beer, sandwiches, and a tavern; replacing the curricle and footman by a cab and tiger, the remainder, with trivial alterations, may stand good of the fashionable idler of to day, as of him of the last century.

AN IRISH HIGHWAYMAN.

Doctor W——, the Bishop of Cashel, having occasion to visit Dublin, accompanied by his wife and daughter, determined to perform the journey by easy stages, in his own carriage, and with his own sleek and well-fed horses, instead of trusting his bones to the tender mercies of an Irish postchaise and the unbroken yerrons used for drawing these vehicles. One part of the route was through a wild and mountainous district; and the bishop being a very humane man, and considerate of his cattle, made a point of quitting his carriage at the foot of every hill and walking to the top. On one of these occasions he had loitered to look at the extensive prospect, indulging in a reverie upon its sterile appearance, and the chance that agriculture might be induced to do something for the land, when a fellow leaped from behind a heap of loose stones, and, accompanying the flourish of a huge club with a demoniac yell, demanded "Money!" with a ferocity of tone and manner perfectly appalling. The Bishop gave the robber all the silver he had loose in his pocket, hoping it would satisfy him; but he was mistaken: for no sooner had the ruffian secured it than in some rent in his tattered garment than, with another whirl of his bludgeon and an awful oath, he exclaimed—"And is it with the likes of this I'm after lettin' you off? a few paltry fippennies! It's the gould I'll have, or I'll spatter your brains. Arrah, don't stand shiverin' and shakin' there, like a Quaker in the ague, but lug out yer purse, ye devil, immediately, or I'll bate you as blue as a whetstone."

His lordship most reluctantly yielded his well-filled purse, saying in tremulous accents—"My good fellow, there it is; don't abuse me, I've given you all, let me depart. Surely you have taken enough; leave me my watch, and I'll forgive all you have done."

"Who axed yer forgiveness, you old vermint? Would you trifle wid my good nature? Don't force me to do anythin' I'd be sorry for; but, without any more bother just give me the watch, or by all that's holy ——," and he poised the bludgeon from his right to his left, spat in the horny palm of his fist for more certainty, and regained his formidable weapon, as though seriously bent on bringing it into operation. This action was not unheeded by his victim. He drew forth the golden time piece, and with a heavy sigh handed it to his spoiler, who, rolling the chain and seals round it, found some wider aperture in his apparel into which he crammed it; and giving himself a shake to assert in that it had found, by its own gravity, a place of safety, he said -" And now be off wid you, an' thank the blessed saints that ye've left me without a scratch on your skin, or the value of yer little finger hurt."

It needed no persuasion to induce the bishop to turn his back upon the despoiler of his worldly goods; and having no weight to carry, he set out at what equestrians term "a hard canter." Scarcely, however, had he reached the middle of the precipitous road, when he perceived his persecutor running after him. He endeavoured to redouble his speed. Alas! what chance had he in a race with one whose muscles were as strong and elastic as highly tempered steel?

"Stop, ye nimble-footed thief of the world!" roared the robber, "stop, I tell ye! I've a partin' word wid you yet."

The exhausted and defenceless prelate finding it impossible to continue his flight, suddenly came to a stand-still. The fellow approached; and his face, instead of its former ferocity, was lit up with a whimsical roguishness of expression, as he said—"An' is it likely I'd let ye off with a better coat on yer back than my own? an' will I be arter losin' the chance of that hat an' wig? Off wid them this moment, an' then you'll be quit of me."

The footpad quickly divested the bishop of his single-breasted coat, laid violent hands upon the clerical hat and wig, put them on his own person, and then insisted on seeing his late apparel used in their stead; and, with a loud laugh, ran off as though his last act had been the most meritorious of his life.

"My dear W——!" exclaimed his affectionate wife, after listening to the account of the perils to which her husband had been exposed, "for Heaven's sake take off that filthy jacket and throw it out of the window. You can put my warm cloak over your shoulders till we reach the next stage, and then you will be able to purchase some habit better suited to your station and calling."

"That is more easily said than done, my love," he replied; "I have lost all the money I possessed: not a single guinea is left to pay our expenses to-night. My watch, too, that I so dearly prized! Miserable man that I am!"

"Never mind your watch, or anything else just now; only pull off that mass of filth, I implore you: who knows what horrid contagion we may all catch if you persist in wearing it!"

Take it off, dear papa," observed the daughter, "but don't throw it away, it may lead to detection of the wretch who robbed you."

The obnoxious garment was removed. The young lady was about to place it under the seat when she heard a jingling noise that attracted her attention, and on examination, found secreted in parts of the coat, not only the watch, pocket-book, purse, and silver, of which her father had been deprived, but a yellow canvas bag, such as is used by farmers, containing about 30 guineas.

It has been said of some men, that they could talk whole hours together upon anything; but it must be owned, to the honour of the other sex, that there are many among them who can talk whole hours together upon nothing. I have known a woman branch out in a long extempore dissertation upon the edging of a petticoat, and chide her servant for breaking a china cup, in all the figures of rhetoric.—Addison.

Variety of Men's Faces.—The great variety existing throughout the world of men's faces and voices is an admirable proof of the wisdom of the Creator of all things. Had men's faces been cast in the same, or not a very different mould, their organs of speech would have sounded nearly the same, and the same exact structure of muscles and nerves would have given the hand the same direction in writing. In this case, what confusion, what disturbance, what mischiefs, would the world have eternally laid under! No security could have been given to our person; no certainty, no enjoyment of our possessions; no distinction between good and bad, between friends and foes; but all would have been exposed to malice, fraud, and violence. But now, as it is ordered, every man's face can distinguish him in the light, and his voice in the dark; his hand-writing can speak for him though absent, and be his witness, and secure his contracts in future generations; a manifest as well as admirable indication of the divine superintendence and management.—Dereham.

Multiplication.—If the human race, beginning from one pair, were to double once in thirty years or if the excess of births over deaths were to double the population once in thirty years, then, at the end of 3,000 years, the population might be described as follows:—Take men, women, and children, at an average height of four feet, and imagine a vast plain of the same surface as the whole earth and sea. Let each person be allowed one square foot to stand upon, and let the "surplus population," after the plain is full, stand upon the heads of the others, with others again upon their heads, and so on. The pile would extend to a height of 3,688 times the distance from the earth to the sun.

CHESS.

[We must apologize for an error which crept into our last number through a mistake of the printer—in the heading of the game played between M'Donnell and La Bourdonnais, it stated it was played during last summer, it should have been during the summer of 1834. The gamester M Donnell has been dead several years, and La Bourdonnais also has been dead upwards of a year.]

EXPEDITION OF THE DUCHESS DE BERRI.

We extract the following interesting particulars relative to the ill-fated expedition of the Duchess de Berri from the third volume of M. Louis Blanc's "Dix Ans de Règne :—

Maria Caroline prosecuted her enterprise with a perseverance and vigour surprising in a woman, and in presence of so many obstacles. Her correspondence with the south of France and La Vendée increased in activity. The Duke d'Escars travelled over the southern province, of which he was to assume the command; proclamations and ordinances were prepared; a document, dated from Massa, established at Paris a provisional Government, of which M. de Chateaubriand, the Marshal Duke de Bellune, M. de Kergorlay, and M. de Latour-Maubourg were to form part, and M. de Floirac was appointed its secretary; lastly, a negotiation was opened with certain leaders of the Bonapartist party, which deserves to be recorded with some details, because it shows what the secret thoughts of Austria were at that period.

There was at that time in Switzerland a General of the Empire, an enemy to the Government which had prevailed in France. This General submitted to Prince de Metternich, through the medium of M. de Bombelles, various proposals relative to the reinstating of the Duke de Reichstadt, which were followed by the project of an Imperial constitution. But, not content with closing his ear on these proposals, Prince de Metternich communicated them to a correspondent of the Duchess de Berri, and that was the starting point of the negotiation we have mentioned. The Court of Massa hesitated not to enter into an intercourse with some Bonapartists, with the design, which was common to them, of overthrowing Louis Philippe. But it was difficult they could come to an understanding. Some would do nothing unless with the tri-coloured flag, and the Court of Massa could not renounce the white flag.

Meanwhile, M. de Metternich warned the Duchess de Berri that her presence at Massa was dangerous; that the French Government had its eye on all her proceedings; that she must fear the injuring her son's cause by the rashness of her project; that the affording her enemies the opportunity of seizing upon a precious hostage would be a sure way of compromising that cause, &c. &c. All M. de Metternich's policy lay in that advice, the prudence of which but ill-concealed its egotism.

M. de Bourmont, son of the Marshal, was entrusted with communicating to the Prince Royal of Holland the projects and hopes of the Duchess de Berri, who, being informed of the difficulties raised by the Belgian question, relied on a diversion which would attract Louis Philippe's forces to the northern frontier. The Prince of Orange seemed greatly astonished at the confidence the Duchess de Berri entertained in the strength of the Legitimate party, and all that could be extorted from him were the words, "As for us, we are ready."

Matters had come to that height, that the Duchess de Berri must either wholly renounce her enterprise or hasten to France and try her fortunes. She adopted the latter resolution. The marrow of the struggle had been foreseen, and we now give a summary of the basis of the régime Maria Caroline intended to establish in the event of her obtaining a complete victory.

The departure had been fixed for the 24th of April. Nothing was neglected to keep every thing in indispensable mystery. As early as the 22nd, the Duchess de Berri had warned the Duke of Modena of it by letter. A journey to Florence was alleged as a pretext, but a certain number of those who were to embark with the Princess secretly repaired to Leghorn. On the 24th, at nightfall, a carriage, which had come out of the ducal palace, and was drawn by four post-horses, stopped not far from the Massa gate, at a spot where the wall's shadow is very deep. The carriage contained the Duchess de Berri, Madame de Podenas, Mademoiselle Lebeschu, and M. de Brissac. Availing himself of a moment when the postilion was busy with his horses, a footman opened the carriage door, the femme de chambre of Madame de Podenas got into the coach, and Maria Caroline got out with Mademoiselle Lebeschu and M. de Brissac: the door was then shut, and the horses took the Florence road without the postilion suspecting any thing, and whilst the Princess, slipping along the wall, hastened to the place of embarkation. At eleven at night the Duchess de Berri and her companions were all assembled on the seashore. The major of the troops, whom it had been necessary to admit into the secret, as well as the chief of the police, had a light brought, and recommended the utmost silence, for all was lost if the soldiers and douaniers, who slumbered in the neighbourhood, had been disturbed in their sleep.

They awaited, to embark in the Carlo Alberto, a small steam-boat bought in 1831, for Maria Caroline, and which M. Adolphe Sala, an officer of the ex-Royal guard, was to come with to the vicinity of Massa, on the appointed day and hour. The boat was long and anxiously expected. At length, a faint light shone afar, which proved the approaching Carlo Alberto. The crew had fancied themselves on their way to Spain, and the captain was greatly surprised when told by M. Sala that he must draw near the coast, close to Massa, and take up some passengers who were behind their time. He first refused to do so, daring not to expose himself to the rigour of the sanatory regulations. The arrival of the wished for vessel was a subject of great joy to Maria Caroline's companions. The Princess, who had fallen asleep on the sand, covered with her cloak, was roused from her slumbers; and at three in the morning, the Duchess de Berri, Mdlle. Lebeschu, Marshal Bourmont, and his son Adolphe, MM. de Saint Priest, de Mesnard, and de Brissac joined, on the deck of the Carlo Alberto, M. de Kergorlay, and his son, M. Charles de Bourmont, and MM. Ledhuy, Sabatier, and Sala.

During the passage, the Duchess de Berri was always calm and cheerful. Remembering but too well the thundering letter of Charette on the flight of the Count d'Artois, in sight of the coast of Brittany, she was manifestly ruled by the thought of clearing the Bourbons from the reproach of pusillanimity so often incurred by them. It was likewise the thought of MM. de Bourmont, de Kergorlay, and de Saint Priest. They were sensible that, on this occasion, by the side of a throne to be reconquered, there was, as it were, a point of honour to be decided; but they dissembled not the seriousness of the enterprise, and needed, in order to hope, the promises of chance. M. Florian de Kergorlay, however, coupled much confidence with his devotedness, and was uneasy about the reserve of some of his companions, a reserve in which his impatience made him fancy there was a secret desire to delay the adventure or procure its failure.

The passage was effected without impediment, thanks to the blindness and ignorance of the Paris police. When in sight of Antiber, the Carlo Alberto passed quite close to a French cruiser, without attracting its attention, and, after crossing the gulf of Hyères, approached Toulon in such a way that the passengers could count the port lids of the frigates in the roads.

The passage was, nevertheless, a much slower one than it should have been; in the first place, because the vessel stood off to sea too much, instead of availing itself of the currents which, nearer land, would have hastened its progress; and, secondly, because, for want of a sufficient supply of coals, it was obliged to put into Nice. It was on the 28th only, at about midnight, that the Carlo Alberto descried the Phare du Planier, in the environs of which the rendezvous had been fixed. At two in the morning, two lanterns were hoisted on the masts, and the expected boat soon answered by M. Spitalier, the boat approached, and the watchword was exchanged. Such was the agitation of the sea, that the boat was violently dashed against one of the Carlo Alberto's paddles, so as to threaten its destruction. It was, therefore, no easy task to get into it. Maria Caroline proved herself intrepid and alert on the occasion; and it was with mingled anxiety and pride that such of her knights as remained in the steamer saw her move away over from them in so light a skiff amidst the darkness of an ominous night.

The coast had been reconnoitred long before, and Maria Caroline landed safely; but to reach the hut where a refuge had been prepared for her, there were rocks to be passed which the boldest smugglers did not scale without apprehension. The Princess merrily crept along this arduous path, prepared for all dangers, provided she ultimately triumphed.

Meanwhile, a singular coincidence of circumstances spread in Marseilles the report of the Duchess de Berri's landing. On the evening of the 28th one of her devoted adherents, uneasy about the delay, of which we have stated the causes, had hired a boat of a man named Tarteiron, in which he put nets and guns, to give rise to the belief that he was going on a shooting or fishing excursion.

The boat left the harbour of Marseilles, and proceeded towards the Rions islands, in the direction of the Phare du Planier. The unknown person who had hired it gave unequivocal signs of anxiety, asking for a light to read a paper, and looking at his watch. But another fishing-boat having appeared soon after, there was an exchange of mysterious words, and Tarteiron's boat was suddenly ordered back to the coast. Then, by an untoward chance, the crew of that boat, in order to dry themselves, entered the same cabaret as those who had just landed the Duchess de Berri. Some words were imprudently uttered, the health of the Duchess de Berri was drunk, and in a short time the authorities were apprised by public rumour of a piece of news it would have been so important to conceal.

Everything was forthwith prepared in expectation of a rising, and, during the night of the 29th to the 30th of April, all the posts were doubled at Marseilles. The conspirators, on the other hand, found themselves under the necessity of hurrying the dénouement.

On the 30th, at about five in the morning, three or four hundred fishermen, who were assembled on the esplanade of La Tourette, which commands the sea and roads, were summoned to arms by beat of drum. They responded by confused cries, but none put themselves in motion. Armed with swords and pistols, some of the conspirators went through the groups, striving to excite them. It was in vain. Several boats that were in the port hastily withdrew.

A threatening summons to the consigne had but the effect of making the douaniers lower the tri-coloured flag, which was torn to pieces. The tocsin rang at the St. Laurent Church, and already did the flag of Legitimacy float on the steeple. Meanwhile, the crowd increased, but it chiefly consisted of women. On almost all faces only curiosity, indifference, or suspicion, was to be read.

"It is a movement got up by the police," whispered some persons. The conspirators began to be disheartened. After advancing some steps on the post, they made up their minds to go up the St. Jean quarter again. The doors and windows closed everywhere on their passage, and the very persons who encouraged them by their cries, abstained from following them.

They were then sensible that the movement was a failure, and resolved on dispersing; but, at that moment, the head of the gathering appeared in front of the Palace of Justice. A small detachment of the 13th of the Line was on guard there, under the command of the Sub-Lieutenant Chazal. That officer perceived a small party arriving in confusion, and, in its first rank, a young man who shook a white handkerchief at the end of a vine-branch. He ordered his men to form their ranks, and himself stepping forward, whilst the gathering dispersed, arrested MM. de Candolle, de Bermond, and de Lachau, who had been separated from their companions.

At one o'clock a note was handed to the Duchess de Berri, in her retreat; it contained but the laconic warning, "Le mouvement a manqué, il faut sortir de France."

The Duchess de Berri was saddened, but not dejected. She wished to reach Spain, thence to repair to La Vendée. It was represented to her that the storm still raged—that no boat could at that moment put out to sea—and that, besides, the alarm having been given, the shore was covered with attentive douaniers. She then resolved to reach La Vendée, by crossing France, and nothing could shake her determination in that respect. * * *

She, therefore, left her place of refuge, lost herself in the woods, was compelled to pass the night in a wretched hut, the door of which it was necessary to break open; and ultimately sought a refuge under the roof of a Republican, to whom she presented herself, saying, "I am the Duchess de Berri." The Republican offered a generous and discreet retreat to the fugitive mother of a Pretender.

On the 2nd of May, at five in the evening, she entered the chateau of M. de Bonrecueil, one of her most zealous adherents, and, on the evening of the 4th, she was en route for the west, with MM. de Mesnard, de Villeneuve, and de Lorge, in a cabriolet drawn by post horses. She had taken leave of her friends with the three words, "Messieurs, en Vendée!"

THE RETURNED SOLDIER. He found the ancient couple seated at the fire, the old man reading a chapter in the Bible, as was his custom always before he and his aged partner retired for the night to rest. The landlord explained the object of the soldier's visit, and inquired if any of their children answered the description of the wanderer. "It is our Jock!" exclaimed the old woman, passionately, "and the puir neer do-weel has come at last to close his mither's eyes." "Nay," said the landlord, "the man's name is Wolly." "Then he's nae our bairn," returned the old man, with a heavy sigh. "Weel, weel, his will be done!" said his helpmate, turning her blue and faded eyes to Heaven; "I thought the puir lad, for I saw often made wud yet be granted, and Jock wud come hame and get my blessen' ere I died." "He has! he has!" exclaimed a broken voice; and the soldier, who had followed the landlord unperceived, listened at the cottage door, rushed into the room and dropped kneeling at his mother's feet. For a moment she turned her eyes with a fixed and glassy stare upon the wanderer. Her hand was laid upon his head; her lips parted as if about to pronounce the promised blessing; but no sounds issued, and she slowly leaned forward on the bosom of the long-lost prodigal, who clasped her in his arms. "Mither, mither! speak and bless me!" Alas! the power of speech was gone for ever. Joy, like grief, is often fatal to a worn-out frame. The spirit had calmly passed; the parent had lived to see and bless her lost one, and expire in the arms of one who, with all his faults, appeared to have been her earthly favourite.—Maxwell's Wanderings.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The half-yearly meeting of the members of the Coffee and Eating-house Keepers' Association was held on Monday evening at Anderton's Hotel, Fleet-street, Mr. Marshall in the chair. The secretary commenced the business by reading the report, which gave a gratifying account of the steady and increasing prosperity of the institution. The committee and other officers having been appointed, and the report approved of, the meeting broke up.

COLDBATH-FIELDS PRISON.—There are at this time upwards of 1000 individuals in confinement in this prison for various offences. Nearly 200 prisoners were sent away during the week to Tothill-fields prison, there being no room for them at the House of Correction.

CHARACTER AND GENIUS OF HANNIBAL.—Hannibal's genius may be likened to the Homeric god, who, in his hatred of the Trojans, rises from the deep to rally the fainting Greeks, and to lead them against the enemy! so the calm courage with which Hector met his more than human adversary in his country's cause is no unworthy image of the unyielding magnanimity displayed by the aristocracy of Rome. As Hannibal utterly eclipses Carthage, so, on the contrary, Fabius, Marcellus, Claudius, Nero, even Scipio himself, are as nothing as when compared to the spirit, and wisdom, and power of Rome. The senate, which voted its thanks to its political enemy, Varro, after its disastrous defeat, because he had not despaired of the commonwealth, and which threatened either to solicit or reprove, or to threaten, or in any way to notice the twelve colonies which had refused their accustomed supplies of men for the army, is far more to be honoured than the conqueror of Zama. This we should the more carefully bear in mind, because our tendency to admire individual greatness far more than national, and, as no single Roman will bear comparison with Hannibal, we are apt to murmur at the event of the contest, and to think the victory was awarded to the least worthy of the combatants. On the contrary, never was the wisdom of God's providence more manifest than in the issue of the struggle between Rome and Carthage. It was clearly for the good of mankind that Hannibal should be conquered; his triumph would have stopped the progress of the world. For great men can only act permanently by forming great nations; and no man, even though it were Hannibal himself, can in one generation effect such a work. But where the nation has been merely enkindled for a while by a great man's spirit the light passes away with him who communicated it; and the nation, when he is gone, is like a dead body, to which magic power had for a moment given an unnatural life; when the charm has ceased the body is cold and stiff as before. He who grieves over the battle of Zama should carry on his thoughts to a period thirty years later when Hannibal must, in the course of nature, have been dead, and consider how the isolated Phœnician city of Carthage was fitted to receive and consolidate the civilization of Greece, or by its laws and institutions to bind together barbarians of every race and language into an organized empire, and prepare them for becoming when that empire was dissolved, the free members of the commonwealth of Christian Europe.—Dr. Arnold's Rome.

THE ENGLISH YEOMAN.—There is no class of men, if times are but tolerably good, that enjoy themselves so highly as farmers. They are little kings, their concerns are not huddled into a corner, as those of the town tradesmen are. In town, many a man who turns thousands of pounds per week, is hemmed in close by buildings and cuts no figure at all. A narrow shop, a contracted warehouse, without a yard of room besides to turn in, on any hand, without a yard, stable, or outhouse of any description, perhaps hoisted aloft up three or four dirty pair of stairs, is all the room the wealthy tradesman can bless himself with; and there, day after day, month after month, year after year, he is to be found, like a rat in the hole of a wall, or a toad in the heart of a stone or of an oak tree. Spring and summer and autumn go round, sunshine and flowers spread over the world, the sweet breezes blow, the sweet waters murmur along the vales; but they are all lost upon him; he is the woful prisoner of Mammon, and so he lives and dies. The farmer would not take the wealth of the world on such terms; his concerns, however small, spread themselves out on a pleasant amplitude, both to his eye and heart; his house stands in its own stately solitude; his offices and out-houses stand round extensively, without any stubborn and limiting contraction; his acres stretch over hill and vale; there his flocks and herds are feeding; there his labourers are toiling: he is the king and sole commander there; he lives among the purest air and most delicious quiet. Often when I see those healthy, hardy, full-grown sons of toil going out of town, I envy them the freshness and repose of the spots where they are going to. Ample old-fashioned kitchens, with their chimney-corners of true projecting-beams and seated, still remaining; blazing fires in winter, shining on suspended hams and flitches. Guns supported on hooks above, dogs basking on the hearth below. Cool shady parlours in the summer, with open windows, and odours from garden and shrubbery blowing in. Gardens wet with purest dews, and humming at noon-tide with bees; and the green fields and verdurous trees, or deep woodlands lying all around, where a hundred rejoicing voices of birds or other creatures are feeding; there his labourers are toiling; he is the king and sole commander there; he lives among the purest air and most delicious quiet. Often when I see those healthy, hardy, full-grown sons of toil going out of town, *I envy them the freshness and repose of the spots where they are going to

Trolling for pike is a pleasant method of taking them. The trolling rod has several small rings fixed on every one of its joints; upon the butt-joint is fitted a reel; on the reel are wound from thirty to forty yards of strong silk line, which passes through the rings of the rod, and is then fastened to the gimp, with which the hook is armed. The hook itself is a compound of two small perch-hooks, put back to back. Between the hooks hangs a little chain, and at the end of the chain a small plummet; the plummet is to be sewed into the mouth of a dead fish, roach, dace, or gudgeon, the hooks being left outside, exposed to sight. The bait, thus fastened, is to be kept in motion in the water; sometimes suffered to sink, then gradually raised—now drawn with the stream and now against it. If the pike be in the neighbourhood, he mistakes it for a living fish, seizes it, and runs off to his lurking place, where he, in a few minutes, gorges it; then you give a sudden jerk, play with him till he is tired, draw him towards the bank, and then, with a landing-net, bring him on terra firma.

For live-bait fishing, the hook is baited by passing it through the fish's lips, or beneath the back fin; a large cork float is used, and a gudgeon is considered the best live bait: two or three swan shot will be requisite to keep down the bait, which should swim about mid-water. When a fish bites, he must be allowed a few minutes to pouch his bait, as in fishing with the gorge hook.

TRIMMING FOR PIKE.—There are several sorts of trimmers. One is made of flat cork, or any light wood, painted, seven or eight inches in diameter, turned round, with a groove in the edge large enough to receive a fine whip-cord, or stout silk line, twelve to fourteen yards long, or, at least, five yards longer than the depth of the water; a small peg, two inches long, is fixed in the centre, with the end slit; and use a small double hook, fixed to a brass wire link. Insert the baiting needle under the side fin of the bait, and keep it just within the skin of the side; bring it out beyond the back-fin, drawing the wire after it, and the hook, when drawn home, will be partly covered by the side-fin; one end of the line is of course fixed to the cork, the other to the loop in the wire; the line is slightly put into the slit of the peg, to keep the bait at a proper depth (from three to four feet), and to prevent it untwisting the line out of the groove. The trimmer should always be started on the windward side of the pond, and the rougher the water the better the sport. If not seized in one trip, it must be taken up, and started from the windward side again. Another plan is to take a bladder, and fasten a hook to it, baited as directed above, and set it off in the same way, from the windward side of the pond, and if a pike should seize the bait, you will have some sport in seeing the bladder pulled under water from time to time, and again rising when the fish is tired; and you will at last find that the bladder will be victorious.

But the most amusing method of taking a pike is to get a goose, gander, or duck. Take one of the pike tackle I have told you of before; tie the line under the left and over the right wing; turn the goose off into a pond where there are pike, and there is no doubt of good fun between the goose and the fish.

The following amusing account of a similar sort of curious fishing is extracted from "M'Dirmid's Scrap Book, 1820:"—"Several years ago, a farmer in the immediate neighbourhood of Loch Maber, Dumfriesshire, kept a gander, who not only had a great fund of wandering himself, but also delighted in piloting forth his cackling harem to weary themselves in circumnavigating their native lake, or in straying amidst forbidden fields on the opposite shore. Wishing to check this ingrain habit, he one day seized the gander just as he was about to spring into the pure breast of his favourite element, and tying a large fish-hook to his leg, to which was attached a dead frog, he suffered him to proceed upon his voyage of discovery. As had been anticipated, the bait soon caught the eye of a greedy pike, which, swallowing the deadly hook, not only arrested the progress of the astonished gander, but forced him to perform half-a-dozen summersets on the surface of the water! For some time the pike was seen labouring; the fish pulling and the bird screaming with all his might—the one attempting to fly and the other to swim from his invisible enemy—the gander one moment losing and the next regaining the centre of gravity, and casting unanswerable inquiry-like look at his snow-white flock of geese and goslings, who cackled out their sympathy for their afflicted commodore. At length victory declared in favour of the feathered angler, who bearing away for the nearest shore, landed on the smooth green grass one of the finest pike ever caught in the Castle Loch. This adventure is said to have cured the gander of his propensity for wandering, but for the truth of this we cannot vouch."

ANGLING FOR CHUB.

(From a Correspondent.)

I do not perceive that any particular allusion is made in your last week's article on Chub Angling to the excellence of the humble bee as a bait. Undoubtedly a chafer is the most killing bait of any, but then it cannot be used with success except in mornings and evenings—for an obvious reason—chafers are only to be found on the wing in the early and latter parts of the day—remaining all the middle part of it in a sleepy state, hanging by their claws under the leaf of the maple, the beech, the mountain ash, the wild cherry, or such other shrubs or trees as may happen to grow in the locality; they prefer the maple, on which they feed voraciously.

When the chafers have ceased to buzz about the ears of the morning angler, and the sun dispelling the mist on the surface of the stream,

> "——— From his dominions
> Flingeth a glory like the golden glow
> In which spring clothes her emerald-winged minions;"

then is the time for the humble bee to be used, which will be in most cases successfully

Near this town is a high bank, jutting out, promontory-like, into the Thames, without trees or shrubs of any kind, but clothed towards the river with wild thyme, and other herbs and flowers of many and varied scents and hues; round it the river flows with impetuous force, forming a deep and rapid stream. Here the chub are taken with chafers early in the morning; but as soon as the sun has risen over the wood on the opposite side of the river, and its beams have expanded the petals of the wild flowers, many a "blythe bee" may be seen "disporting" on the bank, and many a rare old chub watching them from the deeps below, ready to seize any that may approach too near the surface; as such times the humble bee is a certain bait, and the chafer no longer attractive; a striking proof of the power of instinct, and of the necessity for the angler, who hopes for success, to study closely, and follow carefully the rules of nature in preparing and adopting his baits.

We angle here for chub with a long line, say thirty or forty yards above the place we suppose them to haunt, and let it swim down the stream without a float, and using only a shot or two to sink it a little if the stream be very rapid.

Great Marlow, July 6, 1842.

ORIGIN OF QUARRELS.—The sweetest and most clinging affection is often shaken by the slightest breath of unkindness, as the delicate rings and tendrils of the vine are agitated by the faintest air that blows in summer. An unkind word from one beloved often draws blood from many a heart which would defy the battle-axe of hatred, or the keenest edge of vindictive satire. Nay, the shade, the gloom of the face familiar and dear, awakens grief and pain. These, in the elegant words of the preacher, are little thorns which, though men of a rougher form may make their way through them without feeling much, extremely incommode persons of a more refined turn in their journey through life, and make their travelling irksome and unpleasant. Oh! how careful ought we to be not to darken over and mutilate the sweet images of hope, and joy, and peace, that might gild the current of our own and of our companions' lives, by suffering these spots to mingle with them,—these shadows of upas leaves to be reflected in the stream!

MONEY MARKET.

CITY, Wednesday Evening.

The Stock-markets have remained in a quiet state all day; very little business has been transacted, and values have not undergone any material alteration.

In Railway Shares, Edinburgh and Glasgow were quoted 47; ditto, New, 3½; Great Western, New, 61½ to 62; ditto, Fifths, 8⅜; Brighton, 34; Blackwall, 9 to 9⅛; Birmingham, quarter shares, 47; SouthWestern, 62; Manchester and Leeds, 76; ditto, new, 35; Midland Counties, 69½; Northern and Eastern, 40½ to 40⅝; South-Eastern, 23 to 23½; ditto, Scrip, 3; and York and North Midland, 86½ to 87.

LIVERPOOL, July 19.—SHARE-MARKET.—A fair amount of business has been transacted to-day, but has closed sellers. Eastern Counties have sold at 8⅛ 9; new, £6 9s 2d; debentures, £10 9s 2d; Grand Junction, 83½; Lancaster and Preston, 34; thirds, 20⅛; Liverpool and Manchester, 184; London and Birmingham, 189; old thirds, 60; South-eastern and Dover, new, 3⅜. In Banks, the Borough has sold at 12⅝ ex. div.; North and South Wales, 4⅛.

MANCHESTER, July 19.—SHARE-MARKET.—Our market has been very firm to-day, with a good inquiry for railways, but owing to the continued scarcity of stock, only a limited business has been transacted; higher prices would in most cases have been given. Our quotations are:—Liverpool and Manchester, halves, 84; Lancaster and Preston, 30; Ditto, three-quarters, 20 to 21; Manchester and Leeds, 75 to 75⅛; South-Western, 61½ to 62; Manchester Assurance, 9⅞ to 10.

CORN EXCHANGE.—During the present week the arrivals of English Wheat up to Mark-lane have been very moderate, yet the stands have been somewhat heavily supplied with surplus samples of both red and white. The finest qualities have gone off at prices about equal to those noted on Monday, but other kinds have had a downward tendency. Of Foreign Wheat upwards of 44,000 quarters have come to hand within the last eight days, most of which has been offering free of duty; the trade, in consequence, has ruled heavy, and the quotations have given way quite 1s per quarter. Barley and Malt have been in short supply, and sluggish inquiry, at late rates. We have received more than 33,000 quarters of Foreign Oats, which have sold slowly, at an abatement of 6d per quarter. In other kinds of spring corn no variation has occurred.

Wheat—Essex and Suffolk, Red, 51s 52s 54s; fine, 54s 56s 59s; old, 55s 58s 60s 63s; White, new, 52s 54s 56s; fine, 60s to 63s; superfine, new, 62s 66s 68s 69s; Talavera, 57s 58s 59s; old, 66s 68s 70s; Foreign, free, 53s 54s 56s; fine, 56s 60s 62s; superfine, 62s 65s 66s.

Rye—New, 35s 37s.

ELECTION PETITIONS AND CORRUPTION.

The Election Petition Compromises Committee have laid their report before Parliament, and it is a document in all senses important and remarkable—important as involving the great question of electoral liberty and purity, and remarkable as presenting the most astounding series of corrupt disclosures that ever startled a community into a conviction of the existence of any lurking moral and constitutional sore. There is a just confession to be made, too, after the perusal of the report, that Mr. Roebuck, who instituted his committee upon bold and broad charges and promises, has vindicated these promises abundantly, and made good his charges before the world. We are disposed to award him, upon these grounds, the praise which is due to manly, honest, and emphatically English conduct. He has dragged the giant of corruption from his bed of filth, and lifted him up in his hideous deformity before the loathing and astonished eyes of mankind. He has set him up in the pillory of public opinion, a landmark of disgrace, and shame, and hate. He has not allowed the acts of constituents, nor of known and powerful individuals, to compromise his career of inquiry and disclosure, but upon all alike has fixed his brand of guilt. Nor does he seem in this instance to have allowed personal predilections to creep into the question, or to have based his fabric of evidence upon any other than the strongest public grounds. Moreover, he has worked out his purpose with much daring and persevering intrepidity, in the teeth of powerful opponents, and under the weight of an obloquy, which it required either the pride of truth or the strength of Hercules to endure. We confess to having doubted the entire purity of his motives before, but conviction is forced upon us by his report; and we will neither be unjust enough to withhold from him the praise of patriotism now, nor ungenerous enough to deny the amount of good which is likely to result from his most complete triumph over public corruption on the one hand, and public slander on the other. He must be acknowledged to have beaten the Times newspaper by the arguments of practical evidence; and what is of infinitely more import to the country, to have bearded the lion of bribery in his den. And the public must also remember that, in this report, he does not speak alone, but by the corroborative voices of all who were associated with him upon the committee—men of various parties and honourable principles, and having only the ends of truth and justice within their view.

Let us now turn to the important facts that have been disclosed—and which amount in substance to this result; that, in several most important places of public election, the most heartless and abandoned profligacy has prevailed—that people, holding the franchise, have first sold themselves by wholesale—in groups, and droves, and classes, like cattle at a fair, and that they have afterwards been sold again by the high contractors for their votes—sold at struck bargains—handed over in the gross—made the marketable materials for promissory notes—I. O. U.'s—bills of exchange and bonds of forfeiture—and treated as such beasts perhaps deserved to be treated, but still in a manner quite as disgraceful to the seducers as the seduced. Take a few items of what your free-born Englishmen were content to court and submit to, and of what your high-born gentlemen could degrade themselves to acheive. Behold the debasing pictures, even though they make honesty indignant, and put human nature to the blush.

First Harwich returns two members to Parliament, and more than half its constituency sell themselves outright. It is in the evidence of the report—

"That the sum of money expended by Mr Attwood for the election of himself and Major Beresford was, as early as the examination, £6,800; and that of this sum a large portion was expended to prevent bribery on the part of the sitting members, and paid chiefly at periods subsequent to the election. This sum is exclusive of the money paid by the Compromise. The person said to be employed for the purpose of giving the money to electors, like others to distribute it, was a banker of the town, who has died since the election. That among thirty-three persons a sum of above £3,000 was distributed in direct bribes. That Major Beresford paid no part of this sum, he not having contributed to the expenses of the election. That the gross cost of the election on the part of Sir D. Le Marchant was, as nearly as can be ascertained, £1,500; and that a part of this sum, how much does not appear, was spent in an illegal manner; and £500 went to pay certain former outstanding accounts. That the gross cost of the election to Mr. Bagshaw was £50. And it appears also that the bills against Sir D. Le Marchant and Mr. Bagshaw, to the amount of between £300 and £400, remain yet unsettled."

Well, after all this corrupt infamy has been perpetrated to buy a constituency consisting of 182 (!!) electors, the contending parties first petition against each other, and then "swop the seat," upon condition—

"1. That Major Beresford was to retire, by accepting the Chiltern Hundreds, within a month after May 3.

"2. That Sir D. Le Marchant was to be allowed to stand unopposed by Mr. Attwood and his agent.

"3. That Mr. Attwood should pay by way of deposit, as guarantee, £2,000, which was to be forfeited, provided that the engagements entered into by Mr Attwood on behalf of himself and Major Beresford were not fulfilled, Mr Attwood himself stating that he considered that he had paid the sum of £2,000 out and out. The remaining £500 was paid for Mr. Attwood by his agent, Mr. Currie.

"4. That the petitions against the return of the sitting members should all be immediately withdrawn.

"That the petitions were consequently withdrawn, and all further proceedings arrested."

We have no language to describe the abomination of all this transaction. We brand the four candidates as all alike disgraced; and if they plead personal ignorance of the bribery (which it seems most sickening hypocrisy to do), then they are as much disgraced by the compromise—we, for one of thousands who will think with us, value not their public honesty at a doit. As for the wretched electors they are an insult to manhood. But Harwich will be disfranchised of course.

At Lewes the same dehumanising and destructive system was carried on. Seven thousand pounds were spent in treating and bribery among the voters. The defeated party then threatened to punish the victorious, for acts of which both had been guilty alike. To save expense and detection the seat was quietly sold or compromised; and if money did not pass to clinch the bargain, it is quite clear that exposure was dreaded and guilt connived at in the act of compromise alone.

At Reading we have only another episode of the same rascally shuffling and evasion; but here the gingerbread of corruption is again tipped with gold. A disgraceful arrangement is entered into, with the following rider to its scandalous condition —

"That in the event of the petitioner's election not being effected in the way above proposed, the sitting members will forthwith pay (£2000) two thousand pounds to the petitioner.

"London, May 2, 1842. "C. RUSSELL.
"Witness, C. A. SAUNDERS. "CHELSEA."

These bargains speak for themselves; and it is to be hoped that they will speak with an universal voice to the country, that this horrid corruption may be rendered as helpless as it is infamous—and not only be stigmatized, but crushed.

Last, not least, we have the damning case of Nottingham. It does indeed crown the apex of the whole mountain of filth that has been piled up before the committee—it is the very crater of the seething and smoking Ætna, that has been so long bursting into flame.

In Nottingham there are between five and six thousand electors; and a pleasant, honest race of people they must be, when some £16,000 is required to get them to register, in favour of any party, their innocent and immaculate votes! We need not go into the details of the bribery; it is enough to know they were handsomely bought and sold—that the election was bad in its core—that it was petitioned against vigorously—and that to quash proceedings, the following delectable memorandum was drawn out:—

"Memorandum.—London, May 4, 1842.]

"NOTTINGHAM ELECTION PETITIONS.

"It is expedient to settle the petitions now pending, and it is agreed that—

"1. All the petitions shall be abandoned.

"2. Within four days from this date one seat shall be vacated.

"3. The sum of £1000 to be paid to Messrs Clarke, Frynmore, and Fladgate, within seven days from this date, in consideration of the expenses incurred in the petition.

"4. It is understood that Mr. Walker is to be returned at the election resulting from the above mentioned vacancy; for security whereof, it is agreed, &c., &c.

"5. That a promissory note for £4000, signed by Sir John Cam Hobhouse or Sir George G. De H. Larpent, at three months from the date, shall be this day deposited with Messrs. Cocks, Biddulph, and Co., Bankers London, and that James Bacon, Esq., and Sutton Sharpe, Esq., shall decide whether the above conditions have been honourably fulfilled, and if such referees act in case of their disagreement, an umpire appointed by them shall decide: that such conditions have not been honourably fulfilled, then the promissory note in question shall be handed to Mr. Walker; or returned to Sir John Cam Hobhouse or Sir George G. De H. Larpent, if such conditions have been honourably fulfilled.

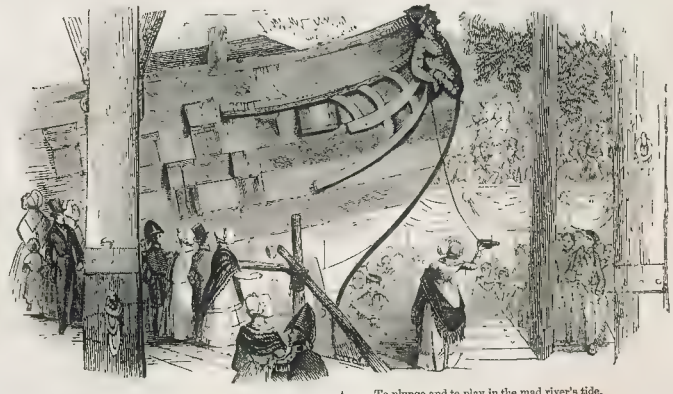
DYSON, HALL, and PARKES.

"Agents to Sir J. C. Hobhouse and Sir George G. de H. Larpent.
"W. M. FLADGATE,
"For the petitioners and Mr. Walter."

Sir John Hobhouse gives his £4000 promissory note, and Mr. Fladgate also acknowledges for Mr. Walter the receipt of £1000 for his share of the costs; and so Nottingham, and Sir George Larpent, and Sir John Hobhouse, and Mr. Walter, rejoice together in their diplomatic souls.

Now—with every consideration for the honest pride of the different constituencies involved, as well as for the fine feelings of the delicate gentlemen who have been bartering over their franchise—we record our deliberate opinion, that if they had been all of them committing and compounding felonies together, there would not have been an iota more of moral wrong adhering to their most unwashed characters, than we find covering, and fouling, and ulcerating them at the present time. Our doctrine is, that in nearly every case the compromise was as bad as the corruption; and at least, it was one of its direct fruits; and irrespective of all persons and all parties, we rejoice in the staring and authoritative disclosures that have been made—disclosures that must force a remedy upon the sterling common sense of the community, and tend to cleanse the sewers and sluices of our electoral system, in spite of the teeth of those who battle for its abuse.

We repeat that Mr. Roebuck has done his duty well—and in so doing it has done good service to the whole community besides.



Goliath! Goliath! strong-girt for the wave,
Light smiles from the lovely, loud shouts from the brave,
Shall greet you, fresh giant, with gladness, to-day,
As you breast the proud waters to plunge and to play!

To plunge and to play in the mad river's tide,
Till you join in your might your more boisterous bride
Till the ocean rolls round you her billows of foam,
And you find in the wild sea—wife, palace, and home!

Goliath ! whence win you your threat-bearing name ?
Who says, "Go forth in glory and sail unto fame,
Speed flight through the world on your war-[illegible] wings,
The terror of nations—the queller of kings ?

Or on your peace-errand, repose on your deep,
Like the eagle watch-tired—the lion asleep !
So the strangers who see you so calm on your path,
May love you in slumber, but dread you in wrath ?"

Who says, "Britain's star is above you—the eye
That watches your way through the waves from the sky ;
That glows when you battle, that gleams when you rest.'
Who says, "Go forth, GOLIATH, on glory's behest ?"

Who ? A beautiful woman, a light of our isles ;
One of those who win love, or spur courage with smiles ;
And who, gay in her loveliness, clasps the bright wine,
In a flask she will break on that proud head of thine !

Her hand is the lily, her cheek is the rose ;
'Neath her touch, how the wine in its glass-prison glows !
How its sunny beads mount up, and sparkle, and flash,
Like her eyes, as she now sets them free with a dash !

A dash ! all is over—the bottle she broke
With the one mystic word that her cherry lips spoke—
"Goliath !" All heard it, and shouted around,
Till the sky caught the echoes that rung from the ground !

"Goliath !" away ! Now a grand bird of war,
Spread your wings and your sails, and your prowess afar !
Bear your way o'er the waters in grandeur and pride,
Like a sea-wedded warrior rejoiced in his bride !

In strife more than fourscore fierce thunder-voiced tongues
Shall rear forth their rage from your lead iron-lungs ;
While, through flashes that follow shall gleam your proud form
On its mountains of billows, the King of the storm ;

In quiet—a noble majestic repose
May find you reclining on sunshine or snows,
As silent and steady and true as the glaive
That leaps from its scabbard when war calls the brave.

And shall not the brave, and the noble, and good,
Young Giant, have life within thy ribs of wood,
And the Old Wall of England that floats on the sea
Gain spirit, and strength, and endurance, from thee ?

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.—A highly respectable and very numerous meeting of the English now in Paris met on Saturday afternoon, and voted an address of condolence to the King of the French. The Gazette de France had been seized at the Post-office, and at the printing-offices, on account of seditious articles on the Regency question.

(From the papers of Saturday.)—The King received M. Dupin yesterday evening ; in the morning M. GUIZOT was received by the Duchess of Orleans. The Royal Ordonnance, appointing the Duke de Nemours to be commander-in-chief of the army of operation on the Marne, has been officially published. The Prince de Joinville, whose arrival at Toulon we have announced, is expected to reach Paris in the course of to-day. The committee of linen manufacturers have just addressed a circular to the growers of hemp and flax, the linen manufacturers, and persons generally interested in the linen question, in which they express their fears that the treaty granted to Belgium will prove highly injurious to France.

The French Chambers were opened on Tuesday by the King of the French in person, surrounded by his four surviving sons, the Duke de Nemours, the Prince de Joinville, the Duke d'Aumale, and the Duke de Montpensier. No doubt was entertained in Paris but that the regency bill, providing for the case of the Count of Paris coming to the throne prior to the age of eighteen, at which his majority is to be fixed, and assigning the functions of regent to the uncles of the royal minor in the order of primogeniture, would pass by large majorities in both chambers. We need scarcely repeat that the guardianship of the Count of Paris, now the only royal, and of the Duke de Chartres, his brother, will remain with the Duchess of Orleans. It was not anticipated that the dynastic opposition would allow the session to terminate without an attempt to upset the ministry.

The Gazette of Upper Germany, of the 22nd, in a Paris letter, affirms that the Duke of Orleans's will contained the phrase, "The King of France must carry a sword as well as a sceptre."

Frankfort letters of the 22nd inst., received in Paris last Monday, state that a distinguished diplomatist, a representative at the German Diet, was heard to say, "The sooner we are ready for war the better."

It appears that the works for the fortifications of Ulm and Rastadt are to be advanced with the greatest speed.

The day of the Duke of Orleans's death, the prefect of the Meurthe received a letter from the prince, accepting the fête offered to his royal highness by the town of Nancy. Having received a copy of this letter, we lay it before our readers, to whom it will not fail to be interesting, from being probably the last lines traced by the prince, the date being July 12 :—"The kind invitation which you transmitted to me in the name of the town of Nancy, has really embarrassed me, my dear prefect ; but I am happy to say I can accept this mark of politeness, without, however, failing in my military duties. The only way possible to attain this double end is this : the 21st July I will go through Nancy without stopping, in order to reach Luneville early. I could inspect the division of dragoons, the 22nd and 23rd, in the morning. The 23rd, in the afternoon, I would return to Nancy, where the Duchess of Orleans would be arrived from Epinal. I would review the national guard and the garrison troops. I could then receive the authorities ; I would give them a dinner ; then, in the evening, the Duchess and I would go to the ball that the town desires to give us. The 24th, in the morning, we would set off to sleep at Phalsbourg, for, on the 25th, we are expected early at Strasbourg, and I am obliged to make the Duchess travel by very short stages. Will you be kind enough to express to the mayor and common councilmen my pleasure in receiving their invitation ? and receive, my dear prefect, the assurance of my esteem. Your affectionate,

"FERDINAND PHILIPPE D'ORLEANS.

"Tuileries, July 12, 1842.

"P.S. Have the kindness to inform General Villette officially of this change."

OPENING OF THE FRENCH CHAMBERS.—THE KING'S SPEECH.—PARIS, Tuesday, July 26.—The new parliament assembled this afternoon, the King presiding at the ceremony. The opening of the chambers was to have taken place on the 3rd of August, but owing to the frightful catastrophe now afflicting France, and the royal family, the period of convocation had been hastened. Interesting at all times as a meeting is of the French legislature, never did it present such an important aspect as at the actual crisis.

The announcement that Louis Philippe, notwithstanding his severe sorrows, would attend the opening, and deliver the customary royal speech, added a distressing interest to this day's proceedings. The tribunes reserved for the public, admitted of course by tickets, commenced filling at ten o'clock, and at noon were all occupied. Two rows of seats were taken from the place of the Deputies, to add to the accommodation of the ladies, most of whom were attired in deep mourning. The tribune from which the deputies speak was removed, and the President's bureau as well. In its place was a gilded arm chair, covered with red velvet, and on each side were two stools similarly decorated for the four surviving sons of the King. The first deputy who entered the chamber was M. Golberg, who, last session, introduced a bill to form a journal for the use of the house, but which was thrown out. M. Golberg has a mortal antipathy to the press personages, and he bestowed a mortal glance at their gallery when he entered. M. Janvier, a friend of M. Guizot, was the next deputy visible, but before noon the members arrived in great force, but I remarked that they did not form into groups on the floor of the house as formerly, and on looking into the Salles des Pas Perdus, I found the distinguished men having their confab in that locality. M. Theirs, us usual, was shaking hands with everybody and chatting in a very lively manner. M. Odilon Barrot was also very animated with his chin.

Thiers, with all his apparent liveliness, was looking, I thought, anxious. His hair is becoming greyer, and he looks shorter than ever. M. de Salvandy's toupet was quite unique. Lamartine, the poet, was philosophising, and Count Molé, who entered after all the peers had taken their seats to the right of the throne, appeared abstracted. The entrance of the diplomatic corps in the tribune reserved for them excited a sensation. The peers were very numerous, and had, besides their official costume (gold embroidered blue coats), crape on the left arm and sword. The council of state sat beneath the bench occupied by the ministers. At a little before one the latter entered. Marshal Soult, the president of the council, took the lead. M. Guizot took his seat next to the Marshal. M. Martin (du Nord), keeper of the seals ; Duperré (marine), Teste (public works), Duchâtel (interior), and Lacave Laplagne (finance), were all at their post's.

At one o'clock the artillery booming within the walls of the chamber announced that the royal cortege had left the Tuileries. Several general officers entered the chamber and took their places on each side the royal platform. Seven royal carriages composed the procession, the first containing the King and his sons. On each side of the royal carriage, close to the windows, rode officers. A squadron of dragoons headed the cortege, and infantry, as well as cavalry, were the escort. The public was kept from the right side of the Seine, the gardens of the Tuileries having been also cleared. At twenty minutes past one the huissier of the chamber called out, "Le Roi," and the King entered it amidst deafening shouts of "Vive le Roi." Everybody stood up, and the King, tottering, with tears streaming down his cheeks, kept bowing and placing his hand to his heart. At length he sobbed out aloud, and dropped into his chair, whilst the cheering was renewed again and again, and the ladies—I may say men also—wept piteously. The Duke de Nemours, the Duke d'Aumale, the Prince de Joinville, and the Duke de Montpensier, sat on each side of the King. They were all in the respective uniforms of their regiments, the King being in that of the national guards, with crape round his arm, and wearing black gloves. The King, having put on his hat and spectacles, began to read the royal speech.

"Gentlemen, Peers, and Deputies,—In the grief which overwhelms me, deprived of that beloved son whom I thought destined to succeed me on the throne, and who was the glory and the consolation of my old days, I felt the necessity of advancing the moment of your assembling round me. We have a great duty to fulfil together. When it shall please God to call me to him, it is necessary that France and its constitutional monarchy be not for a moment exposed to any interruption in the exercise of the royal authority. You will have, then, to deliberate on the measures necessary to obviate, during the minority of my well-beloved grandson, this immense danger. The blow that has just struck me, does not make me ungrateful towards Providence, which still preserves to me children so worthy of my tenderness and of the confidence of France.

"Gentlemen, ensure at no-dip ensure the repose and the security of our country. I will summon you later to resume, on affairs of state, the usual course of your labours."

It was really most distressing to watch the poor King struggling with his parental feeling during the delivery of the speech, and vainly essaying to pronounce it with steadiness. The royal princes were all deeply affected, as well as the entire assemblage. After the oaths of allegiance had been taken by the deputies, the Keeper of the Seals declared the session of 1843 open. The King then rose to depart, when the cheering was renewed. He walked with a firm step and was quite erect. He recovered his self-possession on leaving the chamber. The firing of artillery announced the conclusion of the ceremony, and the King returned to the Tuileries at two o'clock. He will leave for Neuilly to-night. The National Guards along the lines cheered him, but there were some cries of "A bas Guizot ! bas le Ministre de l'Etranger."

The Duke and Duchess of Montrose were present at the royal sitting.

The funds rose when the speech was known at the Bourse.

SPAIN.—The correspondent of the Times, in a letter dated Madrid, July 15, says, "I am happy to be able to inform you that the new Minister of Finance, whose principal claim to notoriety arose in the first instance out of his patriotic sentiment, 'to make short accounts with the creditors of the nation,' has been induced to proceed (for the present) on a more civilised system, and even to take some steps to render justice to our suffering countrymen. He has entered into a contract with Messrs. Oliver and Co. for the payment of half-a-year's pay due to the British Auxiliary Legion, and I understand that the proceeds are to be despatched to-day or to-morrow to London."

THE QUEEN OF SPAIN'S MARRIAGE.—We find the following in the Sun of Monday :—"The continued efforts of the English Cabinet to give to the Queen of Spain a Prince of Coburg for husband have excited a high degree of interest in Austria, as the Duke of Coburg-Cohary belongs to that country by his large possessions in Hungary. Recently, the King of the French addressed Duke Ferdinand as Royal Highness, which gave rise to much comment, although it was, perhaps, a mere expression of politeness. It is certain, however, that the English Cabinet has taken steps to insure to this ducal family the title of royal highness, and it is even said that Queen Victoria has addressed an autograph letter to this effect to a German Sovereign."

PORTUGAL.—The accompanying despatches were received, per Lady Mary Wood, steamer, at Falmouth, with Peninsular mails, and bear date from Gibraltar, 14th ; Cadiz, 15th ; Lisbon, 18th ; and from Oporto and Vigo, on the 19th instant.

LISBON, July 18.—The business transacted in the Cortes last week, offers but little interesting. In the Upper Chamber, Count Lavradio moved that the newly-created peers should not be allowed to take their seats in the house, which was rejected. The government was interrogated respecting the news from Goa, which state that the troops had revolted, and that the governor-general, Lopes de Lima, had fled to Bombay, and that a provisional government had been established. The most important information is, that a large body of Spanish troops are approaching the frontiers, in order, it is reported, to enforce, if necessary, the fulfilment of the exactions which the Spanish Government have made through Senor Aguilar, who is daily expected in Lisbon, viz. compensations of no simple nature for the compulsion and violence used towards the four galleons in Oporto, to accompany some criminals to the scaffold, which made a great stir at the time, and negotiations of not a very favourable kind to the Portuguese, relative to the free navigation of the Tagus. The government here has issued a decree for the immediate completion of the enlistment of 4295 recruits, which are yet wanting to complete the number voted for in December, 1841 ; and commissariat orders have also been forwarded to the military arsenal, to send without delay to Elvas, and other frontier towns, stores, ammunition, &c.

BELGIUM.—The Belgian minister of the interior has addressed a circular to all the governors of provinces in Belgium, announcing that the treaty between France and that country, relative to the linen trade, has been signed.

BRUSSELS, July 21.—A letter from Paris announces that his Majesty King Leopold will shortly quit Neuilly, where he will leave her Majesty the Queen, and return for a third time to Brussels.

July 22.—The Duchess of Kent is expected very shortly at Brussels, where she will stay for some days. The King had made several promotions and nominations in the army on the anniversary of his inauguration.

ST. PETERSBURGH, July 11.—Yesterday evening a salute of artillery announced to the inhabitants of this city the arrival of the imperial family, and of his Majesty the King of Prussia at the palace of Isiagen. The King of Prussia has conferred the order of the black eagle of the first class on Prince Alexander Gitsen, and on Prince Vassielchikoff, president of the council of the Empire.—Journal de St. Petersburgh, July 12.

The Augsburg Gazette of the 21st inst. states, that the news of the death of the Duke of Orleans caused the funds to fall 1½ per cent. at Berlin. A courier was immediately despatched with the intelligence to the King, who was at Konigsberg.

We have received from the Levant a mass of correspondence, but it contains few particulars of interest.

Our private letters from Beyrout of the 1st instant announce that there had not been any fresh disturbances at Lebanon. The Druses, who had been carried off thence, still remained in the prisons at Beyrout. The emir Abdallah, of Gazir, had quitted the British frigate on board which he had sought protection. He had received a formal promise from the Turkish authorities that he would not be further molested, on condition that he should not return to his own district for some time. The French corvette Corsaline had arrived at Beyrout.

EGYPT.—ALEXANDRIA, July 6.—The following proclamation has been published in the Alexandria Commercial Gazette, as emanating from the British Consulate :—"We, John Lawrence Stoddart, her Britannic Majesty's Consul in Alexandria, in Egypt, instigated by the considerations on which were based the Regulations of his highness the Pacha of Egypt, in date of 9th November, 1834, decree as follows :—1. That any individual British subject who shall come to Egypt, with the intention of establishing himself, shall prove during the first day of his arrival in Egypt, by means of passport or his consul, to his consulate a guarantee among the respectable inhabitants of the country, who shall answer for the integrity of his moral conduct. 2. Every individual, already established in Egypt, shall fulfil the prescribed conditions of the preceding article. 3. Any captain who shall have brought passengers incapable of procuring the prescribed qualifications shall be obliged to take them back to Europe at his own risk and peril.—(Signed) J. L. STODDART, Alexandria, June 30, 1842."

Our intelligence from Alexandria of the 6th inst. states that Said Pasha, the son of Mehemet Ali, a youth of twenty-two years of age, had been appointed admiral-in-chief of the Egyptian fleet. The Viceroy had suffered a serious loss by the death of Selim Bey, one of the most distinguished officers of the Egyptian army, and general-in-chief of the artillery, who died of a coup de soleil in the thirty-third year of his age. The plague continued to rage at Alexandria.

A letter from Alexandria, of the 26th ult., states that on the preceding day a French vessel, despatched for the purpose from Marseilles, had brought the intelligence of the failure of Messrs. Briggs, Thurburn, and Co., of London. One of the partners of the house in Alexandria connected with that firm, waited on the minister, Boghos Bey, with the news, and was accompanied by him to the palace to communicate it to the Pasha, who expressed much sympathy at the misfortune, and handsomely offered to Messrs. Briggs and Co., of Alexandria, whatever aid they might desire ; but it appears that none was required.

GREECE.—ATHENS, July 10.—On the 3rd inst., the Danish frigate Thetis arrived at the Piræus, having on board Prince Frederick William of Hesse Electoral, heir presumptive to the throne of Denmark. His royal highness embarked yesterday on board the Otho steamer for Nauplia, from whence he proceeded to Syria to join the French steamer, which takes him to Constantinople. The Vanguard, 80, Captain Sir David Dunn ; the Cambridge, 78, Captain Barnard, and Phœnix steamer, arrived here on the 4th instant. It is understood that Sir Stratford Canning considers it advisable to have an English naval force in the Levant to watch the movements of that of France. Admiral Lasusse was at Syria a few days since, and embarked health-office guardians, with whom he proceeded to Patras. The Phœnix left last night for Constantinople. The Vanguard and Cambridge sailed this morning for Syria and the Dardanelles. The Monarch, 84, is gone to Malta.

A letter from Constantinople, July 6, in the Augsburg Gazette, mentions a rumour that Sir Stratford Canning had announced his intention of giving in his resignation, if coercive means should not be resorted to for the purpose of compelling the Porte to make the required concessions on the Syrian question. No fact is mentioned, however, to give an air of probability to this rumour.

WEST INDIES.—The Trinidad papers make a special complaint of the inconvenience the merchants of that island sustained in the despatch of their mail to meet the general West India mail, which appears to have been caused by the interference of the new company's agent in the transmission of their letters. The agricultural report for the month of May states that the unfavourable condition of the weather had almost put an end to sugar making, that the crop was almost completed, this was of no material importance.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—SATURDA

The Earl of Shaftesbury took his seat on the woolsack. The Poor-law Amendment Continuance Bill, the Irish Fisheries Bill, and several private bills, were read a first time. The Poor-law Amendment Bill to be read a second time on Tuesday; and the peers to be summoned.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—SATURDAY.

Several estate and private bills were read a third time, and passed.—On the order of the day being read for going into committee on the Copyright of Designs Bill, Mr. Phillips objected to a measure of so much importance being discussed on Saturday, particularly after a week of excessive labour. After two divisions for adjournment, and a long and tedious conversation, the bill passed through committee, and was ordered to be reported.—The committee on the Newfoundland Bill was postponed until Wednesday next.—The Lunacy Bill was read a second time.—The Manchester, Birmingham, and Bolton Police Bill was read a third time and passed.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The Earl of Shaftesbury presided, in the absence of the Lord Chancellor, who continued indisposed.—Lord Campbell postponed till Thursday the motion to prohibit the barring of members of the House of Commons as counsel at their lordships' bar. He did this on account of the absence of the Lord Chancellor, the cause of which he deeply regretted.—The Marquis of Clanricarde postponed the second reading of the Sudbury Disfranchisement Bill until Tuesday.—A conversation took place between the Bishop of London and Lord Wharncliffe on the subject of national education, at the conclusion of which the Lord President distinctly denied that Government had any intention of establishing normal schools in which religious instruction was not to be included.—The Earl of Devon moved the re-commitment of the Mines and Collieries Bill.—Lord Brougham forcibly admonished their lordships of the danger of any rash and excessive interference with the labour of the people in the manner in which they should deal towards their children.—The Marquis of Londonderry, in support of his objections to the measure, read several communications, for which we refer to our report. The noble marquis moved an amendment to refer the bill to a select committee.—The Earl of Devon, Lord Haddington, and the Earl of Galloway opposed the amendment.—The Earl of Ripon supported it.—Their lordships then divided—For the original motion, 49; for Lord Londonderry's amendment, 3; majority, 46.—In committee, several amendments were proposed and negatived.—An amendment limiting the powers of inspectors to report to the cases which they had examined, and to the fact of the provisions of the act having been attended to or otherwise in each distinct case, was adopted on the motion of the Marquis of Londonderry.—The remaining clauses having been agreed to, the house resumed, the report was read, and the third reading was fixed for Friday.—The Exchequer Bills Prolongation Bill was read a third time and passed.—The other Bills on the table were advanced a stage, and their lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

J. C. Colquhoun, Esq., took the oaths and his seat for the borough of Newcastle-under-Lyme, in the room of T. G. Harris, Esq., unseated by the report of a committee.—Sir R. Peel laid on the table, by command of her Majesty, the papers relating to the commercial treaty between this country and Portugal.—On the motion of Sir R. Peel the Joint Stock Banks Bill was read a third time and passed.—On the motion of going into committee of supply, Mr. T. Duncombe moved for papers relating to the imprisonment of certain persons in the county of Stafford for attending a Charles lecture.—Mr. Hume seconded the motion.—Sir J. Graham opposed the motion, on the ground chiefly of the inexpediency of a political interference by that house of the administration of justice.—A debate ensued, in which Mr. E. Buller, Mr. Aglionby, Mr. Hawes, the Attorney-General, Mr. O'Connell, Sir R. Inglis, the Solicitor-General, Mr. Sheil, Sir R. Peel, Viscount Palmerston, Mr. Villiers, Mr. Bankes, and Mr. M. Philips, took part; the house divided—For the motion, 32; against 116; majority, 84.—On the question that the house resolve itself into committee being again put, Mr. S. Crawford called the attention of the house to the state of the poor in Ireland, and moved, "That the distressed state of Ireland loudly called on the house and the Government to consider the [illegible] some relief."—Lord Duncannon said that, [illegible] on this subject, he could not admit that there was anything in the condition of Ireland to inspire despondency. On the contrary, a general improvement of the people and the country was in progress. He did not think that the disturbances and agricultural distress existed which almost yearly took place.—Mr. O'Connell did not think any practical good could arise from the motion.—The motion was withdrawn, and the house resolved itself into committee.—Several votes were passed without opposition.—On the motion that a sum of £11,634 be voted for defraying the charges of the officers, &c., of the household of the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, Mr. Hume disapproved of this expense, and would gladly see the Lord-Lieutenant's office abolished altogether. He understood the present Lord Lieutenant was about to be withdrawn.—Sir R. Peel said the hon. gentleman's reference to the present Lieutenant of Ireland was a peculiarly unhappy one, for he could assure him that so far from his lordship being about to be withdrawn, his conduct in the administration of the affairs of that country had met with the most decided approbation of her Majesty's Government. The Lord Lieutenant was about to leave Ireland for a short period, in order to re-establish his health, which they all felt to be highly valuable.—On the vote of £30,000 for carrying on the improvements of the Caledonian Canal, Sir G. Clerk stated that this vote had been founded upon the recommendations contained in Sir Edward Parry's report.—Mr. Williams objected to the vote, and characterized the measure as a job.—Sir R. Peel supported the grant, which, after a few words from Mr. F. French, was agreed to.—On the proposal of the vote of £39,100 for the expenses of the coinage, the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated, in reply to questions from hon. members opposite, that 337,180 new sovereigns, £10,000 half-sovereigns, 40,000 half-crowns, and 334,000 shillings, had been lately issued.—The vote was then agreed to.—£60,000 was then granted to enable her Majesty to grant gratuities to the officers, seamen, and marines lately employed on the coast of Syria.—Several other votes having been taken without opposition, the house resumed.—Lord Elliot obtained leave to bring in a bill to alter the number and define the boundaries of the several parishes of the county of Dublin.—Lord Stanley obtained leave to bring in a bill to continue the Western Australia Act.—The house then adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

The Earl of Shaftesbury presided, the Lord Chancellor's indisposition still preventing his attendance.—The Duke of Wellington, in moving the second reading of the Poor Law Amendment Bill, expressed the satisfaction which, as one of those who had originally approved the measure, he felt at its general operation. In many cases it had certainly been carried too far—buildings which had acquired the nickname of bastiles, had been unnecessarily erected, and these had been so constructed as to inflict uncalled-for deprivation upon the inmates. He had seen much of the practical working of the [illegible] tem, however, and was satisfied with the general management. The noble duke then proceeded to enumerate the alterations and deficiencies in the present bill, and concluded by promising that whenever addi[illegible]ught be required to render it complete should be introduced by next s[illegible]n.—Lord Stanhope had hoped that ministers would have acted only a continua[illegible]on for one year of powers which in former times would not have been tolerated for a day. He cited a number of authorities, beginning with Coke and Blackstone, and reaching down to the opinions delivered by the present Lord Chancellor and the judges, to prove that the powers vested in the commissioners were unconstitutional: and attributed a large proportion of the existing distress to the operation of the Poor-law, and especially to the prohibition of out-do[illegible] relief, by which all who required assistance were compelled to submit to imp[illegible]sonment within the walls of buildings which had justly earned the name of "bastiles." The principle originally acted upon was to discontinue altogether out-door relief; but this had been found impossible, from an apprehension of its consequences. A fearful increase of crime, however, and a general destitution among the labouring classes, had been the result of its partial operation; while, so far from economy being secured, the rates had in many instances been trebled. The noble lord then noticed briefly the want of a court of appeal for the labourer and the mode of investigations into cases of hardship by the assistant commissioner and, after remarking upon the danger of rebellion [illegible]inst such atrocious oppression as the law permitted, closed that bill by read a second time that day [illegible] months.—Lord Brougham complained of the constant repetition of wanton defamation against the bill, and reproved Lord Stanhope for having, by appealing to the passions of the people, tempted them to forsake their allegiance.—The amendment was negatived without a division, and the bill then read a second time.—The County Courts Bill was read a third time; and several other bills having been forwarded a stage, their lordships adjourned to Thursday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

Mr. V. Smith, Mr. Estcourt, and the O'Conor Don, were sworn members of the general committee of elections, in the room of three members who had resigned.—Mr. Wyse was defeated by a majority of 90 to 41 in an attempt to introduce into the Birmingham Grammar School Estate Bill clauses to alter its constitution, the most important of which was a clause to add to the governing body five of the Birmingham town council ex officio. The bill, without those determining clauses, was read a third time and passed.—In reply to Sir F. Burdett, Sir R. Peel stated, that in pursuance of the undertaking of Lord John Russell on the part of her Majesty's Government, he felt bound to propose an address to her Majesty, praying for the removal to mercy of Mr. Frost.—In reply to Lord Exmouth, Lord de Saumarez, and Sir Sidney Smith; and in reply to a subsequent question by Mr. Hawes, the right hon. baronet said he should make the motion during the present session.—In reply to Mr. F. French, Sir R. Peel stated that he had received an assurance from the Portuguese Government that an arrangement would be made for the discharge, by [illegible] instalments, of the claims of the Portuguese legion.—Mr. Hume and Mr. Bodkin[illegible] objected to the proposal to erect monument at the public expense to the [illegible] officers above mentioned.—A conversation arose on the subject of [illegible]passage in a recent sermon of the Rev. H. Melvill, which had been quoted by Mr. M. Gibson in a former debate, by the former hon. member for Manchester, for the purpose of vindicating the rev. gentleman, whom he stated to be his relation; and the object was fully accomplished.—The Colonial Passengers Bill was read a third time.—On the question that the bill do pass, a discussion took place, in the course of which several members argued against the measure, as creating a new kind of slavery.—Sir Stanley Lees gave a very able and effective speech in support of the bill, which, on a division, was passed by a majority of 118 to 59.—The Assessed Taxes (No. 2) Bill was read a third time and passed.—On the motion of Sir J. Graham, the report of the Parish Constables Bill was received, after considerable opposition.—Several bills having been advanced in their respective stages, the house adjourned at half-past one o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—WEDNESDAY.

The house did not sit.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

Mr. Roebuck gave notice that he should, on Friday, move the three following resolutions: "That the compromise of election petitions, as brought to the knowledge of this house, by the report of the committee on election proceedings, must, for the future, be considered to be without parliamentary censure, tend to bring this house into contempt with the people, and thereby seriously to diminish its power and authority. That all such practices are hereby declared to be a violation of the privileges of the people and the rights of the privileges of this house; which it will in all future cases strictly inquire into, and severely punish. That whereas in the late elections for Harwich, Nottingham, Lewes, Reading, Falmouth, Sudbury, and Bridport, the most active means have been found insufficient to protect the voters from the mischievous temptation of bribery, it is ordered that Mr. Speaker do cause the writ for any election of members for the said towns, till further legislative enactments have been adopted to protect the purity of elections."—Mr. C. Buller moved the order of the day for the committee on the Bridport Elections Bill (No. 2).—Mr. Macnenon, who had [illegible] until that day three months, now opposed the measure on three grounds [illegible]ath, as the 23th clause of [illegible] to his own crimination, [illegible] of Commons [illegible] desirous to discuss so trifling, as well before as after the [illegible] of the writ.—Mr. C. Buller, who had the conduct of the bill, at length postponed the clause for further consideration.—The concluding lines of the 2nd clause, which subject members, candidates, and agents, to examination by an election committee, were resisted by Sir R. Inglis, lest they should be construed to give what, however, the Attorney-General said that, in point of fact, they did not give the power of compelling those parties to criminate themselves.—Mr. C. Buller observed, and was confirmed by the Solicitor General in the observation, that the examination here authorized was not into bribery, but only into corrupt practices.—Mr. Darby moved to enlarge the words conferring this authority.—Mr. Bright objected to such similar corruption, but he objected to investigate it by [illegible]w and hitherto illegal means, and he thought there was no way of dismissing the parties as to the compromise, without examining them as to the bribe [illegible] Mr. Hume supported the clause.—The Attorney-General answered that under this clause the candidate or agent would be asked only what had occasioned the compromise; and if he answered that it had been occasioned by bribery, he could not be asked who had committed it.—Mr. Roebuck said, he considered the circumstances of it.—The Attorney-General then proposed, for the removal of doubt, to add the words, "subject to the ordinary rules of evidence."—Mr. O'Connell objected thus to shelter the parties. If they were innocent, they would answer willingly; and if they were guilty, he had no sympathy with them. With respect to an intimation thrown out by Sir R. Inglis, that [illegible] question at least as serious an offence as bri[illegible]y, Mr. O'Connell, with [illegible] strength of the great [illegible] party on the trial of an Irish [illegible]on, and has re[illegible] on source, however, that [illegible] the ballot.—The Attorney-General [illegible] to the practice of [illegible] party on the trial of an Irish [illegible] from the Court of Chancery, which examination was often directed by that court, but always took place, subject to the ordinary rules of evidence. The clause passed, with the addition of another to the committee to inquire into the [illegible] these alterations were regarded by Mr. Aglionby as so mutilating to the bill, that he avowed his hope of seeing Lord John Russell, who is in the house, at some forward next year with an avenging proposal of ballot and extended suffrage.—Sir R. Inglis asked, whether it would be worth the while of Ministers to consume any more time upon a bill, of which the first clause had undergone several hours, and which there was obviously no chance of passing into law during the present session?—Sir C. Peel said, he would not encourage the proceeding, if he were hopeless of completing the measure in this session; but if it could be so completed, it could hardly fail to have a beneficial effect, in the way of shortening, upon such elections as might take place during the recess. He would recommend that the committee should now proceed, without needless consumption of further time. Mr. Darby observed, that there would be no new petitions on the ground of bribery, when he withdrew one he understood that honour was precluded from getting the seat by means of compromise. Mr. Hume objected to the principle of the 3d clause, which allowed petitioners, during general bribery to be presented at the public expense after the expiration of the time limited for presenting election petitions. Such alterior petitions, though not allowed to affect the seats, would be generated extensively by vexatious and vengeful motives, which would be indulged without control where the public was to defray the cost.—Mr. C. Buller said that there was a check in the section, which requires the petitioning party to enter into recognisance for payment of costs in case of his petition being voted frivolous and vexatious.—Mr. Harris likewise objected to the clause; his opinion, however, being that no one would petition when there was no chance of getting the seat.—Mr. Henley called the attention of the house to the anomalous position in which they would be placed if a member whom an election committee had seated, were three months after [illegible] pronounced by a new committee to have been guilty of extensive bribery, in spite of which he would be still entitled to sit and vote.—The question was [illegible] for a division; but during the exclusion of strangers the debate was resumed. The division, however, was not long delayed, and the result of it was the adoption of the clause.—The section which provides for the recognisances having limited its amount to £500, an amount obviously too small to check vexatious petitions, Mr. Hume moved that the recognisance should be £1,000, which was agreed to.—The 14th and following clauses, which went to constitute the commission of peers and members of Parliament for prosecuting any such inquiry into extensive bribery as should have been recognised by a report from a committee of the House of Commons, were objected to by Mr. O'Connell, and by several other members, on the score of privilege.—Mr. Roebuck advised that this part of the subject should stand over till the next year, when there must be a revision of the tribunal for the trial of election committees.—A probably a delegation of some of the powers of the house to a committee, giving competent legal knowledge, and free from party bias.—Sir R. Inglis took the same view—not without expressing some surprise at finding a concurrence of opinion between himself and Mr. Roebuck. He regretted the abandonment as a surrender of the privileges of the house.—Sir R. Peel thought [illegible] was [illegible] of privilege, but a question of legislation, for the purpose of [illegible] moved commission would go only to the question of disfranchising the boroughs, which must eventually be a matter of both Houses of Parliament equally. It, therefore, saw no objection to the proposed commission on the ground of principle. He intimated a doubt, however, whether at this period of the session it might not be expedient to omit these three clauses; and he was persuaded that even without them the bill would have effected great benefits.—Mr. Hume recommended it to Mr. C. Buller to withdraw these [illegible] Mr. O'Donoghue exhorted him to persevere in them. A [illegible] wasted in unprofitable talk. Then Mr. C. Buller [illegible] some disposition that was ultimately [illegible] the counsel of Sir R. Peel, to withdraw the clauses. The 34th [illegible] motion for election committees, and the tribunal [illegible] under this bill, to report answers from magistrates and others to all questions, even when [illegible] as to what might criminate themselves, was questioned by the Attorney-General.—Mr. C. Buller defended it as essential to the bill, and as removing the greatest evil existing in the discovery of fraud.—The Attorney-General had the strongest objection to this clause, more especially as it was followed by another, affording to witnesses a prospective indemnity against all penalties, and thus holding out to them, beforehand, a premium for corruption a cheer of corruption; but, indeper dently of that subsequent clause, the principle of this compulsion to criminate was a most objectionable one; and he denied the doctrine that it was more important to obtain conviction for bribery than to preserve the great moral rules of evidence. This was the tyrant's plea, who sought to introduce new laws for every case.—Mr. O'Connell maintained the expediency of the enactment. He did not think there could be much revolting encouragement to crime in a clause which thus provided for its eventual detection.—Mr. Parker was of opinion that a distinction might be readily drawn between the case of that agent who, having partaken in the offence, had no fair title to protection, and the case of that agent whose [illegible] knowledge of such offence was derived from the information professionally communicated to him by one of the parties for the purpose of his defence. Lord Palmerston argued that the indemnity clause would not encourage bribery, because no man could tell beforehand that he would be one of the persons protected. He considered this a very essential part of the bill.—Accomplices were admitted in all cases; and even in high treason the Crown could obtain the evidence of any offender by a pardon.—The Solicitor General maintained, from the experience of other countries, that these powers are not conducive to the discovery of truth. As to the indemnity, the analogy put by Lord Palmerston failed, for the Crown, though it could pardon a crime, could not pardon it prospectively. Bribery though a great crime, was not the greatest of crimes; and, if this principle were adopted as to bribery, it might be applied to every other offence. Much had already been done to put down bribery; on every petition proceeding upon the commission of it, at the late general election, the member had been unseated; and when the fact should be generally known the offence would be effectually checked.—Mr. Sheil proposed to add words enacting that no man's answers, thus obtained, should be given in evidence against him.—The committee divided, rejecting the clause by a majority of 60 against 39.—The next clause was advocated by Mr. Aglionby and others, but condemned by Sir R. Peel, who expressed his strong objection to a statutary prospective indemnity. Upon this Mr. C. Buller gave up the clause; but Mr. Sharman Crawford, though it was now one o'clock, thought it to waste a little more time in a division.—The enactments for throwing the costs of petitions under this bill upon the counties, cities, or boroughs where the bribery had been practised, were all struck out.—The clause abolishing the bribery oath was opposed by Mr. Escott and Mr. Sheil, and withdrawn by Mr. Buller; and thus the bill passed through committee.—The house adjourned at half-past two.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

The Lord Chancellor, who appeared to retain little trace of his recent indisposition, occupied the woolsack.—On the motion of the Duke of Wellington, the Exchequer-bills Preparation Bill was read a third time and passed.—On the motion of the Earl of Ripon, the Custom Acts Amendment Bill (No. [illegible]) was read a third time and passed.—On the motion of the Duke of Wellington, the Poor Law Bill was committed, and all the clauses were agreed to.—Lord Campbell moved the adoption of a standing order against hearing members of the other House of Parliament at the bar in the character of counsel.—The Lord Chancellor, in an able speech, resisted the motion.—Lord Brougham also opposed the motion.—After some remarks from the Marquis of Clanricarde, replied to by Lord Campbell, the motion was negatived without a division.—The Limitation of Actions (Ireland) Bill was read a second time.—Several other bills were forwarded a stage, and their lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

[illegible]ntment of a committee to try the merits of the Athlone election was fixed for the 23rd of August current.—On the motion of Sir G. Clerk, the Court of Exchequer (England) Bill was read a third time and passed.—In reply to a question from Mr. D'Israeli, in respect to the negotiations on the claims of British subjects upon France, Sir R. Peel [illegible] would [illegible]BAM and Sir R. Peel severally repudiated reports concerning interviews with deputations, and said that if [illegible] continued to put forth inaccurate statements, Ministers [illegible] be compelled to refuse interviews or to maintain a sullen silence.—Captain Fitzroy moved for leave to bring in a bill to provide for the execution of [illegible] against [illegible].—Mr. A. Chapman seconded the motion, which was agreed to.—Mr. Roebuck moved the thi[illegible] Mr. Hawes [illegible] contested election [illegible] Mr. Hawes [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

MOXHAY'S BUILDING.

THE IMPROVEMENTS IN THREADNEEDLE-STREET.

The whole of the scaffolding having been removed from the front of the new building just erected on the site of the French Protestant Church in Threadneedle-street, an opportunity is afforded of examining, in extenso, the various proportions and the numerous architectural designs of the structure now so nearly completed. The most striking feature is the elegant and classical bas-relief which extends nearly the entire length of the front, above the large window. The execution of this work, which has occupied a space of nearly ten months, is bold and spirited, and the conception is exceedingly ingenious and original, although, in consequence of its strictly allegorical character, some little explanation is necessary. This differs essentially from mythologiesl subjects, inasmuch as in the one the imagination is left entirely to its own resources, the figures being purely ideal, whilst in the other there is the history of the various heathen deities to serve as a guide. The attitudes of some of these allegorical figures are particularly graceful and full of life. That of Britannia holding out the cap of Liberty to the captive slaves is, we conceive, in bad taste, inasmuch as an emblem of so revolutionary and sanguinary a character as the cap of liberty, associated as it is with all the horrible atrocities of the French Revolution, can never fail to excite feelings of horror and disgust; and the artist has certainly not shown much taste or discernment in assimilating the blessings of emancipation from the horrors of negro slavery with the intolerable licentiousness and revolting depravity of the French sans culottes! The centre figure, with outstretched wings, is intended to represent Commerce, supported on each side by two recumbent figures, representing Peace and History. To the left is a personification of Genius landing on Enterprise, the Arts and Sciences following in his train. The conception of this portion of the bas-relief is happy, as demonstrating the natural consequences of a state of profound peace, in fostering and encouraging commerce, the wealth derived from which is most becomingly employed in the promotion of the fine arts. At the other extremity is a group of savages, eagerly advancing to hail the arrival of Genius and his attendants. This is, however, it must be confessed, a somewhat far-fetched idea. On the right of these savages, forming the other division of the bas-relief, are several figures symbolical of Industry, some bearing the fruits of the earth, and others engaged with distaffs and spindles. Then follows Navigation, in the train of Astronomy and Geography; and at the end appears another group of negroes and slaves receiving their freedom from Britannia, or some female figure very much resembling her;—the whole tending to demonstrate the advantages, both moral and physical, attendant upon commerce, by the gradual promotion of civilization, the diffusion of knowledge, and the extension of rational liberty in all parts of the world. The design, on the whole, reflects much credit upon the artist, whoever he may be. The interior of the building is, we believe, rapidly drawing towards completion, and it will no doubt be ready for opening in two months.

STEAM NAVIGATION ON THE THAMES.—The number carried by the Iron Steam-boat Company, on Sunday last, to and from the various stations between London-bridge and Chelsea, was 30,000; the wooden boats of the London and Westminster Steam Company, carried upwards of 20,000 on the same stations; the seven steamers of the Waterman's Company, conveyed from the Adelphi-pier, Blackfriars-bridge, and Old Shades, to Greenwich, Woolwich, Blackwall, Wapping, and Charlton, 10,000 passengers, and brought back about the same number. The old Greenwich and Woolwich steamers conveyed to and from those places 30,000 souls, and there was an immense business doing between the railway-wharf at Blackwall and Gravesend, Greenwich, and Woolwich. The earnings of the Railway Company's steamers, the Blackwall, Railway, and Brunswick, between the terminus and Gravesend, exceeded £500. The Star and Diamond packets, the Father Thames and Sons of the Thames, the Eagle and the Falcon, and other Gravesend steamers, were all well filled, and the number of visitors who landed at Gravesend and the adjoining village of Northfleet, was about 35,000; the various steamers making about 80 trips to and from those places. The steamers which carried down passengers to the Rosherville-pier at Northfleet for 6d each, were fearfully crowded. The anxiety to obtain a cheap trip in those boats was so great, that more than 1500 persons were left behind at London-bridge, Greenwich, and Woolwich. There are now 140 steam-vessels navigating the Thames, in addition to the General Steam Navigation Company's fleet, and the Irish, Scotch, and foreign steamers. There will be at least 20 more next season, and the Waterman's Steam-packet Company have just determined on building five more, to be ready by the spring of 1843.

THE TOWER.—The number of persons who paid for admission to view the Tower for the week ending Saturday last, was 2534, viz., the Armouries, 1345, and the Jewel-office, 1189. Proceeds at sixpence each visitor, £63 7s.

THE LATE SOLAR ECLIPSE.—The appearances of this phenomenon at Pavia, as witnessed by Mr. Baily the astronomer, were every way extraordinary, unexpected, and most singular. At the moment when the total obscuration commenced, a brilliant crown of glory encircled the moon, like the "aureola," which Catholic painters append to their saints. Suddenly, from the border of the black and labouring moon, thus singularly enshrined, burst forth at three distant points, within the aureola, purple or lilac flames, visible to every eye. At this moment, from the whole assembled population of the town, a simultaneous and deafening shout broke forth. A similar manifestation of popular feeling is recorded at Milan, occasioned by the self-same astonishing spectacle, accompanied in the latter instance with a general "Huzzah! vivent le astronomes!" The Eclipse was also viewed from the Superga, near Turin, by our Astronomer Royal, Mr. Airy, apparently under less favourable circumstances.—Athenæum.

THE ISTHMUS OF SUEZ.—A letter from Alexandria of June 23, in the Frankfurter Gazette, states that Mehemet Ali has given to the French engineer, Mongel, a verbal assurance that he intends realising the cherished dream of his existence, viz., to connect by a canal the Red Sea with the Mediterranean. The letter adds, that the Pacha has written to Mr. Brunel, of London, to propose to him to undertake this great work.

An address of thanks to Mehemet Ali for keeping open the communication through Egypt in 1840, beautifully engrossed on vellum, with the Royal arms of England at the top, together with a large gold medal, bearing an admirable likeness of the venerable pacha, will be transmitted by the next mail to the English Consul at Alexandria, for presentation to his Highness. The address has no political bearing, and is signed by leading men of all parties.

A letter from Dresden, of the 18th instant, represents the Elbe to have become so shallow, that the water in general is not more than four feet ten inches in depth, and in many parts is fordable, so that for the time the river is unnavigable—a state without example in the memory of man.

SINGULAR OCCURRENCE.—A correspondent furnishes us with particulars of the following singular occurrence:—A youth living in Stockton was recently married to a young lady, but being under age, and having married contrary to the wishes of her guardians, the couple were separated. This had so intense an effect upon the mind of the young man that, in a few weeks, his hair, from being jet black, had become a silvery white.—Leeds Mercury.

THE QUEEN'S BARGE.

This splendid house-barge or galley, which has recently been undergoing a thorough repair at her Majesty's dockyard, Deptford, was built for George II. when Prince of Wales. Her length is 64 feet, and her breadth 6 feet, 8 inches. She is double-banked; manned by twelve oars, and the house will conveniently hold from twelve to fourteen persons. The last important occasion upon which she was employed was the funeral of the immortal Nelson, whose remains were conveyed in her from Greenwich to London. Since that period she has been laid up in the boat-house at Deptford, and narrowly escaped being sold a short time since in consequence of an order being received from the Admiralty to dispose of the unemployed small craft. In consequence, however, of the report of the master boat-builder at Woolwich dockyard, of her superior build and decorations, orders were immediately given for preparing her for the Queen. The whole of the carvings are in oak, and of the most superb workmanship. She is now being gilded, and her destination, when completed, is Virginia Water.

POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No. VII.

THOMAS DUNCOMBE, ESQ., M.P.

No member of the Imperial Parliament is better known than honest Tom Duncombe—or "Finsbury Tom," as his radical constituents more familiarly designate him. Ecce homo then,—here is the man, and he is one sui generis, both as regards his private characteristics and his public career. Purely aristocratic in his natural habits of life, in his dress, his manner, his personal demeanour, and the ensemble of what constitutes the outward gentleman, Thomas Duncombe, Esq., seems in principle to reverse the order of natural predilections, and the force of education and association—and throws himself politically out of the pale of aristocracy into the very lap of radicalism, directing all the force of his opinions against the order to which he belongs. He is the son of a large property-holder in the country, but he dashes his fist against the door of the granary to scatter the corn freely among the people. His companions are of the order of "men about town" of a certain class—men who combine many accomplishments with some fashion and more notoriety—men who are half country sportsmen and half London gentlemen—men whose reputation is made up of woman, equipage, and bon mot—men who are the oracles of tailors and carriage-builders—men of the D'Orsay, the Chesterfield, the Paget, the Greville, the Crockford Club school—but withal men who lord it behind the scenes of the theatres, and are looked up to as kings there and dashing gentlemen everywhere else. They are of a most agreeable, though rather dangerous class—but all their habits are certainly antagonistic to the patronage of the canaille; and yet being one of these—and truth to say the most aristocratic and the best—"Finsbury Tom" plunges neck and heels among the common people, and bursts in,—wristbands, kids, caubrics, and all,—upon the sweet-smelling populace of Saffron-hill, and the honest illuminators of the ingenuity of Field-lane. He holds his inquest upon the constitution, with a coroner for his "chum" and "pal," and brings in his verdict of "found rotten," like a perfect discriminator of what corruption is. He leaps out of his cab into the arms of Radicalism; and although clean to a shade, does not care how much of the ordinary dirt of humanity may cling to his constituents.

Now, abstractedly, there is something praiseworthy in all this. To stand out from one's kind in defence of one's opinion is manly and above-board; and Tom Duncombe (it is of no use to speak of him in his stays, and stiffen him out of his dear Christian abreviation), has never swerved.

We remember him nearly all through his career; and when he attracted more notice as the cher amie of Vestris, and the dashing pet of all the other ladies in the world—as the extravagant sporting gentleman—the club star—and the ready, clever, fascinating man of society—than as the political chief of whole thousands of out-and-outs of the Liberal school. But in any sphere—although in a quiet way—he has always been just the man to make a distinction for himself—to have a remarkability. He soon shone, therefore in a way of his own, in the political hemisphere. Either by purchase or inheritance, he had a property in Hertford—some hundred houses, perhaps, and since bought by that soft specimen of brainless humanity, Baron Dimsdale; and, upon the strength of this, his own pleasant reputation, and the personal prestige in his favour, he represented that nice borough in the teeth of the Salisbury interest for several years; and even on one occasion ventured upon "Jack Spalding" for a colleague. Hertford he kept in fine trim, and was adored by his own party. The ladies got up his portrait in mezzotint, and published him for pure love. The bargemen and bullies came from Ware to fight or feast for him, until Hertford was said to have grown like an old coat, by being "so much the worse for Ware." He impregnated the place, in fact, with a dashing immorality, which it has never quite got over; and was, like "Charley," quite the "darling of its heart." At last, however, the Tories got up in their might—a London editor was inveigled into the borough to write Tom down—the new-risen Conservative power managed to oust him at last; and thereupon, after dying game upon the bosom of a good strong petition, which vitiated the election of his rivals, he sold his houses in that quarter, and cut his constituency, as in duty bound. Then came a small interval in his career, which passed pretty smoothly over. We say smoothly, for many are the civil difficulties which a gentleman may encounter, in his simplicity, who has not the M.P. to his name. There is often but one jump from Parliament to the spunging-house; and as Tom Duncombe never aspired to be a Marcus Curtius, that was precisely the chasm into which he did not wish to leap. It was, however, pretty well understood that his affairs were in some measure tangled, although the baron's purchase-money might have unthreaded them for the nonce. Tom had, in a word, many responsibilities—he had got rather under the thumb of Jew King, the banker of Bolton-street; and as he was always generous, and sometimes improvident, the accommodation-bill system was pressing a little hard. We should be mute over these memorabilia, if the published transactions between our hero and Lord Edward Thynne had not made them fair subject of remark. And we are pleased to add here, par parenthese, that Tom Duncombe has come with clean hands and an honourable reputation out of every affair in which he has been by exigency or imprudence involved. Nevertheless, he could have worn no mourning on his sleeve when the general election opened to him the gates of the Finsbury borough, and he became once more M.P. These are letters that on days of rejoicing Tom could well afford to illuminate; and they would shine none the more lustreless, from the fact of one of his principle champions in procuring their resumal, having been Mr. Lawrance Levi, the sheriff's-officer of Fetter-lane. There is a bonhommie you see about Tom, that makes all classes love him alike.

Since his accession to Finsbury, Duncombe's career is well enough remembered. He has been always championising what is liberty in his own opinion, and manfully fighting for the classes of which he is declared the advocate. He attacks every corruption with a bold spirit, and displays a courage and sincerity in public affairs which all men admire alike. He seldom commits himself, and always maintains the demeanour of a gentleman—a line of conduct which we much suggest for imitation. He speaks gracefully, and with a frankness and spirit which make him often eloquent. He is a great advocate for theatrical interests—supports literature and the arts—speaks up against flogging in the army—attends public dinners with a free and cordial spirit—and opposes the ministers with all his might and main.

In companionship, he is one of the pleasantest fellows under the sun; for which same reason we sing unto him—

Here's health to thee, Tom Duncombe,
All this life's journey through,
And whether M.P. Tom or not,
May no Dun come to you!

THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue de la Chaussée, d'Antin, le 24 Juillet, 1842.

Mon cher Monsieur,—The death of the Duke of Orleans, which has eclipsed the hopes of a nation, will not fail to darken the summer sunshine of our gay fashions; and, for some weeks to come, I fear, I shall have but few nouvents to send you, which will suit the less gloomy meridian of your London parks and gardens. However, I forward you a little photograph of a charming morning and walking costume, which combines the great essentials of simplicity and elegance. The bonnet, you will perceive, is of medium dimensions. It is pink crêpe, and the blond fall is a mere edging at the top, plaiting inward at the bottom to the chin, like a cap, falling below the brim of the bonnet in lappets. The dress is of muslin; and I hope you will not fail to admire the graceful a plombe given to the figure by the fine tucks, each edged with a narrow bordering of lace. The long scarf of black lace thrown over all, gives a finish and chiaro oscuro, as it were, to the figure, which renders this costume, to my taste, the perfection of that elegant simplicity, on which Charles wrote those sweet lines in my album last winter. But a truce with other reminiscences than those of the toilet. Of what novelties shall I speak? Shall I tell you that the fans of our elegantes are now of lace; so that all the old manitures and scattered members of our discarded eventails are being looked up, to be made useful and ornamental, by the addition of any remnants of lace saved from the olden time; and a great taste, I can assure you, is displayed in the arrangement of patterns and borders for these female weapons of the ancient galanterié. The camail, or priest's hood and tippet, is much worn by our fashionables either in gay-coloured or shot silks, or in lighter material, and either with or without the hood. There is a transparent fabric with diagonal stripes nuances, with which every belle was preparing to be very killing in a camail, had not the untimely fate of our poor prince-royal thrown us all into mourning. Pelerines are worn rather shorter; and our fair equestrians have adopted Palmyre as a lighter material for their riding-habits. Sleeves are demi-larges; and as for skirts, they trail upon the ground! Never were our streets so clean, and our dresses so dirty! Some morning dresses of organdie in lilac blue, or rose-colours, embroidered in white round the bottom of the hem, have been much admired; but I need not tell you that these light affairs must give place to more melancholy hues until the autumn is past. Oudinot, the clever fellow who invented the horse-hair petticoats, has just published (may I use the word?) his pedscrine, a material for ladies' gaiters and boots, which is at once cool and light, possessing all the polish and suppleness of satin, with the lightness of gauze, and the strength of prunella.

JULIE.

THE CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. IV.

ST. BOTOLPH'S BISHOPSGATE-STREET.

The names of various places in this city speak of the peculiarities that once distinguished them, though the spots themselves have long since utterly changed their appearance and purpose. The "gates" of London are, with one exception, among the things that were, but the streets that stand on their sites still speak of them by their appellations. Immediately on the outside of the old city boundary that divided the district of Bishopsgate into its still retained distinction of "within" and "without," and on the very brink of the city moat (as we are told by Stow), once stood the old church of St. Botolph. It was a fitting spot; for where could piety find a more proper station for making its way to the attention of men, than that which Solomon tells us was the chosen seat of wisdom; "at the gate of the city, at the going in of the way"? The place was well chosen, if fitness of place could do all, but piety, like wisdom, has often, we fear, appealed to mankind in vain, and the moralist may say of one as of the other, "it crieth aloud in the streets, and no man regardeth it." Having no data on which to calculate the effect St. Botolph has had on the morals of the metropolis during the five or six centuries he has had a seat in this busy locality (no less busy that the site is gone), we will proceed to the history of the church, which is brief, and not very rich in historical associations.

St. Botolph was an East Saxon saint who died about 680. We have not alighted on any of the reasons for his canonization, but have no doubt that the renown was well deserved. We have a kind of fancy that his name, in latter times, was corrupted into Bardolph, and, if it could be proved, we apprehend that some of his namesakes degenerated sadly in their morals and principles, addicting themselves to sherry, sack, and canary, and haunting the taverns in the neighbourhood of Eastcheap; one of the name was met thereabout, if we recollect, by a certain William Shakspere, who has drawn his character very vividly; and it is remarkable how well acquainted we are with the tastes, habits, person, and pursuits of the reprobate, and what perfect obscurity has overtaken the life of the saint.

We know more of Bardolph than Botolph, and the stock of knowledge as to both is likely to maintain the same proportion. But to return: the first church is supposed to have been of very ancient foundation, though the first authentic account of it appears under the date of 1328, when a John de Northampton resigned the rectorship or living, which was then, as it still remains, in the gift of the Bishop of London. The old church escaped the devastating fire of London, which swept away so many others, but it fell to a no less sure, though more slow destroyer—time. In the lapse of centuries it became so ruinous that it was pulled down in 1726, and the present edifice built, it being completed in 1729. It is massy and spacious, but not imposing in its appearance, it being built of brick. The roof is hidden by a handsome balustrade. The steeple, though it has been objected to as heavy, is not without a certain air of magnificence. In the remainder of the building there is little to distinguish it, and nothing to particularise; the chief interest it possesses springs from what was once its particular site, and its extreme antiquity as a fabric dedicated to religion.

The Standard contradicts, on authority, the paragraph of the Dublin Morning Register, that a creation of baronets is in contemplation.

It is an English marksman, Lord Vernon, who has made most successful shots at the federal shooting match, this year.—Helvetic.

A SON OLDER THAN HIS FATHER.—At Freinwalde, near Berlin, a woman of 103 years of age has just contracted a fourth marriage with a man of 70. Amongst the children which the bride brought to her husband was "a boy" of 63!

EXTRAORDINARY HONESTY.—On Sunday, a gentleman after driving through Tottenham, discovered that he had lost a sum of money amounting to £35. The circumstance was advertised in the Times of Monday, and early on Monday morning a poor man presented himself, who explained that he was a groom out of employment, and that he had picked up the notes, together amounting to £35, near the Seven Sisters, Tottenham. He had been seeking employment, and had not a shilling left when he found the packet. He returned towards London, and at a public-house mentioned his prize, and was offered £20 for it—the offer was repeated but declined; and the groom, whose name is Joseph Lamb, having been informed of the advertisement, waited upon the person who had lost the money. We are happy to state that he was adequately rewarded, and has now a chance of employment.

EVERY BODY'S COLUMN.

A GENTLEMAN.

Gentility is neither in birth, manner, nor fashion, but in the mind. A high sense of honour, a determination never to take a mean advantage of another, an adherence to truth, delicacy and politeness towards those with whom you may have dealings, are the essential and distinguishing characteristics of a gentleman.

GUILT.

Guilt, though it may attain temporal splendour, can never confer real happiness. The evil consequences of our crimes long survive their commission, and, like the ghosts of the murdered, for ever haunt the steps of the malefactor. The paths of virtue, though seldom those of worldly greatness, are always those of pleasantness and peace.—Sir Walter Scott.

A FABLE.

Dr. Paris has just been with me. Pulse languid: he has prescribed a tonic. He talked of the folly of patients prescribing for themselves, and quoted a fable of Camerarius:—An ass laden with salt was crossing a brook; the water diluted the salt, and lightened the burden. He communicated his discovery to a brother donkey laden with wool. The latter tried the same experiment, and found his load double in weight.—James Smith's Memoirs, &c.

A DOUBTFUL ENCOMIUM.

The other evening, a lady having exerted her vocal powers for the amusement of the company at a soiree, received the following rather ambiguous compliment:—"Your singing makes you appear a delicious screecher (delicious creature).

HEIRS.

What madness it is for a man to starve himself to enrich his heir, and so turn a friend into an enemy, for his joy at your death will be in proportion to what you leave him.—Seneca.

POETRY AND SCIENCE.

The power of the mind, in the fervour of poetical composition, flows like a mountain torrent—sparkling, foaming, beautiful, and grand; but passing principally over rocks, and nourishing only the solitary tree, or the flowers of its mossy borders. The energy of the understanding employed upon the development of the truths of nature has a calm and quiet progress; in its motion it is like the navigable river; it bears upon it ships, it waters a fertile country, and what it wants in beauty it possesses in benefit; what is deficient in rapidity is supplied in strength.—Sir H. Davy.

LAZINESS.

A father asked a son of his own, what made him lie in bed so long? I am busied, said he, in hearing council every morning. Industry advises me to get up, sloth to lie still; and so they give me twenty reasons for and against. It is my part to hear what is said on both sides, and by the time the cause is over dinner is ready.

CIRCUMSTANCES.

He is happy whose circumstances suit his temper; but he is more excellent who can suit his temper to any circumstances.—Hume.

EXERCISE.

Walking is the best possible exercise. Habituate yourself to walk very far. We value ourselves on having subdued the horse to our use; but I doubt whether we have not lost more than we have gained by it. No one thing has occasioned so much degeneracy of the human body. An Indian goes on foot nearly as far in a day as an enfeebled white does on his horse, and he will tire the best horse. A little walk of half an hour in the morning when you first rise, is advisable, it shakes off sleep, and produces other good effects in the animal economy.—Jefferson.

IMPLEMENT.

Bacon has well described it as "The child of ignorance and baseness, far inferior to other parts, but nevertheless it doth fascinate, and bind hand and foot those that are either shallow in judgment or weak in courage, which are the greatest part; yea, and prevaileth with wise men at weak times; therefore see it hath done wonders in popular states, but with senates and princes less; and ever upon the first entrance of bold persons into action, than soon after; for boldness is an ill keeper of promise."

A GOLDEN RULE.

In reflections on the absent, go no further than you would go if they were present. "I resolve," says Bishop Beveridge, "never to speak of a man's virtues before his face, nor of his faults behind his back." A rule, the observation of which would, at one stroke, banish from society both flattery and defamation.

MENTAL CAUSES OF APOPLEXY.

Such is the power of the mind, there is scarcely a passion which has not, by excess of action, terminated existence. Love has done it, anger has done it; grief has done it; and also joy. But there is one mental emotion which, in our experience, never struck the human body with a fatal blow—it is hope. Hope, when well grounded, never creates evil; it is a true anchor. The other passions may agitate the soul, as the angel Bethsaida's waters: but hope rather resembles the healing influence that angel left behind.—Rowland East.

FORGIVENESS.

Among the ancients, forgetfulness of injuries was considered a virtue, the heathen philosopher even said, that to forgive one's enemies was to be equal to the gods. Cato, whom all the world admired, said that he forgave everybody but himself.

He who cheats the man that confides in him, in a witty manner, may make us laugh at his jest, and half disarm our anger; but reflection soon insures him our contempt and indignation.

At the moment, agitated as I was, I could not help thinking of a joke of Wells's own, in which he once suggested, in case of a quarrel between two bishops, the propriety of their going out to settle their difference with a brace of minor canons.—Gilbert Gurney.

The first person who, having enclosed a piece of ground, bethought himself of saying, "This is mine," and found people simple enough to believe him, was the real founder of civil society. From how many enemies, battles, and murders—from how many horrors and misfortunes would that man have saved mankind who should have pulled up the stakes, or filled up the ditch, crying out to his fellows, "Beware of listening to this impostor; you are undone if you once forget that the fruits of the earth belong to us all, and that the earth belongs to nobody."—Rousseau.

In order to enjoy the present, it is necessary to be intent on the present. To be doing one thing, and thinking of another, is a very unsatisfactory mode of spending life. Some people are always wishing themselves somewhere but where they are, or thinking of something else than what they are doing, or of somebody else than to whom they are speaking. This is the way to enjoy nothing, to do nothing well, and to please nobody. It is better to be interested with inferior persons and inferior things than to be indifferent with the best. A principal cause of this indifference is the adoption of other people's tastes, instead of the cultivation of our own; the pursuit after that for which we are not fitted, and to which, consequently, we are not in reality inclined. This folly pervades, more or less, all classes, and arises from the error of building our enjoyment on the false foundation of the world's opinion, instead of being, with due regard to others, each our own world. The hunters after the world's opinion lose themselves in diffusion of society and pursuits, and do not care for what they are doing, but for what will be thought of what they are doing; whereas compactness and independence are absolute essentials to happiness, and compactness and independence are precisely the two things which the generality of mankind most of all neglect, or even frequently study to destroy.

CALENDAR FOR THE WEEK.

Sunday, July 31.—Tenth Sunday after Trinity.
Monday, August 1.—
The fields are all alive with sultry noise
Of labour's sounds, and insects' busy joys;
The rangers o'er their glittering sickles stoop,
Startling full oft the partridge covys up;
Some o'er the rustling scythe go bending on;
And shockers follow where their toils have gone,
Heaping the swathes that rustle in the sun.
Tuesday, 2.—Lammas Day.
Wednesday, 3.—Battle of Blenheim, 1704.
Thursday, 4.—Death of Admiral Duncan, 1794.
Friday, 5.—Henry crowned, 1100.
Saturday, 6.—Death of Queen Caroline, 1821.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"A Subscriber," *Nottingham.—We feel flattered at the value our correspondent sets on our last week's address. We trust, in the copies distributed, the source from whence obtained was acknowledged. THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY JULY 30, 1842.

An "Elections' Bribery Bill" is progressing through the House of Commons—and we must all allow that any good that may be in it has not arrived before it was imperatively called for. Mr. Roebuck's report, which we have elsewhere noticed, is a pretty strong sign post for the legislature, and if they wish seriously to expedite a remedy or a punishment for corruption—the hand-writing is on the wall—and they can hardly mistake which way they are to travel. The revealments of the session have been so notoriously shameful—and the shrewd eyes of the community have been so widely opened upon the wholesale practice of bribery and compromise—that the steam must be got up, and the business of prevention or disfranchisement be set going at no inconsiderable power and speed. We have, therefore, the "Bribery Bill" as engine No. 1—Mr. Roebuck's resolutions as engine No. 2—but lots of clauses, rests, and station-houses, before the desiderated terminus is reached. There is, however, a sort of consolation in seeing that the trains are started—and moreover, that both parties are content to travel by them without dispute. Lord John Russell and Sir Robert Peel, for instance, are off together in a carriage of the first class, and there seems to be a mutual understanding that many of their followers shall follow them in earnest. We sincerely hope there may be few delays and no accidents upon the road, but that, in a good humoured spirit, Whigs and Tories will assist each other in reaching the desired goal of purity of election. Do let us have some honesty in our Commons, and in our constituencies; do let us forbid the members of the first to buy their places—and the members of the last to sell their souls. Peel, Roebuck, and Russell, if all be in earnest, can surely manage this amongst them now. In the meanwhile it is amusing to gaze on the tortuosities of party feeling, winding and writhing round the public question in hand. How the Times, with moderated tone, still vigorously defends the Walterian interest, and is blind to perceive what legislation can effect: how Sir Robert Inglis, generally a well convinced politician, dreads the innovation of an expedient that shall make money lean in strength: how the Globe on the other hand, plays the magnanimous on Wednesday, and approves of the cordial co-operation of the heads of parties against corruption—whips up the philosophy of either section—delights in the idea of the members for Tamworth and London speeding in harness in the same curricle, and giving a loose rein, says—"Go it, Russell! Go it, Peel!" how on Thursday, again, it changes tone, and shouts for one of the horses only. One night's debate shakes its joy to the foundation stone, and the curricle of purity is now to be upset, because pony Russell will go on, and pony Peel will loiter or lie down. The question is turned into a question of Whig or Tory. The Whigs, the Globe insinuates, have always affected a horror of bribery, and adds, "but for the Tories to affect a horror of bribery, and to pretend to employ themselves in framing measures to check its operations, is adding the meanness of hypocrisy to the perpetration of crime. 'The Ethiopian cannot change his skin, nor the leopard his spots.' They have become familiarized with corruption, until it is the very essence of their political being—they depend on it as essential to life, and revel in it as the element of enjoyment." Then why praise Sir Robert Peel for first going into the curricle with Russell! why bless and encourage him for adding "the meanness of hypocrisy to the perpetration of crime"? Why, what rubbish is this!

The bad player who earned the epigram of—

"Old Orpheus played so well he moved Old Nick,
But you move nothing but your fiddlestick," never deserved it half so well as the Globe. The Globe's scribble is fiddlestick of the first water—it is bow, resin, and squeak. Has Tory Mr. Walter bribed? Has Whig Sir George Larpent bribed? Has Tory Mr. Charlton bribed? Has Whig Sir John Hobhouse bribed? Yes—all—all alike, and so

"They are all honourable men."

But if you are to talk of hypocrisy, has not Whig Sir John Hobhouse been straining his indignant lungs in favour of purity, and against bribery ever since the world can remember the birth of Parliamentary Reform? Give him then credit for some hypocrisy too. But why blink the question? Whig and Tory are equally bad. My dear Times is shocking, my dear Parliament is not much better, my dear Globe is rather worse, for, after all its arguments, it writes—

"As to the bill which was the subject of discussion, and the victim of bribery-loving legislators last night, we resign it to those who have done their work upon it. Whether it pass or not, is, of all imaginable matters of indifference, the most indifferent."

This is the ne plus ultra of political impudence, but it just leads to the old conclusion, that, "Party is the madness of many for the gain of a few," and that it will blind the eyes of the most sagacious and industrious booby upon any of the benches of politics.

Now, what we want to come at is the genuine reform—the wiping out of the damnable stain of leprosy that is proved to be upon the constitution, and whether this be done by the Bribery Bill of Russell, Peel, or Roebuck—of Whig, Tory, or Radical, or of all three, wholesomely and efficiently combined—the right-thinking world out of doors will care not one farthing, so long as the end for which they care everything be honestly, and vigorously, and promptly attained. We say unto the legislature, pass your bribery bills—pass one, pass two, pass a dozen, if you please, so they tend to stay the atrocity that gives them name; or else even the party-reasoning Globe will be right for once, and, after your Roebuck exposures, you will be called "the Bribery Parliament" till the crack of doom!

During the week it will be seen that delegates from the manufacturing districts have been holding interviews with several members of the ministry, and that the uniform reply that has been made to their statements of the lamentably existing distress is, that the sad subject is under the immediate consideration of the Government. Amid all the complaint of cold and brief formality in such a reply, we confess that we like the word immediate, and have hope that some relief measure will rapidly be brought to bear upon the pauperism of the land. Energy and decision, however should stir our rulers on—Bis dat qui cito dat is a motto they should never overlook. We are still not quite sure that these delegations, however imposing in their respectability, or impressive in their statements, at all hasten the work of legislation for the poor—for we believe that men in office at all times dread to countenance an over-threatening agitation, quite as much as they may be anxious to sympathise with an overwhelming distress. A Government, particularly a monarchical one, is always, and properly, jealous of its function; and the air of menace is often as fatal to the action of public benevolence, as the threat of a ruffian street-mendicant is to his chances of private relief. It is perhaps better for the people to beard their ministers—when they will do so—by the voices of their representatives, than to carry the ordinary powers of their out-door declamation into the heart of the official castle—as though the institutions of England were paralysed and there no longer existed any reasonable and sufficient power either in the parliament or the press. We will not call the course adopted unconstitutional; but we do think it admits to be designated as imprudent. And this, we say, in the liveliest and most abounding sense of the absolute necessity for meeting peremptorily the present pressing wretchedness of the poor.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

Her Majesty and his royal highness Prince Albert, accompanied by their serene highnesses the hereditary Prince and Princess of Saxe Coburg Gotha, left Buckingham Palace at 3 o'clock on Saturday afternoon, in an open carriage and four, escorted by a party of hussars, for the terminus of the Great Western railway at Paddington. The royal party left by a special train for the Slough station. Her Majesty was in the enjoyment of excellent health.

Her Majesty and his royal highness Prince Albert, accompanied by the Prince and Princess of Saxe Coburg, and attended by the distinguished members of the royal suite, attended divine service in St. George's chapel, on Sunday.

WINDSOR, Monday.—This morning her Majesty, his royal highness Prince Albert, his serene highness Prince Ernest and the Princess of Saxe Coburg, attended by Lady Jocelyn and Viscount Sydney, walked through the slopes to Adelaide Lodge, and returned in pony carriages to the Castle. The following composed the royal dinner party:—The Prince and Princess of Saxe Coburg, Viscount Sydney, Viscountess Jocelyn, the Hon. Miss Devereux, Lady C. Cocks, the Hon. Colonel Grey, the Hon. Captain Nelson Hood, Colonel Bouverie, Baron Brandenstein, Baron Stockmar, and Baroness Lezhen.

WINDSOR, Tuesday.—Her Majesty and his royal highness Prince Albert, accompanied by the Prince of Saxe Coburg, rode out in the Park this afternoon. Her royal highness the Duchess of Kent, Lady C. Dundas, Lord C. Wellesley, and Sir George Couper joined the royal dinner-party in the evening.

WINDSOR, Wednesday.—This afternoon her Majesty, accompanied by the Princess of Saxe Coburg, and attended by Lady Jocelyn, the Hon. Miss Devereux, and Lady Caroline Cocks, rode out in pony phætons. His royal highness Prince Albert and the Prince of Saxe Coburg accompanied her Majesty on horseback. The Queen Dowager is expected to arrive at the Castle to-morrow, on a visit to her Majesty. Viscount and Viscountess Emlyn will arrive at the castle this evening. Her royal highness the Duchess of Kent and Lady C. Dundas joined the royal dinner party this evening.

Count Creptowich, principal secretary of the Russian embassy, whose residence in this country has been of some duration, has, we hear, been recalled to Russia to fill higher duties in the court of St. Petersburg.

BIRTHDAY OF THE DUCHESS OF CAMBRIDGE.—Monday was the birthday of her royal highness the Duchess of Cambridge. The auspicious event was celebrated at her royal highness's residence at Kew. Prince George of Cambridge arrived at Kew from town in the forenoon. Shortly before 3 o'clock her Majesty the Queen Dowager, her royal highness the Duchess of Kent, Lady Charlotte Dundas, her royal highness the Duchess of Gloucester, and his royal highness the Duke of Sussex, from Kensington Palace, arrived with their usual attendants to pay a visit of congratulation. A déjeuner was served to the illustrious party.

Lord Castlereagh was at Akaba on the 5th June, on his way to Jerusalem, being obliged to change his route in consequence of the murder of the Sheik Suleyman, and the bloodshed consequently caused amongst his tribe and that of the Misaana Bedouins.

GOODWOOD PARK.—The Duke and Duchess of Richmond are surrounded by a numerous and distinguished circle, including the Duke and Duchess of Beaufort, Duke and Duchess of Bedford, Marquis of Westminster, Earl of Jersey, Viscount Villiers, Earl and Countess of Chesterfield, Lord Forester, Hon. G. S. and Lady Agnes Byng, Hon. Cecil Forester, Hon. Colonel and Hon. Mrs. Anson, &c.

His Excellency Earl de Grey (the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland), accompanied by his private secretary, Mr. Magennis, arrived at his mansion, in St. James's-square, shortly after five o'clock on Tuesday evening from Dublin Castle. The noble earl takes his departure in a few days for Germany, for the benefit of his health, which is somewhat impaired by repeated attacks of gout.

MR. BYNG.—We are happy to say the slight attack Mr. Byng experienced on Thursday night, in the House of Commons, passed off, and on Saturday the hon. gentleman and Mrs. Byng went to Wortham Park, Herts, from whence they returned to town on Monday.

DEATH OF SIR WILLIAM WOODS, KNIGHT.—We have to announce the demise of Sir W. Woods, Garter Principal King of Arms, who expired on Monday last, at Laurieston Lodge, his villa at Hampstead, after a lengthened illness. He was in his 56th year. Sir William was appointed Garter Principal King of Arms in July, 1838. The deceased was highly esteemed by the late King William IV., by whom he was knighted in 1834. In addition to his high appointment in the College of Arms, he was appointed officer of arms attendant on the Knights Commanders and the Companions of the Order of the Bath, and inspector of regimental colours, both of which appointments he received in 1831.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—The answer to the numerous inquiries in George-street on Wednesday morning was, that the Lord Chancellor was better, and it was expected would be able to resume his official duties in a few days. His lordship is attended by Dr. Locock.

MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.—On Wednesday was married at St. Marylebone Church, by her uncle, his Grace the Archbishop of Armagh, Miss Elizabeth Pack, daughter of the late Major-General Sir Dennis Pack, K.C.B., and of Lady Elizabeth Reynell, to Mr. Anson, eldest son of General Sir William Anson, Bart.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

Despatches from the Governor of the Cape of Good Hope were received on Monday at the Colonial Office.

A deputation from Leeds and Manchester had an interview with Sir Robert Peel, on Monday, at his official residence in Downing-street.

SEPTENNIAL SURVEY OF THE THAMES AND MEDWAY BY THE LORD MAYOR.—The following is a brief narrative of the survey made by the Lord Mayor of the eastern boundary of his lordship's jurisdiction in the river Thames and waters of the Medway on Thursday, Friday, and Saturday last:—His lordship having determined to take the septennial view of the eastern civic boundary, issued cards of invitation to several members of the corporation, requesting their company on board the Mercury steam-boat, which was splendidly decorated and adapted to the accommodation of the numerous guests whose presence his lordship and the Lady Mayoress calculated upon. The chief magistrate having embarked in the Mercury at the Tower, on the invitation of the Duke of Wellington, proceeded down the river, and at Blackwall the Mercury stopped, in order that the launch of the East Indiaman, built by Messrs. Wigram and Co., might be witnessed by him. Immediately after the launch the Mercury went down the river, occasionally abating her speed for the purpose of taking on board several of those who were invited; and upon reaching the Nore the whole party were comfortably seated at dinner, and the turtle and venison and champagne were disposed of in truly civic style. The Conservator of the Thames and Medway was on Friday received by the admiral of the fleet with the highest honour and respect. When the Mercury arrived at Sheerness, Captain Frederick Brace, the flag-officer, accompanied by his first lieutenant, came alongside, and was introduced to his lordship and Lady Pirie, who with several of their guests, immediately proceeded in the water-bailiff's shallop and the harbour-master's boats to the Camperdown, the admiral's ship, to take a view of the interior of that very fine vessel. Upon leaving the Camperdown, the Lord Mayor proceeded up the Medway to Upnor, and landed there, in order to inspect the boundary-stone of his lordship's jurisdiction in the eastern district, at Cookham Wood. The party formed a circle round the stone, upon which the colours of the city of London were flying, and the Lord Mayor proposed the toast, "God preserve the City of London," and distributed wine and new coins amongst the assembled multitude, natives of "the good old city of Rochester," very much to their delight and admiration. The party then returned in boats to Rochester, where they were received by the mayor and corporation of that loyal port of the empire with music and the firing of guns, and the most respectful and distinguished formalities. The Crown Hotel was the place selected by his lordship's officers for the residence of the Conservator during his stay at Rochester; and the first part of the survey concluded there, most favourably ominous of the succeeding portion of the septennial ceremonies. His lordship gave a most magnificent entertainment on Friday at the Crown Inn, to which the nobility and gentry of the neighbourhood were invited. Every dish bore testimony to the vigilance and skill of the cook whom his lordship ordered to make preparations for the occasion, and even those who had been accustomed to the hospitalities of the mayoralty, acknowledged that the city of Rochester vied with the city of London in the profusion and elegance of her festive preparations. The festivities of the day were most actively conducted until daylight almost re-appeared. On Saturday morning the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress received their guests at nine o'clock at breakfast, and at ten the party embarked on board the Mercury, for the purpose of proceeding to Southend, and thence to Leigh, the boundary of his lordship's jurisdiction in Essex. As the steamer passed the Camperdown, the crew of the flag-ship with extraordinary expedition manned the yards, and saluted the Conservator, who returned the compliment with three cheers. The admiral and several other men of naval rank then followed the Mercury in a yacht which was fastened to Captain Bullock's steam-vessel, to Southend, where a splendid déjeûner was provided at the Royal Hotel. After the arrival of the Mercury at Southend, his lordship, attended by the aldermen and the principal city officers, proceeded in boats to Leigh, where the Court of Conservancy was opened. The Lord Mayor then exercised his right of jurisdiction, proceeding three times round the stone, on the top of which was hoisted the City colours, drank "Prosperity to the City of London," directed the usual inscription to be cut, and distributed coin and wine to the populace, who had assembled in considerable numbers to witness the ceremony. The court was then dissolved, and the party returned in procession to the boats, and directly to the Royal Hotel at Southend.

INTERVIEW OF THE DELEGATES FROM THE GREAT MANUFACTURING TOWNS WITH SIR JAMES GRAHAM AND THE EARL OF RIPON.—On Tuesday a deputation from the principal manufacturing towns, waited on Sir James Graham by appointment, to represent the alarming state of distress prevalent in their respective neighbourhoods, and the depression of trade and manufactures generally. The deputation reached the Colonial office at one o'clock, and were immediately introduced to Sir James Graham, who listened attentively to the statements of the various delegates, in reference to the want of employment existing so extensively in the manufacturing districts. Upon the rising of the deputation, Sir James Graham remarked, in a way somewhat premonitory, that if any serious outbreaks were to take place, in one week all the institutions of the country would be broken down—that the rights of property would be sacrificed, and even the labouring classes themselves would be amongst the greatest sufferers. Mr. Ashworth said, if Sir James Graham would also allow him to speculate upon the results of such a disaster, he would venture to predict that, whatever might befal the rest, the sound portion of the religious feelings of the country would be safe, that the sound moral tone of our middle class would be preserved, and though it might pass through a very severe ordeal, the industrial freedom of the country would eventually be established. The deputation then withdrew.—The deputation proceeded at two o'clock to the office of the Board of Trade, and were introduced to Lord Ripon and Mr. Gladstone. The injustice of fettering our commercial intercourse with America was touched upon. Lord Ripon said that it did not follow that they would get the market they expected, even were those restrictions removed. It was notorious that corn was some years dearer than in England, and, on an average of a number of years, it was during half the time as dear as in England; and the price was habitually dearer than in the corn-exporting countries of Europe, who would supply this country were a free importation permitted.

SOUTH LONDON FLORICULTURAL SOCIETY.—The second summer show for the prizes given by this society, took place on Tuesday at the Zoological Gardens, under the arrangements of Mr. Cummins, the secretary. The flowers and plants exhibited were particularly fine; indeed, some of them were, both for their rarity and splendour, of peculiar value. There was a very great number of prizes awarded, amongst which were a silver cup and several very elegant gold medals. These were the gold medal to the Rev. Mr. Matthews for picotees. The gold medal to Mr. Clarke for a collection of miscellaneous plants. The gold medal to Mr. Jackson for a collection of miscellaneous plants, and the silver cup to Mr. Bernard for picotees. The collection of flowers and plants has never been exceeded by any show of this society's since its foundation, and its superiority to former shows evinces the advantage of judicious management in the rules and regulations, and the emulation excited by the perfect fairness, as well as the value, of the awards. The company assembled was very numerous, and amongst the distinguished individuals present was his royal highness the Duke of Cambridge, who expressed his high gratification at what he saw. The visitors, as usual, were enlivened by the excellent band under the direction of Mr. Godfrey.

THE PENTONVILLE MODEL PRISON.—We perceive by the Gazette of Friday night, that the commissioners for the government of Pentonville Prison announce themselves ready to receive applications from persons desirous of being appointed to fill offices in the prisons. The following are the salaries:—For the Governor, £600, and an unfurnished house; for the chaplain, £400, and an unfurnished house; for the medical officer, non-resident, £300; for the secretary and accountant, non-resident, £250; for the deputy governor, £200, and to have apartments in the prison; for the steward and manufacturer, £200, and to have apartments.

DEATH OF THE HIGH BAILIFF OF SOUTHWARK.—On Tuesday morning, died at his residence, the Retreat, Vauxhall, John Uolmes, Esq., in the 83rd year of his age. The appointment, which is exceedingly valuable, is in the gift of the corporation of the city of London, and from the circumstance of there being no deputy appointed the vacancy will have to be filled up immediately, as no process from the Court of Request can issue until his successor is elected. Three gentlemen are already named as candidates. The salary and emoluments are stated at £2000 per annum.

SEIZURE MADE BY THE SOCIETY FOR THE SUPPRESSION OF VICE.—A search warrant was a few days back granted by Mr. Jardine, the sitting magistrate at Bow-street, upon the application of Mr. Pritchard, secretary of the above-named society, and a printing-press, with upwards of two hundred weight of type which were used for printing obscene books, a stock of 1391 obscene prints, forty-five books with plates, 66 lbs. of letter-press not stitched up, and twenty-one copper plates, all of which were of the most vile and abominable description, were seized. The society has come to the determination in future of seizing any property of the kind respecting which information can be obtained; for, if the law was set in motion against the individual possessing such articles, a penalty of £20 upon conviction, would be incurred; and, as on former occasions, instantly paid, thereby defeating the object the society has in view, and also the ends of justice.

CHEMICAL EXPLOSION.—On Sunday morning last, about nine o'clock, considerable alarm was created in the neighbourhood of Piccadilly, near St. James's-street, by a loud report, similar to that produced from a piece of ordnance, having taken place, which proved to have proceeded from the premises of Messrs. Reece and Co., chemists and druggists, No. 168, Piccadilly. Police-sergeant Boore, 15 C, who was near the spot at the time, immediately, with two of his men, rushed into the premises, and on arriving at the warehouse, which is situated underneath the shop, discovered that the windows were shattered to atoms, through which the smoke was issuing in clouds. Upon the floor lay a youth, about seventeen years of age, in an apparently lifeless state, as also a man, who was labouring under the effects of the explosion. The sergeant proceeded to the upper part of the premises, when it was discovered that the man had escaped with merely temporary stupefaction, and that the youth had sustained a comparatively slight laceration of the left arm. The cause of the explosion is ascribed to the overheating of some chemical machine which the boy and man were then working.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE LONDON AND SOUTH WESTERN RAILWAY. On Tuesday morning, about [illegible] o'clock, the luggage train from Southampton [illegible] Nine Elms, was proceeding at a steep and long incline across the rails on Woking Common. The obstruction created by the body first gave intimation to the engine-driver that all was not right, and he stopped the train within a few yards of the spot where the accident occurred. The guard and stoker proceeded to search for the [illegible] they found groaning dreadfully, and [illegible] the right leg, which had been torn off, and thrown some distance. The poor fellow was carried to the train as carefully as possible. He was conveyed to Nine Elms, but ceased to live before the train arrived at Esher. When taken up he said his name was John Mitchell, but he had not power of speech sufficient to state anything further. When the train arrived at the terminus Mr. Lee, the guard, hoping that the deceased might be only in a state of syncope, sent for Mr. Statham, a surgeon in the Wandsworth-road, who, upon his arrival, declared the man to have been dead some hours, and attributed his death to excessive hæmorrhage. The deceased, who had evidently been drinking deeply, not knowing where he was going, had wandered on to the line, dropped down, and fallen asleep. Information of the occurrence has been forwarded to Mr. Carter, the coroner.

DEATH UNDER SINGULAR CIRCUMSTANCES.—In consequence of repairs in the carriage-way both at the east end of Fleet-street and in Farringdon-street, Fetter-lane has been lately a very thronged thoroughfare for carriages of all descriptions and for horses. The southern end of it, by Peele's coffee-house, being very narrow, is somewhat dangerous; and on Monday afternoon a little fellow, named Henry Rafter, aged seven years, was knocked off the foot pavement and run over by a coal waggon. He died in a few minutes after he was picked up. His parents reside at No. 5, Fleur-de-lis-court, Fleet-street, and have a small independent fortune, and deceased, when of age, would have been entitled to a sufficient sum to start him fairly in life.

POSTSCRIPT.

[illegible]

WINDSOR, Friday.—[illegible] Queen [illegible] viewed this morning [illegible] Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by the hereditary Prince of Saxe Coburg Gotha (habited in the uniform of the 11th Saxon Hussars). Her Majesty was on horseback during the review.

WINDSOR, Thursday.—This morning the 15th regiment, stationed here, was reviewed by the Queen and Prince Albert, his royal highness wearing the uniform of his regiment, the Scots Fusileer Guards. The hereditary Prince of Saxe Coburg Gotha was present, and also the equerries in waiting, the honourable Colonel Grey and Colonel Bouverie, and most of the gentlemen of the court on horseback.

His Majesty and the royal party came on the ground about ten o'clock. The review was witnessed from the East-terrace by the ladies at the castle.

The Royal Gunpowder, Captain Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence, is being fitted up for [illegible], for Mr. [illegible], who, it is stated, intends to take an excursion to sea in her in the course of the summer.

THE PROROGATION.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert are expected at Buckingham Palace about Wednesday or Thursday next, the 10th of August, for the purpose of enabling the Queen to prorogue the Houses of Parliament; and her Majesty will return to the Castle on the following day, if not the same evening, by the Great Western Railway, as the ceremony is over by half-past three.

Baron Brunnow, the Russian minister, transacted business on Thursday at the Foreign Office.

Under the codicil to Mr. James Wood's will, G. W. Counsel, Esq., of Gloucester, has received this week a legacy of £10,000.

THE POTTERIES.—HANLEY, Thursday night.—About five or six of the collieries have resumed work, and more are likely to be set on to-morrow. There are an immense number still out of work, and great distress prevails.

BRISTOL, Friday Evening.—The unemployed are still parading the streets in bodies, and serious apprehensions are entertained. The colliers and others have commenced taking fowl out of the shops. A large body of special constables have been sworn in, and necessary precautions have been taken to keep the peace. The same account will apply to the surrounding districts.

TUNNEL TRAFFIC.—This [illegible] being steadily carried on. The [illegible] entrance on the Wapping side will be open to vehicular traffic, Rotherhithe being closed, in order to finish the [illegible]. When this is completed, the Tunnel will be thrown open merely as an object of curiosity, but as a thoroughfare for foot-passengers, and its practical utility as a medium of communication from one shore to the other will be then first tested. We shall next present our readers with a spirited engraving of the last-undertaking on its completion.

EAST INDIA HOUSE.—A special General Court was held on Friday at the East India House, Sir C. Law Lushington in the chair. The Court had been specially called for the purpose of having before the proprietors the draft of a bill now before Parliament, to grant furlough allowances to the Bishops of Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay, in cases of their returning to Europe for a limited period; and had now been made special in compliance with a requisition of nine Proprietors (only four of whom were present), and to submit a motion on the case of the ex-Rajah of Sattarah. Soon as the minutes had been read, the chairman explained that as the case of the Rajah of Sattarah had already been so fully discussed in this Court, and as a petition was that evening about to be presented to the House of Commons on the subject by Sir Robert Inglis, it would be the Court's wish now to abstain from any discussion that could cause a most animated discussion. Mr. Lewis accused the Court of Directors and some of the other Proprietors with a disgraceful combination to prevent the subject from being freely discussed, alleging that they were well aware that a gross wrong had been done, and that they, therefore, feared discussion.

RUGBY SCHOOL.—ELECTION OF A HEAD MASTER.—At a meeting of the honourable the trustees held on Thursday, present, Earls Denbigh, Aylesford, and Howe; Sir G. Shipwith, Sir F. Lawley, Sir H. Halford, Sir G. Crewe, Mr. W. S. Dugdale, M.P., Mr. E. J. Shirley, M.P., and Mr. Holbeche, the Rev. Archibald Campbell Tait, Fellow and Tutor of Baliol College, Oxford, was elected Head Master of Rugby School.

OFFICE OF HIGH BAILIFF OF SOUTHWARK.—The following gentlemen are, we understand, candidates for the office of High Bailiff of Southwark:—Alderman Brown, Alderman Sir William [illegible], Mr. D. W. Harvey, Mr. [illegible], Mr. Lee, Mr. Jump, and Mr. J. Clarke.

At a Court of Common Council held in the Guildhall on Thursday, Mr. Pearson was appointed to succeed the late Mr. Holmes as High Bailiff of Southwark until a successor to Mr. Holmes is appointed.

MEETING OF THE BANKRUPT LAW [illegible] was held on Thursday, by appointment, at No. 7, Graham-street, Home Office, on the subject of the Bankrupt Amendment Bill. The members of the London Association, solicited a postponement of the measure till the ensuing session, with a view to its being more fully considered and amended. The proposition was supported by Mr. M. Philips, Mr. Parker, of Sheffield, Sir Matthew Wood, and other members. Sir J. Graham received the representations made to him with marked attention, and undertook to communicate them to the Lord Chancellor (who had brought in the bill), to consult with his colleagues as to the course to be adopted.

DOVER, July 28.—Mr. Bush has got the top half of its caisson to its site, the Goodwin Sands. The machine, as we mentioned on Monday, did break down, or part in twain; but this circumstance, it is said, has favoured the project rather than otherwise, inasmuch as Mr. Bush now reckons on being able to form his foundation by the aid of the bottom part alone. It was got off to the sands on Wednesday. We understand there is to be a grand [illegible] to-morrow, before the Duke of Wellington and Lord Hill. Yesterday morning the coast-guard seized a boat with fifty tubs of foreign parts, between here and the North Foreland. The smuggler, with the exception of one man, escaped.

MISS ADELAIDE KEMBLE A BRIDE.—The banns of marriage between "Adelaide Kemble and John Sartoris," were proclaimed in the city churches here on Sunday last. The gentleman who is about to [illegible] the well-bred lady and distinguished vocalist to the [illegible] is described as styled Count Sartoris, and is reputed to be possessed of considerable wealth. The lady, we believe, although generally known in this country by her maiden patronymic of Kemble, is a widow, and, we have been informed, has two children by her first husband living at Milan.—Glasgow Courier.

ILLNESS OF GRACE DARLING.—We regret to learn that Grace Darling, the heroine of the Fern Island, is at present in very bad health. Our correspondent at Bamborough informs us that she is at present on the main land for change of air, and although reported to be somewhat better since she took up her residence there, she still looks very unwell.—Berwick paper.

The four-oared cutter match between the St. George's Club and the Civil Engineers, took place on Thursday, the distance being from Westminster to Putney, when the former won by a length of 100 yards ahead.

CRICKET.—GENTLEMEN v. PLAYERS.—The annual match between eleven gentlemen and eleven players was commenced on Monday morning at Lord's and terminated on Wednesday afternoon, when the former, contrary to general anticipation, came off victorious, winning the game easily, and with no less than nine wickets to spare.

On Friday evening an inquisition was taken before Mr. Wakley, at the Seven Stars, New-road, Hammersmith, on the body of George Brill, aged sixty years, who was killed during the awful thunder-storm on the morning of Thursday last. The body presented marks of the powerful effects of the electric fluid, which had struck the deceased on the right side of the head, literally tearing it into shreds. It had then passed down the right side of his body, down the chest, stomach, left thigh, and leg, and then passed out on the inside of his left heel. The skin along which it had passed was excoriated as from burning, and the boot was burst open and torn from the sole at the heel.—Verdict, "Died from the effects of lightning."

DREADFUL CARRIAGE ACCIDENT.—On Friday morning, between ten and eleven o'clock, a very dreadful accident happened in the Waterloo-road, near the Victoria Theatre, by which an interesting little girl, name Margaret Randall, lost her life. It appears the child, in company with a sister and brother, rather her senior, were walking together, when the deceased ran off the footpath into the road, after an apple which she had dropped, at the moment the carriage of Mr. Wood, of the York-road, passed along, the horses of which knocked the child down, both the near wheels passing over her body. She was taken up and carried to the shop of Mr. Brooks, in the Waterloo-road, who pronounced her dead. At the time of the accident the carriage was going at a moderate pace. Mr. Wood [illegible] and address to the police. The body was [illegible].

FIRE IN HATFIELD-STREET, BLACKFRIARS-ROAD.—Thursday afternoon, about two o'clock, a fire broke out in the house of Mr. Haldane Gibb, 10, Hatfield-street, Stamford-street, which burnt with much fury for some time; but through the active exertions of several firemen attached to the West of England and Waterloo-road brigade stations, it was eventually got under, though not until the upper part of the house, together with a large quantity of furniture, had been consumed.

FIRE AT CREDITON.—On Monday evening a fire broke out at Crediton, which was not extinguished until about thirty houses were destroyed, chiefly cottagers' residences.—Western Luminary.

LIGHTHOUSE DESTROYED BY FIRE.—The lighthouse on the North Quay at Ayr, was observed to be on fire about half-past ten o'clock on Thursday morning, and before any effectual assistance could be [illegible] the whole fabric was burned. It was built of wood, and has faced the storms of nearly seventeen years. No cause can be assigned for the occurrence of the accident.

POLICE.—James Wyatt, a carpenter out of work, was charged on Thursday, at Queen-square, with having thrown a stone at Lord Seaford, a gentleman was leaving his house on Wednesday [illegible]. The magistrate considered him insane, and committed [illegible] months, at the end of which time he was to be [illegible].

Samuel Arnott was on Thursday committed to Newgate for trial at the Marylebone-office, for drowning her illegitimate child in the [illegible].

Thomas Casey, a journeyman dyer, charged at Lambeth-street with having caused the death of his wife by inflicting bruises on [illegible], was committed on Thursday to Newgate, for "Manslaughter." Six witnesses bound over to appear.

Four parties, factory-men and labourers, were charged on Thursday at the Greenwich Police, with exciting the late meeting to rescue Dr. M'Dowall from the hands of the police, and bound over in sums of 40*l.* and upwards, for their good behaviour during the next six months.

The Paris papers of Wednesday, which have reached us, are chiefly occupied with the King's speech on the preceding day on opening the session of the Chambers, and with the details of that exceedingly interesting ceremony. The Journal des Debats states, that about 70 members of the Opposition held a meeting at M. Odilon Barrot's house on Tuesday afternoon, when it was resolved, after a discussion, that the Opposition would not propose any amendment to the address, nor to the Regency Bill, but that they would seize the first favourable opportunity to raise a ministerial question, or, in other words, to engage a political discussion with the Ministry.

NEWS FROM AMERICA.—ARRIVAL OF THE CALEDONIA.—LIVERPOOL, Thursday night, July 28.—The Caledonia arrived in the Mersey at ten o'clock this evening, in ten days, having sailed from Boston on the evening of the 16th, and from Halifax on the evening of the 18th inst., at six o'clock, she brings about sixty passengers, among whom were Fanny Elsler. The Acadia was going into Halifax. It was thought the negociations about the Boundary were in a satisfactory state of settlement. The Texan schooner of war San Antonio left New Orleans on the 28th of June, to lay up her quarters on the coast of Mexico. A steam-boat had exploded on the mouth of the Missouri, and caused the death of twenty-six Germans, and seven German children, besides several Americans, who were said to death. The crops by all accounts promised well. A [illegible] survey of Canada was about to be made.

The Montreal Herald of July 11 announces a calamity [illegible] to have occurred in [illegible] on Saturday. The steamer Shamrock left the Canal Basin [illegible] on a Friday evening, with one hundred and twenty passengers on board, at eleven o'clock on Saturday, when the steamer had proceeded [illegible] about five miles from Lachine, her boiler exploded, causing death and destruction. So sudden were the effects, that in less than five minutes sixty-two human beings were precipitated into eternity. The passengers were English, Irish, and Scotch emigrants, but principally English. The explosion carried away the decks, so that [illegible] were precipitated into the river. By the [illegible] exertion of the master and crew of the Dolphin, about sixty persons were picked up. Of these, about thirty are reported dead, about thirty, [illegible] Irish, escaped unhurt. The captain and engineer were saved; the captain was the last man to leave the wreck.

THE NEW GRAND STAND AT GOODWOOD.

GOODWOOD GRAND STAND.

The races at Goodwood are the sporting attractions of the week, and their annual celebration—thanks to the taste, enterprize, and liberality of that fine English gentleman, the Duke of Richmond—now affords some of the best racing entertainment in the kingdom. A change has come completely over the spirit of its former dream, and the Goodwood meeting is now of grand import in the world of fashion and sport. A note of what the races were and are may well accompany the illustrations we have prepared for our readers.

For some years these races had been on the decline; and so poor was the sport, and so paltry the subscriptions, owing to the falling off of the patrons of the turf, that it was even betting that the meeting would not outlive many seasons; the public money given seldom exceeded £150; occasionally it was a "Flemish account"—none at all! Symptoms of decline, as well in the sport as the company, had shown themselves. Affairs could not possibly go on in this way. The entire ruin and downfall of the meeting must have been the inevitable consequence, when the noble owner of Goodwood, anxious to preserve a meeting founded by his ancestor, the third Duke of Richmond, in 1802, came forward, and, by his influence, restored the meeting to more than its former prosperity. And here, in giving an extract from a newspaper published in 1802, we fervently hope we may see the latter part of its wish fulfilled in the person of the present duke, the reviver of the sports:

"The thanks of the county in general, and of Chichester and its vicinity in particular, are largely due to his grace the Duke of Richmond, for having thus munificently and liberally instituted an establishment of most material local benefit in every point of view; both as a source of pecuniary advantage to the inhabitants, and as a means of forwarding to notice, and increasing the consequence of, the western part of the country. We can only add our wish that the illustrious duke may, for many years, live to enjoy, in health and happiness, a scion planted by the hand of his ancestor, but nurtured and brought to perfection by his own."

To the exertions, then, of the noble owner of Goodwood, backed by a party of influential supporters of the turf, the celebrity which this meeting has now attained is entirely attributable. It has now acquired an importance that places it on a level with the best provincial races in England. Under its new auspices, the spirit of the olden time revived. The effect of the change speedily became apparent. Considerable alterations and improvements were made in the course. A new stand, capable of containing nearly three thousand persons, was erected; the turf was re-laid in several places; new gallops formed—old ones perfected, in short, everything has been done that experience, liberality, and good taste could dictate. The extraordinary increase in the value of the stakes will sufficiently attest the high estimation in which they are held.

The engraving of the grand stand, as it is given at the head of this notice, presents it in its new form with all its improvements—and is, on a smaller scale, a sprightly copy from the magnificent print of the "New Grand Stand at Goodwood," published by Mr. Moore, the enterprising printseller of St. Martin's-lane, to record the first cup-race after its erection. A little farther on we give the Duke of Richmond's seat at Goodwood—the home of princely hospitality during the season of the races—and the rendezvous of all the noble and generous spirits who lend their aid and countenance to his grace's distinguished patronage of the British turf. Every visitor to Goodwood who finds enjoyment at its races, or cares for the prosperity of the course and neighbourhood points to the duke's residence with a feeling of pride, and lauds the taste and hospitality of its owner, as worthy of stimulating by its example the whole body of sporting English noblemen and gentlemen to a similar fostering of the racing sport.

GOODWOOD HOUSE.

THE GOODWOOD CUPS.

The splendid prizes manufactured by Messrs. Garrard for the races at Goodwood, are, as usual, cast from the noble models of Mr. Cotterill, whose reputation they will, if it be possible, enhance. They consist of two groups in silver, one of them intended to be the "Goodwood," the other "the Chesterfield Cup," but as the decision rests with the stewards as to their destination, we are unable to describe them under those heads. It is sufficient, however, that we illustrate the works themselves.

The first we shall notice is a fine equestrian group, the subject taken from Scottish history, and representing an incident which took place immediately before the memorable battle of Bannockburn:—"Previous to the engagement a brilliant achievement of King Robert Bruce himself, performed in full view of both armies, raised the hopes of his countrymen with another good omen. He was riding in front of his troops on a little palfrey, but with his battle-axe in his hand, and a crown of gold over his steel helmet, when an English knight, Henry de Bohun, or Boone, mounted on a heavy war-horse, and armed at all points, recognising the Scottish King, galloped forward to attack him. Instead of retiring from the unequal encounter, Bruce turned to meet his assailant, and, dexterously parrying his spear, in the next moment, with one blow of his battle-axe cleft his skull and laid him dead at his feet." Bruce's only observation was, "I have broken my good battle-axe."

Mr. Cotterill's group is faithful to the scene thus described, and he has composed it with as much vigour as truth. The Bruce is represented armed cap-à-pied, with a surcoat over chain armour, a long sword depending from his waist, and in his right hand, which is raised, a heavy battle-axe; he is standing in his stirrups, about to deal the deadly blow; his attitude is firm and commanding, and strongly indicative of his knightly prowess; and the steady yet severe expression of his countenance assure us of the result. His antagonist, on the other hand, is flying wildly to meet the King. His lance has passed the mark, and partly from the sudden swerve, partly from the desire to avoid the Bruce's weapon, he has thrown himself back on his horse's crupper—his shield is raised, but it covers him incompletely, and a fatal space between the ear and the shoulder lies exposed to the weight of the terrific battle-axe. His vizor is closed, but the bold features of a gallant soldier are visible through the bars. His surcoat and shield bear the arms of the family of De Bohun, Azure, a hand, or, between six lions rampant or; the trappings of his steed are similarly emblazoned. Nothing can exceed the energy and fire of De Bohun's rapid charge—every muscle of his courser is in motion, as with steaming housings he dashes onward. Contrasted with the fiery war-horse is the lighter and more gentle palfrey bestrode by Bruce; it is equal to its rider's weight, but only for purposes of peace, thus admirably exemplifying the steady courage of the Scottish King, who, cool and collected, has gained an easy victory. We have seldom seen a story better told, and again we say, it reflects infinite credit on Mr. Cotterill; the workmanship also is excellent, and the contrast afforded by the golden weapons, the armorial bearings, &c., produces a fine effect.

From the severe record of history we turn to the graceful page of romance; from the illustrations of war to the gentle expressions of love.

The second subject represents the meeting between Thomas the Rhymer (of Ercildoune) and the Queen of Fairy Land, a story so well told in one of the ballads which form a part of the minstrelsy of the Scottish border. In order the better to describe Mr. Cotterill's group we shall quote the opening of the ballad, observing only that the artist has again been as faithful to his original as it was possible for him, consistent with the rules of art, to be:—

"True Thomas lay on Huntlie bank
A ferlie he spied wi' his ee;
And there he saw a ladye bright
Come riding down by the Eildin tree.

"Her skirt was o' the grass-green silk,
Her mantle o' the velvet fyne;
At ilka tett of her horse's mane
Hung fifty siller bells and nine.

"True Thomas he pull'd off his cap
And touted low down to his knee,
'All hail thou mighty Queen of Heaven!
For thy peer on earth I never did see.'

"'O no, O no, Thomas,' she said,
'That name does not belong to me;
I am but the Queen of fair Elfland
That am hither come to visit thee.'"

Accordingly in Mr. Cotterill's group we behold the Elfin Queen, mounted on a delicate ambling palfrey, decorated with rich housings, riding beneath that famous weird oak, the Eildin tree. The enamoured sprite is attired in the costume which refers to the supposed period of the romance; she wears a rich chatelaine at her waist, and a coronal of roses is bound about her brow; and, in illustration of the words of the old ballad, on which the modern one is founded,

"Awhile she blew, awhile she sang."

She holds a horn in her upraised hands, and her speaking features express the melody of her witching voice.

According to the old text,

> "She led three grew hounds in a leash,
> And ratches coupled by hyr ran;
> She bar an horn about hyr halse,
> And undir hyr gyrdil mene flene."

But Mr. Cotterill has wisely introduced only two greyhounds, one of which is represented seant, the other couchant, while the Queen of Faery checks her palfrey to salute Thomas of Ercildoune. The easy motion of the palfrey is well expressed, and the grace and beauty of the fair rider are conspicuous. "True Thomas," also, who kneels before her, with cap doffed and harp in hand, is a fine, manly figure, fit to be the poet-lover of so delicate a being. The central portion of the group is formed by the Eildin tree, an oak, whose gnarled branches lend themselves very picturesquely to the pyramidal character of the design. A broken branch on one side admirably balances the composition. This group is without any gilding, but so carefully is it executed, that the effect produced by variety of colours is not noted. We are of opinion that in the execution of this essentially sylvan subject, Mr. Cotterill has been quite as successful as in the warlike memorials for which he has long been so deservedly celebrated.

In closing our imperfect account of these beautiful works of art, we cannot but repeat our satisfaction at witnessing such praiseworthy and successful efforts towards rendering the prizes of our best race-courses worthy of the country to which they owe their birth. The history and literature of Great Britain afford abundant materials for the exercise of the highest talent, such as we find developed in the groups which we have attempted to describe.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

Under this general, and, it is hoped, not inappropriate title, we purpose introducing our readers to the thousand and one beautiful objects of interest which stud the natural scenery of our native land. There are endless themes and associations of delight to be gathered out of the simple nooks and corners of our charming rural landscapes and architecture—spots of green upon the waste of life—pleasant haunts of bygone genius or romance—dottings upon the path of history—dwelling-places of fancy, poetry, memory—the fairy dells of imagination—the dreamy treasure-homes of thought. A moss-covered rock, an old ruin, some ancient fabric in decay, a gate, a tree, a tower, a rippling stream, a mouldering church—any touch or token of the waste of years that can be stamped with recollections of the past, or selected for its present charm and wasting beauty—may be caught by the pencil of our artist, and gathered into our columns, like the fugitive graces of the isle. We are assured by a hundred correspondents, that such features of our paper will have a pleasing and often an endearing influence upon our readers, and we have, therefore, now only to proclaim our intention of adopting them from time to time, with such random suggestions as unstudying chance may throw out. Accident commences our series with a view of

THURGARTON CHURCH.

This picturesque rural temple is used as the parish-church of Thurgarton, although belonging to a private individual. It has its simple and pleasant locality about two miles from the banks of the Trent, in a beautiful district of Nottinghamshire, and upon the borders of the ancient Forest of Sherwood—dear, merrie, memory-haunted Sherwood—the fairy region of the ballad-singer—and one of the evergreen homes of old English romance. The character of the scenery which once surrounded this old ruin is, however, of altered aspect now:—its forest features are worn away—it is subdued into the mild stillness of pastoral vegetation, and wears the sweet, untroubled calm of holy natural repose.

The Priory of Thurgarton was founded by Ralph de Ayncourt, in the time of Henry II., for the good of the souls of all branches of his family, and committed, with holy charge, to the care of St. Peter, to whom it was religiously dedicated. The principal records concerning the once famous priory are held by the Chapter of Southwell, and are contained in one volume, the others having been burnt by Cromwell in his crusade against the Catholic Church.

Of its exterior, the most attractive remaining portions of this once glorious edifice—amongst which should be first named one of the two former western towers—are the western entrance, now used as a window; the north porch, but which has been badly rebuilt; two early decorated windows of good character; and a very rich niche, which is in the pier that in the interior divides these two windows. A description of it might be too architectural, but we must say that it is a gem indeed. The narrowest arch of the western entrance measures about eight feet, and the widest about eighteen feet, having in its mouldings six rows of the dog's-tooth ornament. We find this church nearly perfect up to the time of the civil wars; but Cromwell having passed through the village quietly, was afterwards attacked from the church towers, in return for which he reduced it to its present state; in which we leave it, with only an intimation to the curious that it is near Nottingham, Newark, Southwell, and Newstead, and 140 miles from the metropolis.

VIEW OF BRISTOL.

BRISTOL.

Our readers have here a picturesque aspect of the beautiful and ancient city of Bristol, now, in spite of the prevailing distress among the people, more quiet than many other commercial districts of the empire—and not politically maddened into turbulence, as in the memorable struggle for the reform-bill, when riots and burnings were prevalent with fury—and the learned Sir Charles Wetherell found it an impracticable abode.

Bristol, like ancient Rome, is seated on seven hills or elevations, which diversify the surface of a low but beautiful vale, about eight miles from the mouth of the river Avon, in the Bristol Channel, and at its confluence with the Frome. Its situation always rendered it commercial, according to the nature of the times, and in the eleventh century it is said that a mart was held here for the sale of English slaves of both sexes. Its ancient history is altogether romantic and remarkable, but we cannot dwell upon it here. The old town, which now forms the heart of the city, stands upon a narrow hill, bounded by the Avon on the south, the Frome on the north and west, and by the moat of the castle, now nearly arched over, on the east. The entire city and suburbs extend over a surface of 1500 acres, and occupy a circumference of seven miles, and are continually increasing. The more ancient streets are narrow, with lofty houses of wood and plaster, the fronts of which formerly projected, to the exclusion of light and air; but of late years most of these have been widened and improved, and more particularly the avenues to the bridges. The buildings in the more modern parts of the town are elegant and spacious, and Kingsdown and St. Michael's Hill on the north, Park-street and Berkeley-square on the west, and Redcliff Hill on the south, are covered with handsome houses, which are chiefly inhabited by the gentry and mercantile classes. But for a long time the principal inhabitants have been moving towards Clifton, which, in point of fact, is now become the "west end of the town." The streets are generally well paved, with smooth side-paths for foot-passengers; the greater part is well lighted with coal-gas, but some of the shops are lighted with oil-gas; as are also the interiors of many private houses. The public buildings, exclusive of churches, are numerous; the principal of these are the Exchange, a handsome building in the Grecian style, the Guildhall, the Council-house, the Merchants' Hall, the Post Office, Custom House, the City Library, and Commercial Rooms. The Theatre, which is elegant and commodious, was formerly conducted conjointly with the Bath company; but for some years past it has been under the exclusive management of Mr. Macready, father of the celebrated tragedian of that name. The bridge over the Avon was erected in 1768, in lieu of one which had stood several centuries; it consists of three wide and lofty arches, with stone balustrades seven feet high. The river Frome is crossed by a drawbridge, which has two arches of stone. The quay and harbour of Bristol may be deemed objects not only of great local but national interest. On changing the course of the Avon, two handsome cast-iron bridges were erected over the new channel, the respective arches of which are 200 feet in height. The wet docks here are very extensive, and the dimensions of the merchants' floating dock are said to exceed those at Portsmouth and Plymouth. A mile below the city, on the banks of the Avon, is the celebrated Hotwell, the waters of which are reckoned so salutary in consumptive, scorbutic, and inflammatory disorders. Here are a Pump Room, Assembly Rooms, Coffee House, Hotel, and a variety of lodging-houses, not only on a level with the well, but in the beautiful village of Clifton. The city is divided into twelve wards, having an alderman over each. The mayor and recorder hold assizes twice a year for offences committed within the city jurisdiction, either on land or water; and the mayor, aldermen, and town-clerk, hold a quarter-session for the trial of minor offences. Bristol has sent members to Parliament ever since the 23rd of Edward I. All persons are allowed to trade here, and the freedom of the city may be obtained for a very moderate sum. The diocese of Bristol extends over a small part of Gloucestershire and the whole of Dorsetshire; the ecclesiastical dignitaries under the bishop are a dean, six prebendaries, one archdeacon, six minor canons, a chancellor, and registrar. The cathedral, situated on College Green, and dedicated to the Holy Trinity, was originally the collegiate church of the monastery of St. Augustine, founded in the reign of Stephen, by Robert Fitzharding, ancestor of the Berkeley family.

Several of the churches are handsome structures, but they are all exceeded by that of St. Mary Redcliffe, which is deemed one of the most beautiful in England. This city has places of worship for all the leading classes of Protestant dissenters, as well as for the Roman Catholics and the Jews. The establishments for gratuitous education are very numerous, including a city grammar-school for the instruction of the sons of citizens in Latin and Greek. A hospital, founded by Robert Colston, merchant, in 1708, has also a school annexed. There are several minor endowed schools for children of both sexes. The charities and establishments for relief of poverty, disease, and destitution, comprise an infirmary, a dispensary, an hospital for diseases of the eyes, an asylum for poor girls, and for the indigent blind, a female penitentiary, a strangers' friend society, a humane society to recover from the risk of drowning, a mendicity society, and several others. Here is a public library of considerable magnitude, and a philosophical and literary institution.

Bristol, until eclipsed by Liverpool, was the principal port on the western coast of England. Its leading branch of foreign commerce is with the West Indies, which it supplies with every sort of article necessary to the black and white population; and receives back vast quantities of rum, cotton, sugar, and other West India produce in return. Sugar is the most important article, the refining of which is one of the chief manufacturing processes of this city. It has also considerable trade with the north and south of Europe, especially Spain and Portugal, from the former of which it imports wool for the fine cloth manufacturers of the west of England, and from the latter, wine very largely. A considerable mercantile intercourse is also kept up with the ports of the Mediterranean, the Baltic, and the British North American Colonies. The trade with the United States is for the most part confined to tobacco and turpentine. Bristol has attempted very little trade with the East Indies hitherto, but the trade with the new South American states is more prosperous, and seems likely to increase. With Ireland the dealings are very considerable; but they have not augmented agreeably to the expectations formed from the recent lowering of the port dues. The branches of manufactures are numerous; one of the principal of which is that of every description of glass bottles; brass, copper, lead, iron, and tin works, also abound; and great quantities of soap, leather, gunpowder, and earthenware are made here. Ship-building and rope-making are also much pursued. It may in fact be deemed an emporium of every sort of exportable article, and more especially of the principal commodities produced by the surrounding counties.

CHATHAM DOCKYARD—LAUNCH OF THE GOLIATH AND THE VIRAGO.

LAUNCH OF THE GOLIATH AND THE VIRAGO AT CHATHAM.

The launch of the Goliath war-ship of 80 guns, and the second-class war-steamer Virago, from the dock-yard at Chatham, into the waters of the river Medway, drew to this town at an early hour on Monday morning last, crowds of persons of all classes, anxious to be present at this truly national spectacle. Every means of conveyance, both by land and water, were in requisition, and many persons were compelled to walk, through the over-crowded state of the cars, stages, and omnibuses, which were wholly inadequate to meet the demand. By far the greater number of persons arrived by the steam-boats, crowded from the paddle-boxes to the cabins, and were moored in various parts of the Medway to obtain the best view of the launch they possibly could for their customers.

As the time approached for the commencement of the imposing ceremony, the steamers and various craft hoisted flags of all nations, and were decorated from the deck to the mast-head; and the seats in the dock-yard beneath the sheds from which the launches were to take place, became occupied by a most fashionable assemblage of ladies and gentlemen, including a large number of gallant officers, both naval and military. The tasteful manner in which the ship and platforms, upwards of 700 feet in length, were adorned, together with the appearance of the river, an hour previous to the launch, from the decks and portholes of which those who had fortunately been allowed to go on board were gazing, presented a truly gorgeous sight. All the arrangements were conducted with the greatest precision. The vessels took up their stations in the river in the best order, and in such a manner, that the smaller ones should not be behind the larger; whilst within the dock-yard everything for the accommodation of visitors appeared to be complete, and much of that confusion often attendant upon such occasions was avoided. The seats for the accommodation of visitors ran parallel the whole length of the Goliath, and reached to a height nearly level with her deck. To the booths, eight in number, on either side of the Goliath, the public were admitted only by tickets from Captain Sherard, the captain superintendent, and Mr. Pinkham, the master shipwright of the dock-yard. To the platforms, from which the launch of the Virago was viewed, except some few seats in the gallery at her bows for the use of the officials and the nobility, the public generally were admitted.

The most distinguished persons present, including the Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch, Lord and Lady Morley, Lord Ashley, M.P., Lord Grimston, Sir William Gage, Commander-in-Chief of the Fleet, the Hon. Capt. Gage, the Hon. Capt. Fisher, Sir H. Willshire, and Colonel Hayes, Commanders of the Port, Captain Brace, R.N., Captain Sheriff, R.N., and a large body of naval and military officers and their ladies, at about one o'clock, ascended the gallery erected facing the bows of the Virago, which vessel, it was arranged, should first be launched, which was decorated in a very tasteful and appropriate manner. From the summit of the balcony hung the royal standard; and from the bows of the steamer fronting it hung the bottle of wine to be used in the christening ceremony, slung with silken cords attached to slightly-constructed hoops. It was very prettily decorated with rosettes and various-coloured ribbons, and surmounted by a tastefully-arranged V. R., elaborately chased in or molu.

The arrangements for the launch of the vessel were under the superintendence of Mr. Pinkham, the master shipwright; and everything having been declared as ready, the announcement was made by the sounding of bugles from the stem, which were answered by others at the stern. At this moment the Hon. Mrs. Grey dashed the bottle against the bow of the ship. Shouts arose on every side, the band struck up the national anthem, every one being uncovered, in the midst of which the gallant vessel moved majestically into the river. The town band continued to play several lively airs during the egress of the company, and throughout their progress to the various booths erected for them in the vicinity of the chief point of attraction—the Goliath. The splendour of the decorations here far surpassed those of the former. The principal portion of the chief booth at the head of the vessel was occupied by about one hundred ladies and gentlemen connected with Rochester Cathedral and the town choir; the Royal Marine band and the band of the 93d regiment were stationed in the shed just between midships of the Goliath.

Before the ceremony of christening the Goliath was commenced, the band played "God save the Queen," after which a hymn, written for the occasion, and adapted to Purcell's "Strike the Cymbal," was sung. The bugles having been sounded from the head, and answered from the stern, at a quarter past two o'clock the Duchess of Buccleuch stepped forward, and, under the direction of Captain Sherard, took the bottle of wine, slung and adorned as that described at the former launch, into her hands, and as she broke it, though with a little difficulty, against the bows, exclaimed "The Goliath," the bolts and dogshores were removed, and the ponderous vessel in a few seconds moved slowly and gracefully from the docks, and floated up the Medway. The cheers which arose from the docks, the deck of the ship, from the craft in the river, and from the opposite bank, were loud and long continued; and the beauty of the scene was heightened by the loud discharge of volleys of cannon from Chatham heights, and it was apparently with the greatest reluctance that the people quitted so delightful an exhibition. The launch of both vessels was conducted in such an admirable manner, that not the slightest accident occurred, either on the river or ashore; and the distinguished company, after partaking of an elegant déjeuné which had been provided for them, separated highly delighted.

TERRIFIC THUNDER STORM ON THURSDAY MORNING.

At a very early hour on Thursday morning the metropolis was visited by a tremendous storm of thunder and lightning, accompanied by torrents of rain and hail, which continued, with scarcely any intermission, till six o'clock. The flashes of lightning were awfully vivid, and several of them were followed by terrific peals of thunder, resembling the report of a volley of artillery. One of the loudest was at the commencement between twelve and one o'clock, which came from S.S.E., and did considerable damage at Vauxhall and Newington. The electric fluid struck a chimney stack on a small house situate at the corner of Clarence-place and Norfolk-street, Vauxhall; it penetrated through the roof, carrying with it a great portion of the brick-work, destroying the frame-work of a closet in the room beneath, breaking away a great portion of the ceiling, cracking the walls of the chimney, smashing nearly every square of glass in the window-frame, shivering part of the woodwork of the bedstead, wherein lay three young children, who were providentially uninjured. After doing this damage, the lightning forced its way between the joints of the brick-stone into the lower room, where Mr. and Mrs. Moss, the father and mother, were lying in bed with two children, who also as miraculously escaped injury, notwithstanding the mantelpiece was shivered to atoms, portions of which were thrown on to the bed; the fire-irons and some other articles were driven across the room with great violence; in fact, almost every article of furniture was broken or damaged; the window-shutter was blown from its hinges into the street. Police constable L 22, who was on duty at the same time, describes the appearance as awful, adding that the roofs of the above and several adjoining houses appeared on fire, and that the shock drove him violently against the wall, and singed his right hand.

About the same time the electric fluid penetrated the clock turret of the chapel at the Fishmongers' Almshouses, near the Elephant and Castle, Newington, and melted and destroyed a part of the works of the clock, so as wholly to suspend the movement, which is fully indicated by the hands having remained stationary since 23 minutes past 12: from thence the electric flame broke through and damaged the roof, causing the northern wall of the tower to bulge, and present a very dangerous appearance; and passing out of the upper part of the fine old Gothic window at the east end of the chapel, smashed several panes of glass and damaged the stone framework; it then proceeded along the lead which covers the cornice of the adjoining low buildings, occupied by some of the inmates, and descended through the interior of a leaden rain-water pipe, perforating an orifice near the lower part of about three inches in diameter, from whence it passed into a cask used to catch the rain-water which descends from the roof, and after splintering several of the staves, drove out the metal tap at the bottom, tearing away a large piece of stave with it, and finally appears to have buried itself beneath a quantity of garden-pots, several of which, with the plants therein, are broken and damaged.

The storm was also very violent about Battersea, Wandsworth, Putney, Mortlake, Roehampton, and Barnes. In the two latter villages a number of houses were unroofed, and several valuable haystacks almost wholly destroyed. About half-past five o'clock a boat, in which were two women, named Holmes and Farley, was swamped near Wandsworth meadows, and both perished. In this neighbourhood stacks of chimneys and roofs of houses have been considerably damaged.

Mr. Howell, the district-surveyor of St. Margaret's, Westminster, and his wife, who reside in Vincent-square, had a most narrow escape of their lives. The lightning struck the window of the bedroom in which they were lying, and shattered the glass to pieces, it passed with a hissing sound close to Mr. and Mrs. Howell, who, as may be supposed, were in a state of extreme alarm; thence into the front room and up the chimney, a large stack of which was thrown in all directions; it descended again and forced the glass of the window to atoms, and set the curtain and some other furniture on fire; from thence it passed across the road to the lodge at the corner of the square, belonging to the cricket-ground of the Westminster scholars, with an astonishing velocity, and broke two of the squares of glass; it afterwards passed off in an oblique direction, and shattered the corner of the roof, and then seemed to strike into the earth. Several windows and chimneys have been shattered in the same neighbourhood.

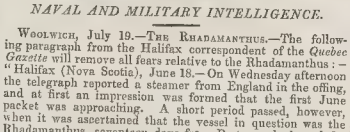
Considerable damage has been done to the church of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields: two large stones, about 30lbs. weight, were struck off the steeple by the electric fluid, and forced their way through the roof, over the staircase leading to the gallery. The corner pew on the north-east side was also struck with lightning, and the woodwork split and rent in several pieces. Sir John Rennie, Mr. Hayward, and others, have called at the office this morning, and we understand that they are of opinion that the whole fabric of this magnificent church has been shaken, but at present the amount of injury cannot be exactly ascertained. It is supposed by some that the steeple must be pulled down.

The family of a plumber residing at Woolwich, named Chapman, had a narrow escape. The electric fluid struck, in the first instance, the brickwork of the chimney, a quantity of which it displaced, and then dividing into two currents, entered the front bedroom by the window, which it forced out, and, traversing the apartment, effected its escape without inflicting any other personal injury than a slight bruise on the shoulder of one of the females who was sleeping in the room. Running along the front of the house, it then passed down an iron tube which had been erected as a temporary chimney by the tenant of the adjoining house, and forced its way out by the shop window, the shutters of which were loosely put up, without damaging any of the furniture. The other current passed down the chimney of Mr. Chapman's house, and tearing its way through a screen which had been placed across the fire-place, passed over the bed in which the servant was sleeping, and struck the wall with such force, that the plaster was thrown on the opposite door in the form of the finest powder.

THE UNIVERSITIES.

University of Cambridge.—The syndicate appointed to inquire into the state of the funds of the University, have reported to the Senate, that the funded property of the University has been very considerably diminished by a succession of large extraordinary expenses. Besides the diminution of income arising from this reduction of capital, the permanent annual expenditure of the University has been very considerably increased, as well by the provision made for the maintenance and management of the observatory, as also by various new arrangements, partly consequent upon the extension of the public buildings and scientific collections of the University, and partly arising out of the enlarged system of academical examination. It is therefore recommended by the syndicate, that the fees payable to the University chest on matriculation, and on admission to any degree, be increased according to the following scale, viz.—that on matriculation every tradesman and fellow-commoner pay an additional sum of £3, and every pensioner an additional sum of £3. That every person admitted to any degree, unless it be honorary, pay an additional sum of £1 10s. The proposition will be submitted to the syndicate on the 10th of October.

University of Edinburgh.—Mr. James Miller has been elected Professor of Surgery to this University, in the place of the late Sir Charles Bell. The other candidate Mr. Lizars, was not even proposed. The election to the Chair of Pathology, vacant by the resignation of Dr. Thompson, will take place on the 9th of next month. The candidates are Dr. Craigie, Dr. Henderson, Dr. John Davy, Dr. Handyside, and Dr. Bennett.



NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

Woolwich, July 19.—The Rhadamanthus.—The following paragraph from the Halifax correspondent of the Quebec Gazette will remove all fears relative to the Rhadamanthus:—"Halifax (Nova Scotia), June 18.—On Wednesday afternoon the telegraph reported a steamer from England in the offing, and at first an impression was formed that the first June packet was approaching. A short period passed, however, when it was ascertained that the vessel in question was the Rhadamanthus, seventeen days from Portsmouth, bound for New York, having on board Mr. Wright, an express messenger, with despatches from the government to Lord Ashburton. Several reasons have been assigned for the unexpected visit of the Rhadamanthus. According to the earliest information she was necessitated to put in here because her stock of coal was exhausted, though in fact she had abundance; but we have heard on good authority that, as was confidently reckoned in England, Admiral Sir Charles Adam would have arrived from Bermuda, the commander of the Rhadamanthus was instructed by government to deviate from the track to New York for the purpose of communicating with him previously to her proceeding thither."

Orders were received at Woolwich, during the past week, to build a war steamer of very large dimensions, to be named the Dragon. The order has been countermanded so far as regards being built at Woolwich, but she will be immediately commenced at Sheerness or Chatham, most probably at the latter port. Some idea may be formed of the stupendous magnitude of this vessel, when it is stated her engines are to be of the immense power of 800 horses.

Lieut.-General Sir William Gomm and suite embarked at Portsmouth on Sunday afternoon on board the Cleopatra, 26, Captain Wyvill, and sailed early on Monday morning with the governor for the Mauritius.

Plymouth, July 24.—The Satellite, 18, Commander Gambier, having had her defects made good, sailed yesterday for the South American station. The Albatross, 16, Commander Reginald York, put in here on Thursday from Portsmouth, with some slight defects, which being made good, she sailed on Saturday for the North America and West India station. The Portsmouth buoy boat, and the Adventure transport, Roskilly master, arrived with stores from Portsmouth, on Friday. The Falmouth lighter, Everson master, sailed with stores for Portsmouth on Friday. The Actæon, 20, Captain Russell, was paid off on Friday. The Wellesley, 74, Captain T. Maitland, was brought into harbour to be paid off yesterday. The Devon lighter, Tozer master, is loading for Holyhead and Liverpool. In Hamoaze:—The Caledonia, the San Josef, the Wellesley, the Wolf, the Sylph, and Netley tenders; the Confiance steam vessel; the Devon and Camel lighters, and the Portsmouth buoy boat. The report that the Caledonia, 120, is to be removed from her present moorings into the Sound, is as incorrect as that respecting the St. Vincent, 120, guard-ship at Portsmouth, being stationed at Spithead.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

Stornaway, July 16.—The Water Witch, from St. Petersburgh to Belfast, has put in here with damage, having been on the rocks near Tenuman Head, on the 14th inst. The Keith Stewart, from Falmouth Bay to Liverpool, was abandoned on the 14th inst., in Tolsta Bay, and subsequently foundered. Crew saved.

Dingle, July 21.—The stern frame of a vessel, with some logs of timber, apparently American, one of them much burnt, and lately been washed on shore here, and more recently the lid of a box, marked in a circle, "Lassuriana, A. C."

Elsinore, July 19.—The Forth, from Leith to St. Petersburgh, in entering this harbour, struck the pier-head, carried away cutwater, and damaged her wheels. The number of ships that entered the Sound in 1842 was 1991—viz., 1115 from the North Sea, and 836 from the Baltic; 319 from the North Sea, and 208 from the Baltic—in all 527—were English.—Hamburgh papers.

Madeira, July 5.—The Shannon, from Liverpool, put in here on the 1st inst., leaky, and must discharge about 250 tons of coal, her cargo, being overloaded.

British Accra, April 22.—The Prince Oscar went ashore at Popo on the 17th inst., and became a total wreck. Crew saved.

Havre, July 22.—The Racine, from St. Peter's, Martinique, to Havre, has put back to Fort Royal leaky, making 18 inches of water per hour, and must discharge. The Pactolus, from New Orleans to Havre, was ashore on the bar at the entrance of the Mississipi on the 29th ult.

Ramsgate, July 22.—The George Cadwear, from Christchurch to London, foundered about five miles S. W. of the North Foreland.

Hartlepool, July 22.—The Alert, from Newcastle to Hamburgh, put in here yesterday in a sinking state.

Dartmouth, July 24.—The Thetis barque has arrived off the Start, from Picton for London, in lat. 52 W. and lon. 45 2 N., fell in with quantities of ice, and for several days ice was in sight, and did not get clear of it until reaching lat. 47 N. lon. 46, 6 W.

Cork, July 22.—The John Francis, arrived off Cove, passed the bottom of a large ship, Cape Clear, bearing E.S.E. 45.

Deal, July 23.—Wind N. N. W. moderate. 24, S. W. to S. moderate.—Arrived the John King from the Mauritius, Seabird from Cape Coast Castle, Thetis from Picton, Curlew and Hercules from Quebec. Sailed the Chamois for Buenos Ayres. The George the Fourth transport for St. Helena, &c., remains.

Beachy Head, July 22.—Arrived off, the Caspar, from Philadelphia, for Bremen.

Jersey, July 22.—The Fanny, bound to Liverpool, in beating out on the 20th inst., missed stays, and ran on the Corbiere rocks, but was got off on the flood, and put back with little damage, and proceeded this morning.

Portsmouth, July 21.—The Henry and William from Shields to Glasgow, struck on a sunken rock at the entrance of Islay Sound, and ran ashore yesterday. The vessel is covered at high water, but is expected to be got afloat if the weather moderates; crew saved.

The Russian Steam-Frigate Jupiter.—On Monday this splendid and powerful steam-ship, commanded by Capt. Water, arrived in the river, off St. Katherine's Docks, from St. Petersburgh, having left that city on Sunday, the 17th inst. On her passage she encountered heavy weather, and was detained fifteen hours at Copenhagen for a supply of coals. By the accounts brought over by her, it appears that a grand review was expected to take place on the 18th, of the whole of the Russian fleet quartered on the home station, consisting of 18 sail of the line, 15 frigates, and 16 or 18 corvettes, and were drawn up in three lines in the Cronstad roads.

Falmouth, July 26.—The Tweed steamer, Capt. Franklyn, from the West Indies, arrived this morning at eight o'clock, having sailed from Turk's Island the 20th of June, Nassau the 4th, Bermuda the 10th, and Fayal the 19th inst., and bringing about forty passengers, 90 serons cochineal, and 200,000 dollars on freight. The Trent, from the Havanah, sailed on the 1st instant, and brought the mails to Nassau. The Clyde, from Jamaica, arrived at Turk's Island on the 28th of June. The Tay, with the windward mails, arrived at Turk's Island on the 30th of June, and returned with the mail, per Clyde, on the same day. The scarlet fever was raging at St. Jago du Cuba.

In the report of the captain of the Diane of Bordeaux, just arrived from Calcutta, we find (says the Debats) the following passages:—"On June 13th, in lat. 11 deg. North, lon. 28 deg. 30 min. west, I spoke the English ship-of-war Termagant, who supplied us with 300lbs. of biscuit, though she was herself short of provisions. The captain passed part of the day on board the Diane, and his boat's crew and our men were very cordial. On parting we exchanged salutes. The sloop, which was leaving the African station, had captured several Spanish and Brazilian slavers, but had been beaten off by one large armed brig. The captain of the Termagant had received two wounds in his arm, and had seven of his men also wounded in attempting to board. We again fell in with this sloop on July 7th, off the Azores."

PROVINCIAL.

Turn out of Colliers in South Staffordshire.—Birmingham, Tuesday evening.—Accounts have been brought to Birmingham by the various conveyances from the mining districts, that the colliers in the neighbourhood of Bilston, West Bromwich, and Walsall, instigated by emissaries sent from the Potteries, have turned out, and are parading the country in different directions, demanding food, and levying contributions on the inhabitants. Large bodies were met on the road leading to Walsall, where it appears the same plan which was put into successful operation in the Potteries, has been adopted. The men having turned out at one or two of the pits, proceeded to visit the extensive works of the Earl of Bradford, the coal and stone works of Dudley Benthers, and the lime works of Mr. Adams, at the Butts, Mr. Brower's, Mr. Stroughearn, at Doe End, and other masters, where the men were compelled to leave work and join the turn-out, those who refused to do so being ducked in the canal. At the time the accounts left, the colliers were proceeding in bodies towards Mr. Piper's works at Bloxwich, and the Brownhill and Pelsall works, in the direction of Lichfield. On obtaining information of the turn-out, and the violent proceedings of the colliers, Lord Dartmouth and the magistrates of the neighbourhood were promptly on the spot, and lost no time in calling out the Staffordshire troop of yeomanry, and taking measures for quelling any disturbance which might take place.

State of the Potteries.—Burslem, Monday.—Great numbers, probably three-fourths of those out of employment, are willing to return to work, but are deterred by the fear of personal violence on the part of the leaders of the "turn-out," should they do so. This applies to the collieries alone, for Messrs. Copeland and Garret, Mr. Minton, Mr. Davenport, Mr. Alcock, and other manufacturers, will be able to resume operations during the present week, having made arrangements for obtaining supplies of coals (although at a greatly increased expense) from distant collieries. This will be a great relief to the potters, who are in no way mixed up with the "turn-out," beyond the unfortunate circumstance of their dependence upon others for the large supply of coal required for carrying on their trade.

Tuesday Morning.—The manufacturers have succeeded in convincing a large number of the colliers of the folly of their proceedings. Mr. Kinnersley's men having agreed to resume work at their former rate of wages. The whole of these men have been sworn in as special constables, and the magistrates have also adopted the precaution of stationing a party of the military near Mr. Kinnersley's works at Ridsgrove, for the purpose of protecting the men from the violence of the other colliers, should they attempt to interfere with them. This will put an end to the "strikes," as it will enable the manufacturers to obtain supplies of coal, and give work to thousands who would otherwise be thrown out of employment. The Ridsgrove works are the most extensive in the district, and as a large body of men will be thus withdrawn from the "turn-out," the other colliers, finding the coalition broken up, will be sure to follow their example. A large meeting of colliers was held at Hanley, to consult respecting their future proceedings, when much discontent was evinced by a number of the men at the conduct of the leaders of the strike, and they proposed that they should at once return to work on the terms which the masters had offered, but the proposition was over-ruled by the majority, and the meeting broke up without coming to any decision as to what should be done. The families of the colliers are suffering very great privations. The markets, yesterday, in Burslem, were nearly deserted, only fifteen butchers having attended the shambles, the usual number on market days being from seventy to eighty. The Burslem and Molstanton Union Workhouses are besieged daily with applicants, and the guardians have been compelled to break through the rules of the board, and give out-door relief to a great extent. The extensive collieries at Goldenhill and Ridsgrove have commenced work at the old rate of wages. The 60th Rifles arrived at Goldenhill colliery at half-past six o'clock, and took up their quarters at the new school-room, near the church. The colliers that have commenced work extend through a district of about four miles in extent, belonging to Messrs. Kinnersley and Williamson.

Turn-Out at Walsall, Bilston, and Neighbourhood.—Westbromwich, Tuesday Evening.—To-day the colliers, to the number of some hundreds, marched out of Bilston to Walsall, where there was to be a large meeting held at Wolverhampton. They had also turned out in large numbers and surrounded the poor-house, and commenced levying contributions on the inhabitants. I have also been informed, by good authority, that the "turn-outs" compelled the men employed in the lime and other works to leave off, and no small terror and alarm has been excited. The yeomanry cavalry have been called out, and Lord Dartmouth is said to have arrived at Walsall. Indeed, the whole of this district seems in commotion, and there can be little doubt that the men are acted upon by the Staffordshire men. A troop of the dragoons, stationed at the Birmingham barracks, were seen on their way to Walsall this morning, about twelve o'clock.

Walsall, Four o'clock.—the 3rd Dragoon Guards and Cavalry are stationed here in different parts of the town. The colliers have compelled the men in several large works to stop and join them. The magistrates, with Lord Dartmouth, are sitting at the Crown Inn, taking measures to keep the peace. The mob have ducked several men in the canals who refused to join them. The mob are now gone towards Bloxwich and Pelsall to stop works there. They are levying contributions of food upon the people. At Wolverhampton, to-day, they did the same, and surrounded the workhouse in great numbers.

Whirlwind.—About five o'clock on Tuesday evening last, the inhabitants of Birkenhead were alarmed by one of those unfrequent visitations of Providence. Not a breath of wind was felt at the time—"every leaf was at rest"—when suddenly a loud roar was heard, resembling the falling of waters down a cataract. This noise continued for about two minutes, when the wind came from the south-east, apparently embracing only about eight yards in breadth, and its force was so powerful that it beat down everything before it, shaking the houses it passed to their very foundations, and throwing up the water in the pits to a height of three or four yards. Providentially no other injury was done than the breaking of some windows, and throwing down bricks, slates, &c. The passengers by the Chester train were coming up Jay-street at the time, and many of them were thrown upon the ground by the wind, and others had their umbrellas torn to pieces. The effect of the whirlwind was not felt more than three minutes.—Liverpool Mail.

Opening of the Brighton Railway Steam-Packet Wharf, Brighton, July 26.—Yesterday a party of about fifty gentlemen went on board the steam-packet Dart, after she had landed her passengers from Dieppe at the Chain Pier, and proceeded to Shoreham harbour to celebrate the opening of the new steam-packet wharf, erected by the railway company at their terminus at Kingston. The vessel entered the western arm of the harbour instead of the eastern, as hitherto, and moored alongside of the General Steam Navigation Company's vessel, the Lord Melville, which had arrived yesterday to be ready to start to-day on her first voyage to Havre. A place is fitted up for the examination of passengers' luggage on the spot, so that within the shortest possible space of time after the arrival of the packets passengers will proceed by a special train, which will be sent on the packet's arrival to convey them to the Brighton station; and those who proceed to London may do so by the first train after the packet's arrival. Send passengers from London may place themselves in the railway-train at London-bridge, and in less than three hours after embark at the wharf in smooth water. The improvements in the harbour, and the accomodation afforded by the railway, offer advantages which only require to be known to be appreciated.

Extraordinary Escape of a Coroner, Surgeon, Jury and Police.—Last week Mr. Thomas Sollis, a farmer of Bishop's Cleeve, near Cheltenham, occupier of several fields close to Southam House, the seat of the Rt. Hon. Lord Ellenborough, left home to proceed to the village of Gretton, near Winchcomb, but not returning, as expected, his wife and sons became alarmed, and, after considerable search, his body was eventually discovered near some stables in a distant field. The body was conveyed home, and the county coroner, J. Barnett, Esq., was sent for, and speedily came to the spot, having first forwarded his warrant and instructions to the police for assembling a jury of farmers and other neighbours of the deceased. A jury of fourteen after having been sworn, and charged by the coroner, repaired with him, the surgeon, C. J. Hawkins, Esq., and the police, to view and examine the body, which lay on six chairs in a small room, on the ground floor, adjoining a kitchen in the house, the property of the deceased, and in this room there was scarcely room for all to stand. The two last jurymen were just entering it, followed by a reporter of one of the Cheltenham papers, and Superintendent Russell, when an extraordinary noise like cracking was heard, and in an instant the whole floor gave way in the centre, with the joists and beams under, precipitating twelve of the jury, with the coroner, surgeon, and police into the cellar below, and over them rolling, with the chairs on which it rested, the body of the deceased. The clouds of dust enveloped all in momentary obscurity. At length the party in the cellar were presented to view, but no means of any egress were observable, the ordinary entrance to the cellar having been stopped up with broken and still falling timber and rubbish. A ladder however was ultimately procured, and they were thus enabled to emerge from the living sepulchre. We are happy to say no limbs were broken, although sundry sprains, scars, and bruises were complained of by all. The inquiry was adjourned to a neighbour's house, and, after the evidence of several witnesses, and the surgeon, a verdict of "found dead" was returned; the contents of deceased's pockets, with the money being safe, and nothing appearing to give rise to the idea that he had purposely drowned himself in the trough, but that he fell back (having complained of his head) in a fit; but of this there was no clear evidence.

Inundation.—We are sorry to announce the commencement of this foul crime in this neighbourhood. On Saturday evening, however, a rick of hay belonging to Mr. Were, of Farleigh, was discovered to be on fire, and great part of it was burnt. There is but little doubt of its being set on fire. On the same evening another hayrick, belonging to Mr. Cannon of the Angel Inn, and standing in a field adjoining the Barnstaple-road, was also attempted to be fired, as a lucifer match, containing lucifer matches, &c., was discovered thrust into a hole in the hay.—Exeter Paper.

Frightful Occurrence on the River Medway, near Chatham.—Seven Lives Lost.—On Monday forenoon last, an occurrence of a most painful character took place on the river Medway, between Chatham and Sheerness, occasioned by a man-of-war's gig capsizing, by which seven persons, belonging to her Majesty's surveying steamer Shearwater, were drowned. It appears that soon after eight o'clock on Monday morning, Lieutenant Cudlip, of the steamer above-mentioned, in company with Mr. T. Corral, the surgeon, left Sheerness in the captain's gig, for the purpose of proceeding to Chatham Dockyard for a supply of provisions and stores, and also to witness the launches of the Goliath and the Virago. Six of the Shearwater's crew went with them, and it seems on their clearing Stangate Creek, about three miles below Sheerness, the sail was hoisted, and all made way on the boat, so as to reach Chatham early. All went on favourably until they arrived at the Point in Jolly or Pincup Reach (near Gillingham, about eight miles from Chatham), when a sudden squall caught the lug-sail, just as the boat was rounding the Point, and before there was time to bring her to, the sail fouled round the halyards and mast, and instantly capsized, precipitating the whole of its crew into the river. There is no doubt many of the unfortunate persons, who were swimmers, could have saved themselves, but the whole of them, Lieutenant Cudlip excepted, got entangled, in their efforts to escape, with the sails and ropes, and they perished by being drawn down with the boat, she having at the time several hundred weight of ballast in her. Lieutenant Cudlip was sitting along with Mr. Corral in the stern of the boat, steering, and at the moment of overturning he contrived to throw himself out beyond reach of the sail, and thus escaped being drawn down by his companions. Fortunately he caught hold of the backboard of the boat, which by some means had got detached, and this kept him from sinking. He, however, was floating about for upwards of three quarters of an hour before assistance came up, when the Queen Victoria Steamer, which left Chatham at twelve o'clock, bore down, and picked him up; but he was in a most exhausted condition. The vessel brought to for some time in the hopes of securing some of the others, but none of them appeared above the surface. The Victoria then proceeded to Sheerness, where Lieutenant Cudlip was conveyed on board the Shearwater, which is lying off the Royal Dockyard, where he now remains.

Fatal Railway Accident.—A fatal accident occurred on the line of the Manchester and Birmingham railway, on Monday forenoon last. A farmer, named John Leah, aged 52, residing at Cheadle Hulme, Cheshire, having engaged some men to mow the hay grass growing on the slopes of the line, was watching them work, and as the half-past nine o'clock train was advancing from Manchester, he observed his dog lying basking on the line. The dog not heeding his call, he ran to take it out of the danger, and, immediately on his getting hold of it the engine came up and knocked him down, and some of the carriage-wheels passed over his body. He was killed on the spot, and his body was much mutilated.

Cardiff.—Execution of Tamar Dick for the Murder of his Mother.—Richard Edwards, alias Tamar Dick, who, at the last Glamorganshire assizes, was found guilty of the murder of his mother, Tamar Edwards, underwent the extreme penalty of the law, on Saturday morning last, on a gallows erected in front of the county gaol, Cardiff. Since sentence was passed upon him, this wretched man, whose life had been one continuous scene of dissipation and crime, manifested a sullenness of disposition for which he has ever been characterised; but as the awful period fixed for his execution approached, he yielded to the expostulations of the Rev. Mr. Stacey, chaplain of the gaol, and directed his thoughts to his sinful and wretched condition, and the necessity for supplicating pardon at the throne of grace for his great and manifold transgressions.

IRELAND.

GREAT MEETING OF THE ROYAL AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY OF IRELAND.

(From the Cork papers of Thursday.)

Whilst we write, this important and splendid meeting is being held. Never has it been our lot to witness a more magnificent display of high rank, wealth, and respectability associated for, under proper direction, a benevolent and a hallowed object. We have never witnessed a more animated or delightful scene. There were assembled the principal nobility and gentry of the country, from Limerick, Clare, Waterford, Kerry, Dublin, and Cork, together with our distinguished visitors from Scotland and England. The place where the "show" takes place, as if built expressly for the purpose, is, as our readers are aware, a large and extensive area enclosed, and covering about twenty acres. Through the entire span of it sheds have been erected for the cattle.

The show yard.

The show-yard is thronged to excess, not only with quadrupeds of every size, shape, and colour, but with bipeds also. That part of it which first attracts attention is the point farthest from the entrance, where the incessant noise of a steam-engine brings everybody to see what it has been set to work for. The object is nothing more nor less than this, to illustrate to what an extent machinery may be brought in even tilling the earth, and all the various ramifications attached thereto. It was well observed, in the account of the late Bristol Show, that if the machinery for tilling there exhibited were to perform half the functions their inventors named, there would no longer be any need of labourers at all, and here today a very good practical illustration of that assertion was given. A steam-engine, erected specially in the yard for the purpose, was set going, and to it were attached two pieces of machinery, the one busily employed in showing that human labour may be dispensed with, at least so far as threshing went; for it threshed, and cut, and chopped, and made piecemeal in five minutes of as much oats and straw as one man could in one day. Then came the machine destined in future to supersede, in these realms, the further use of the "bill-hook;" next followed a winnowing machine to be worked by a horse, and that was succeeded by ploughs, and harrows, and drills, and rakes, and spades, and every other imaginable machine that could by any possible means be thought of to supersede human labour. There were no fewer than twenty-seven specimens of ploughs, each of which could accomplish, by the aid of one man or one horse, almost the labour of twenty-seven men in a day, or something very close upon it.

Great Council Dinner.

The first great council dinner of the Royal Agricultural Improvement Society of Ireland took place on Wednesday, in the Clarence-rooms of the Imperial Hotel. The dinner was served in Mr. M'Dowell's admirable style, and was spoken of in high terms of approbation by the noblemen and gentlemen, who for the first time, have visited Cork. The room, which was brilliantly lighted with gas and wax, had, when the company took their places, a very imposing effect. At eight o'clock the company sat down to dinner. Lord Viscount Bernard, M. P., took the chair. Lord Viscount Doneraile filled the vice-chair.

When the cloth was removed the usual loyal toasts were given, and "The Lord Lieutenant and prosperity to Ireland."

The Chairman,—My lords and gentlemen, I rise to propose the most important toast which it wil be my duty to submit to you this evening, and one which I am sure you will receive with the most enthusiastic cheers, when I name the Royal Agricultural Improvement Society of Ireland (hear), and I am happy to have this opportunity of expressing what we all cordially feel—our sense of gratitude to the society for having selected Cork. I look upon the result of this meeting with feelings of no ordinary pleasure. Bound as I am with this country by every tie, and by no stronger than that of the deepest affection, I cannot but feel that a brighter day is dawning on Ireland—that the shades of ignorance and prejudice, which have so long obstructed our prospects and paralysed our energy, are about to disappear before the light of agricultural science. (Cheers.) The cheers with which you will receive this toast which will not merely die upon those walls, but will reverberate through the length and breadth of Ireland, will cheer many a drooping spirit, and revive many a desponding heart. They will proclaim, in intelligible language, which will find a response in every peasant's breast, that the day of Ireland's misery is over; that a country upon which Providence has poured down with no unsparing hand its choicest blessings—possessed of almost unexampled fertility—blessed with a mild and genial climate (hear)—intersected with navigable rivers—her coast indented with harbours capable of containing the navy of the world, shall no longer remain a by-word or reproach among nations—poor in the midst of riches—neglecting her natural capabilities, and wasting the energies of her people. But if there is one point of more sincere congratulation than another, it is that all political subjects are excluded—that within these walls all party strife must cease—all subjects of difference must be forgotten—that we may meet here to consider how we can best improve our country. His lordship concluded by proposing "The success of the Royal Agricultural Society of Ireland."

Mr. Purcell read a letter from Mr. Maginis, secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant. He would read it to the meeting.—

"Phœnix Park, July 19.

"Sir,—I am directed by the Lord-Lieutenant to apprise you, for the information of the Council of the Royal Agricultural Improvement Society of Ireland, that he has given orders to the comptroller of his household to pay on demand £100 to the funds of the society, which his excellency requests you will announce as a contribution towards the advancement of the objects proposed by the society, on which so closely depends the prosperity of the country.

"I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servant,

"Arthur Maginis.

"The secretary to the Royal Agricultural Improvement Society."

The Chairman then gave "The Royal Agricultural Society of England, and the deputation we have had from it to-day."

The Marquis of Downshire then rose to return thanks for the honour which they conferred upon the Royal Agricultural Society of England, but in saying this he begged to add that there was a considerable degree of regret mingled with his satisfaction. What he alluded to was the absence of his worthy friend their most able chairman, Mr. Handley, who dcsired him to express to this meeting, and all interested in the agriculture of Ireland, his regret that it was perfectly out of his power to attend their interesting meeting. After an eloquent speech on the benefits of agriculture, the noble Marquis concluded by proposing the health of the president of the day, "Lord Viscount Bernard." Drunk with tremendous cheering.

The noble chairman returned thanks.

The noble Chairman in proposing the next toast, spoke in high terms of Scotch farming, and gave "The Highland Society," which was drunk with loud cheers.

Mr. Smith, of Deanston, spoke to the toast.

A number of other toasts were then given and responded to, and the company separated.

The entire proceedings were of the most gratifying character.

close of the agricultural meeting.

(From the Cork Constitution of Saturday.)

The grand assembly ball and supper of the National Agricultural Association took place last night, at the Corn Exchange, and was the most brilliant assemblage ever congregated together in this city. It comprised all the nobility and gentry who met in the city for the first time, besides the leading families of the counties of Cork, Limerick, Waterford, and Kerry. At one period the number in the ball-room amounted to at least 1400. The company began to arrive at ten o'clock, and dancing was kept up with spirit until daylight appeared.

At the county Antrim Assizes two sisters were sentenced by Judge Perrin to be hanged, for the murder of the illegitimate infant of one of them.

The Inquest at Kathmines.—The inquiry into the cause of the death of the late Mr. Augustin Byrne still "drags its slow length along," without any satisfactory result either as to the guilt or innocence of the suspected party having been established. Yesterday was the tenth day, and no new fact bearing on the case was elicited, though all the disgusting details which have been repeated usque ad nauseam, and which are so disgraceful to the parties concerned, were again the subject of examination. Why are not the medical men at once called on? Their testimony might throw some light upon the affair, and put an end to the constant squabbling of counsel, which tends to protract the investigation unprofitably. We know not whether the coroner, the jury, or the counsel, are to blame; but we do know that the entire city pronounces the tedious progress of the inquest obnoxious and ridiculous.—Dublin Evening Packet.

LITERATURE.

THE PALFREY; a Love Story of the Olden Time. By LEIGH HUNT. 8vo. pp. 80. London, 1842. How and Parsons.

So Leigh Hunt has published another poem—merry in its buoyancy, and fresh in its animal spirits as any that he wrote of yore; and there are hundreds of his old companions in song, who will give it a welcome as warm and affectionate as can be inspired by old associations, and a natural admiration of his school. Of this school we are not ourselves the personal advocates. We are of those who think that quaintness of conceit and eccentricity of expression, do not constitute any of the elements of poetry, although the presence of the spirit of genuine poetry in those conceits and expressions may win our forgiveness for the defects amid which the life we look for is enshrined. Nor can we ever bring ourselves to believe, that the overleaping the ordinary bounds of rhythm—the throwing up of little pebbly rocks, to break the rippling current of rhyme—are the necessary proofs of a gushing and unfettered freedom of style, that has any of the advantages of beauty over the more modest progress of ordinary verse. We therefore would prefer to take Leigh Hunt generally without his faults, although we know that there are hundreds in the world who take those faults for beauties, and would defend them with romantic ardour under that category.

We are pleased, however, to know that, whether beauties or faults, they form only the outward deforming or embellishing shell in which lie many gentle and noble thoughts, in which the sweet shrine is hidden whereon the poet's true fire burns. We care not for the conch itself, but we listen attentively and with witched ear to the musical murmurs from within.

There is undoubtedly a vein of poetry in Leigh Hunt's spirit and nature—he has ever bent his knee to its genius—he has almost grown old in its worship; and, it is fair to add, that there is, in all he write, much purity of heart—that he hugs the one quality of human kindliness into an affection for all the world—that he passionately devotes himself to the inspirations of external nature—that he loves the beautiful, find it where he will, upon the green-clad landscape, in the blushing garden, or upon the human form divine. He is still fresh and smiling and happy too as he lures you along, and you find that he has full and warm companionship with you as you read, that makes you give him a hearty grasp at parting, and exclaim, "Thank you, old fellow—when we are thirsty we will drink with you at Helicon again."

The little volume entitled "The Palfrey," now before us, may take class with most of the productions of its author. It is a pleasing little romantic narrative of the old Norman school, founded upon one of the French Fabliaux & Contes, which preceded the days of Chaucer and Boccacio. The story is pretty and whimsical, showing how a proud and nimble palfrey bears a knight through adventure, and a lady through love, until both arrive at that blessed matrimonial destination which is the great bourne of the happy poetry of all time. Some of the scenes are laid in the old localities of the present Kensington Gardens, a neighbourhood in which Leigh Hunt appears to have resided during his time of inspiration, and, as he composed much of its thought and melody among the groves which embower the birth-place of our beloved Queen, he has dedicated the entire poem to his gentle royal mistress. First, let us introduce our readers to the lady heroine and the motto.

"The palfrey goes, the palfrey goes,
Merrily well the palfrey goes,
He carrieth laughter, he carrieth woes,
But merrily ever the palfrey goes."

The lady so well mounted and prettily caparisoned is the sweet Anne Paul. Now for a description of her lover:—

"Now, for any deed else, in love or in war,
Knight bolder was none, than the knight De la Barre,
(So styled by the King, from a traitor tall Whom he pitch'd over barriers, armour and all);
Short distance made he betwixt point and hilt;
He was not a man that at tourney and tilt
Sat bowing to every fair friend he could spy,
Or bearing his fame with a fine cold eye:
A hundred sweet eyes might be watching his own;
He thought but of two, and of steeds to be thrown;
And the trumpets no sooner blew mights to mights,
Then crash went his onset, and down went knights.

"And thus in his love for sweet Anne de Paul,
Though fore'd to some stealths, 'twas honest withal:
He wooed, though the old man ever was by,
With talk such as fixeth a maiden's eye,
With lore and with legends, earnest of heart,
And an art that applied them, sprung out of no art,
Till stealth for his sake seem'd truth's own right;
And at an old casement long-closed, one night,
Through boughs never dry, in a pathless nook,
Love's breathless delight in his vows she took.
Ah! never thenceforth, by sunniest brook,
Did the cheeks of the cherry-trees beat the look
Of the poor-growing stems in the pathless nook.

"But, alas! to plead love unto loving eyes,
And to beg for its leave of the worldly wise,
All humility sweet on the one side lies,
And all on the other that mortifies.

"Sir William hath swallow'd a sigh at last,
Big as his heart; and the words have pass'd,
'I love your daughter, Sir Guy,' quoth he,
'And though I'm not rich, yet my race may be;
A race with a southeron as old as the best,
Though its wealth lies at Acre in holy rest.
Mine uncle, your friend, so blithe and old,
Hath nobody nigher to leave his gold;
The King hath been pleas'd to promise my sword
The picking of some great Frenchman's board;
And sire, meantime, should not blush for wife;
Soft as her hand should fare her life:
My rents, though small, can support her state,
And I'd fight for the rest, till I made them great.
Vouchsafe to endure that I seek her love:
I know she resembles the blest above:
Her face would paint sweeter a monarch's bower,
Though glory and grace were in every flower;
But angels on monarchs themselves look down,
And love is to love both suffer and crown.'"

Sir Guy is disdainful and cold over the proposition, and Sir William hies to his old uncle Sir Gray, to see whether pleading may compass wealth. The old boy promises, but soon hies to neighbour Sir Guy, and with sly hypocrisy, asks for the maiden himself. Here are the two old rascals together.

"Sir Grey and Sir Guy, like proper old boys,
Have met, with a world of coughing and noise;
And after subsiding, judiciously dine,
Serious the venison, and chirping the wine."

They then proceed to business, and the sacrifice of Sir William and sweet Anne is decied over the bottle, and at the shrine of wealth. But the Lady Anne escapes on the palfrey, and is here benighted on her journey to Hindon Hall.

"The lady wakes with the first start;
She cries aloud; she cowers at heart;
And looks around her in affright
On the wide, lonely, endless night;
Then checks, as sharply as she may,
(Not yet aware how blest his way,)
Her yearning friend; and nightly faints.
And calls on fifty gentle saints,
And if she could, would close her eyes,
For fear of thieves and sorceries.
Of men all beard and blood, and calls
Over lone fields, and walking palls,
And elves that ever as you go,
Skip at your side with mop and mow
With gibbering becks and moony stares,
Forcing your eyes to look on theirs.
And see! the moon forsakes the road;
She lifts her light to whence it flow'd:
Has she a good or ill bestow'd,
That thus her light forsakes the road?
The owls they hoot with gloomier cry;
They seem to see a murder nigh:
And how the palfrey snorts and pulls!
Now Mary help poor wandering fools!
The palfrey pulls, and he must go;
The lady's hand may not say No.
And go he does; the palfrey goes;
Merry again the palfrey goes;
He carrieth now no longer woes,
For she, e'en she, now thinks she knows,
Sweet Anne begins to think she knows,
Those gathering huts, those poplar rows,
That water, falling as it flows,
This bridge o'er which the palfrey goes,
This gate, at which he stops, and shows
His love to it with greeting nose,
Ah! surely recollects she well,
All she has heard her lover tell
Of this same gate, and that same bell:
And she it was, you guess full well,
That pull'd, and pull'd again that bell;
And down her love has come pell-mell
With page and squire, and all who ran,
And was the first to find his Anne;—
Was a most mad and blissful man,
Clasping his fainting, faithful Anne.

The extracts we have given will preclude the necessity for further criticism—but we should mention that there are beautiful illustrations to the chapter heads, of which we have selected such specimens as our colums could receive. Messrs. How and Parsons deserve great credit for the style of the publication; and it is with pleasure that we congratulate Leigh Hunt on the whole production.

THEATRICAL PORTRAITS.

WILLIAM FARREN.

Reader, we have the honour to present you to Mr. William Farren, the comic actor, par excellence, of the living English stage. You know him, however, well already—you are his old friend, his long-tried admirer; you have seen him under all the phases of his genius, amid all the changes of his career. You owe him more than you can well afford to repay, for he has broken upon you in your moments of dullness and put your blue-devils to flight with a perfect consternation of laughter. Ay, but you have shed tears with him, too! How, then? Why, his touches of nature came creeping up into your heart—his portrayal of the human affections found deep and dwelling sympathy with your own; he tuned at will the magic chords of feeling, and you could laugh with him till even merriment had no dry eye, or cry over his tenderness like a little silly child. Yes, there is no doubt that Farren is a consummate artist—threading his way upward from the simplicities of the mixed natural school to the fine niceties and delicate discriminations of the higher paths of comedy—from the ancient hero of the Planche trifles of the Olympic, to the Sir Peter Teazle of Sheridan's magic pen.

Well, then, as you know him "in all the forms of all his fame" save one, we present him to you as that single exception now. Here he is, reader, in the "form and pressure" of Peter Britton, in Webster's new comic drama of Peter and Paul, now performing at the pretty little Haymarket with so much attraction and applause. The drama in question is, in its main incidents, the same as the French two-act comedy entitled L'Oncle Baptiste, in which Bouffe distinguished himself just before leaving England, at the St. James's Theatre. The story is a very pretty and interesting one, and tells equally whether in English or French; but Webster has, with well-judging tact, changed the features of the characters, and suited them entirely to our condition of national domestic life. Farren, therefore, does not follow Bouffe in line and manner; he has a creation of his own to embody, and a most happy and eloquent one it is. He is the homely English artizan, who cannot overreach the struggles of daily labour, or get beyond the pale of poverty—working his way through life with the simple bluntness of his craft, and exhibiting all sorts of shades and touches of character to those who watch the progress of his life. He has a rich brother, and a kind one, who has achieved the wealth that Peter cannot compass, and with whom he has all through the drama a part of contrast to play off, which exactly suits the humour and expression of Farren's mind. We have him too, in double costume—first, as you see him now, in his check shirt, scarlet waistcoat, velveteen trousers, and leather apron; next, under the transformation of a dark-blue frock-coat, green striped waistcoat, grey trousers, and legitimate beaver hat. In either toggery we proclaim him to be a most interesting character, who grows into the best goodwill of our acquaintanceship under the fine, manly, spirited, and graphic interpretation of Farren's admirable art. Go to the Haymarket, say we, and see this, your favourite artist, in his new, and yet old, English guise; you will there learn the details of a pleasant domestic history, pass an hour of amusement under gratifying impulses and emotions, and see how well the long-acknowledged talents of Strickland, Vining, and Mrs. Glover support the unique and truthful Peter Britton of William Farren.

THE THEATRES.

ENGLISH OPERA HOUSE.

Oxberry's benefit on Wednesday evening. A good house, although not so full as his merit as an actor, and spirit in becoming the lessee of this establishment, deserved. His arrangements at the commencement of the season were judicious—his company well-selected; and, if success has not attended his subsequent efforts, we are aware that, not only has he had to struggle with the usual difficulties inseparable from theatrical management, but (although incurring the whole responsibility of the speculation), from peculiar circumstances, has held "divided power." The pieces played for his benefit were Capers and Coronets, Griselle, Deaf as a Post, and A Dream at Sea. At the conclusion of Deaf as a Post, Harley, who plays Tristram Sappy, with exquisite truth and humour, was called for, and, on leaving the stage, a loud cry was made for Oxberry; who, after some time had elapsed, was dragged on "arm in arm," by Harley. The reluctant coyness of Oxberry, who almost blushed to find it fame, and the patronising air with which Harley patted him on the head seeming to imply, "this is a promising chick of our craft," formed in itself a capital interlude.

NEW STRAND THEATRE.

Selby's Bit of Fun at this theatre, was rivalled on Wednesday evening by an extemporary performance in the pit. A lady who, to borrow Colman's metaphor, seemed "like three single ladies rolled into one," suddenly rose up, just as the farce commenced, and after sundry gyrations, displayed to the audience a large, black silk shawl, exclaiming in no faint accents, "Look here! here's a mess! look at my shawl!" "Order, order! sit down, sit down!" "I shan't."

"Turn her out! shame, shame! sit down." "I shan't. Ah, you may bolla as much as you like, but I shan't." A gentleman requested Keeley to try his powers of persuasion. Keeley advanced to the front of the stage, and with one of his blandest smiles, and in the most insinuating tone imaginable, said "Will you have the kindness to sit down, Ma'am?" "I shan't," replied the fat lady, with a convulsive shaking of her head, that literally frightened Keeley, who shrank back aghast. The police were called, but were too gallant to interfere. The proprietor came into the pit and expostulated with her—'twas useless. "You may take my life, but I won't sit down." We think he hinted something about a new shawl—'twas in vain—the uproar increased and reached a climax, when with a furious burst of wrath, she gathered up the tail of her gown, and exclaiming in a voice of thunder, "I shan't sit down," indignantly resumed her seat. A roar of laughter and applause accompanied this last act—and the farce proceeded, in the enjoyment of which, after a few moments, the lady evidently forgot her misfortune. We believe this "explosion" of wrath, was occasioned by a bottle of ginger-beer damaging the lady's garment, and thereby unfitting it for any future pop.

MUSIC

Singing for the Million.—On Monday last a petition was presented to the House of Commons by Mr. Wyse, on behalf of the pupils of M. Mainzer, some of the allegations contained in which may not be uninteresting to our readers. Amongst other things, the petitioners state that M. Mainzer has given gratuitous instruction to 8500 children, including the children of the British School, the daughters of poor clergymen, and factory children throughout the kingdom. That in the various districts of the metropolis, M. Mainzer has now 12 classes, comprising many thousand pupils—from 4000 to 6000 of whom are constant attendants, at the small fee of three-halfpence per lesson. The petitioners conclude by stating, that impressed with a sense of the great importance of a building being erected in the metropolis, capable, in some degree, of accommodating the multitudes receiving and aspiring to musical instruction, to be used also for a gratuitous normal school, they had themselves for this purpose adopted measures to supply this desideratum, and had procured plans from an eminent architect, which combined ample accommodation with great economy in building, and had already subscribed money, and were engaged in providing the funds towards the erection of this building; and (without including M. Mainzer himself in the application) they humbly prayed the house to give such directions as might cause to be allotted to them a site, in a suitable central situation, for the erection of the building, or give such aid to the design as might seem meet.

PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS.

Greenwich and Chelsea Hospital.—Considerable alterations are contemplated in the management of these extensive establishments. It is proposed to join both establishments under one board, the members of which will hold their sittings at Somerset House, and examination has already been made to ascertain if there are suitable offices in that building for the purpose. When the arrangements are completed, it is intended to pay retired sailors in districts by officers, as has already been adopted with retired soldiers in Scotland.

Eton versus Mooney at Eton.—On Monday Eton exhibited the usual bustle and gaiety consequent on the arrival of many of the nobility and gentry, who came from all parts to hear the speeches of the scholars. Neither her Majesty nor the Prince was present, to the great disappointment of many. It would be invidious to particularise any of the speakers, all having done equal justice to their respective parts. At the present time the school numbers 668—a greater number than was ever before known at Eton. Mr. James, who gained the Declamation prize at Christmas, 1841, and Davie's Task prize at Easter, 1842, obtained King's by the resignation of Mr. Elliot. Many of the head boys left during the day. On the 29th of August the school will again open, and the scholars will return as follows:—The collegers, on the 31st of August; fourth form, on the 3rd of September; lower division, on the 6th; upper division, on the 8th; and the sixth form on the 10th, there being no extra week these holidays. A splendid entertainment was given by the Provost of Eton in the afternoon, at the conclusion of the "election speeches," to a party of nearly 100 distinguished personages, amongst whom were his excellency the American Minister, Mr. H. Everett; the Right Rev. the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol; the Rev. Dr. Thackeray, Provost of King's College, Cambridge; Lord Clive, the Hon. H. Ashley, M.P., Sir C. Hulse, the Rev. Dr. Hawtrey, Mr. E. R. Rice, M.P., Mr. W. H. Trant, Capt. Roberts, R.N., the Rev. J. S. Grover (vice-provost), M. H. H. Law, and the Rev. W. Harvey, the two posers, &c. At three o'clock the company assembled in the library, and shortly afterwards proceeded to the College-hall, where the dinner took place. After the provost had proposed the usual loyal toasts he rose and said, "We are honoured by the presence of the representative of a friendly power, united to us by the closest ties of blood and relationship, which ties, he was sure, every one present most truly hoped might never be weakened or impaired. He felt great pleasure in proposing 'The Health of the American minister, Mr. H. Everett.'" The company drank the toast with every demonstration of respect. The American Minister on returning thanks said, he was indeed taken by surprise by the high compliment paid to his country and to himself. He had lately been to Liverpool, the commerce of which was so intimately connected with the United States; he had also been at Bristol, whence had sailed so many early settlers, and which port was so closely united with his country; and he might have expected in those places to have met with notice and distinction, but he had not looked for such a reception in these classic and sequestered seats. He had admired in the morning the powers of the youths who had appeared before them, and he had appreciated the feelings which must have found a place in the breast of his right rev. friend on his right (the Bishop of Gloucester) as a parent, in the hopes of his son. He had been connected with education across the Atlantic, and it was refreshing and delightful to him to have listened to the speeches he had heard that day; for, without in any way disparaging the works and genius of modern times, he must say that Demosthenes, Tacitus, Cicero, and Shakspeare, were enough for him. He felt assured of the great advantages to be derived from a good and sound classical education. Mr. Everett concluded by expressing the delight he had experienced in visiting the time-honoured college at Eton, and that he was deeply sensible of the value of the institution, and sincerely wished it prosperity. Several toasts of a merely local character followed, and there being much business still left for the provost and electors to dispose of, the party broke up shortly before eight o'clock. The annual examination and election of scholars to supply the vacancies upon the foundation of the college were concluded in the evening, when twenty-three foundation scholars or collegers were admitted. James, the senior King's scholar upon the foundation at election 1842, has succeeded to a fellowship at King's College, Cambridge, which was rendered vacant by the timely resignation of the Rev. W. Elliott. The extensive improvements for a long time contemplated in the college chapel were commenced on Tuesday morning, and will be completed before the re-opening of the school. The whole of the ancient oak wainscoting is to be removed from the stalls to the east end. The Grecian urns and pillars of the altar-piece are likewise to be removed, and the Gothic walls restored to their original state. Stone altar rails will also be erected, and likewise a carved stone pulpit at the eastern extremity of the sacred edifice. The whole of the alterations are superintended by Mr. Shaw, architect.

Christ's Hospital.—At a Court of the Governors of that institution held on Tuesday, the result of the examination for the Times scholarship was announced, and the successful competitor appeared to be William Romanis, the third in standing of the senior pupils, who will proceed to the University of Cambridge in October next, as the "First Times Scholar." The examination was both classical and mathematical (equal degrees of merit being assigned to proficiency in each study), and continued three days, the examiners being the Rev. W. A. Osborne, head master of Macclesfield School, and the Rev. B. W. Beatson, Fellow and Lecturer of Pembroke College, Cambridge. At the same court, the president (Mr. Alderman Thompson, M.P. for Westmoreland) delivered the two gold medals, which are now annually given, in consequence of his own munificent donation, as the rewards of distinct and separate proficiency in the classics and in mathematics. The former was presented to W. H. Brown, the latter to Augustus S. Harrison. The president, after feelingly impressing upon these young men the duty and benefit of combining rectitude of principle and conduct with sound learning and scientific acquirement, made a happy allusion to the recent success of one of their immediate predecessors in the school, Mr. H. J. S. Maine, of Pembroke College, Cambridge, to whom he had had the pleasure of presenting the gold medal for classical proficiency on the very same occasion two years ago, and who had this year obtained three of the annual medals (those for the English poem, the Latin hexameter verses, and the Alcaic ode) in the above University. The address of the president was warmly cheered by the governors present.

City of London School.—The distribution of prizes amongst the pupils of this establishment, consequent upon the annual examination, took place in the theatre of the school on Friday last. The chair was taken by Mr. Sheriff Rogers, who left the civic party at Rochester, in order to officiate for the Lord Mayor. The examinations occupied several days preceding, and were conducted by the Rev. J. C. Miller, M.A., late scholar of Lincoln College, Oxford; and the Rev. Joseph Pullen, B.D., fellow and tutor of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge—in theology, classics, mathematics, history, geography, arithmetic, &c.; in French, by the Rev. F. Martin, pastor of the French Protestant Church in London; and in German, by Dr. Bernays, professor in King's College, London. The reports presented by these gentlemen were of the most satisfactory character. The result of the examination for the several scholarships, medals, and other principal prizes was then announced, and the successful candidates being introduced amidst the hearty acclamations of their fellow pupils, the sheriff congratulated them upon their success, and delivered the rewards assigned to them, with a few appropriate remarks to each. After which the head master, the Rev. Dr. Mortimer added an impressive address.

PUBLIC MEETINGS.

Meeting of the Wine Trade.—On Tuesday a numerous and influential meeting of the importers and wine merchants of London, took place at the Commercial Sale Rooms, Mincing-lane, for the purpose of taking into consideration a letter from Sir George Clerk, intimating that in the event of a reduction of the wine duty, no return would be made on the stocks in hand for home consumption; and of adopting resolutions thereon. George Barnes, Esq., chairman of the Wine and Spirit Association, presided. Seven or eight resolutions were put and carried, having for their object a petition to the Legislature, and a request that it might be supported by the city and other members; that a subscription be entered into to defray the necessary expenses (which was liberally responded to). A vote of thanks having been awarded to the chairman, the meeting broke up.

Meeting at Deptford.—Apprehension of Dr. M'Dowell and several Chartist Leaders.—On Tuesday night last, a large assemblage of persons took place at the meeting-house, High-street, Deptford, which had been granted by the Rev. Mr. Pullen, for the purpose of a lecture by George Thompson, Esq., on the present existing distress of the country. The chair was to be taken at seven o'clock, by which time the meeting-house, which is capable of accommodating about 2000 people, was crammed to excess. The Minister having taken the chair, rose, and after a short preliminary, expressed his regret in being compelled to announce the unavoidable absence of the lecturer, who was compelled to attend a meeting at which considerable opposition was expected. There were, however, (observed the chairman), several advocates of the people's cause present, who would address the meeting. The reverend gentleman had no sooner resumed his seat, than a person rose in the gallery, and proposed that a general discussion should take place. This excited cheers and tremendous uproar, in the midst of which a body of Chartists, who occupied a large pew on the right of the table, rose, and proposed that the chair should be filled by a working man. This only increased the disorder, several Chartists attempted to get possession of the table, a general fight and scuffle ensued. The entrance of a body of police, accompanied by an Inspector, served to increase the riot, and their attempt to secure the principal parties introduced their friends and partisans to join the fray, and prevent their being captured. Something like order being restored a gentleman named Taylor addressed the meeting, and spoke a considerable length on the condition of the working classes. The address was continually interrupted by cries of "turn out the police." Another person rose to speak, but prefacing his remarks by asking if it was Christianity in the minister for sending for bloodhounds to rob those who spoke their minds of their liberty, a repetition of the violence ensued, which at length assumed such an alarming appearance, that another body of police was sent for; and in the midst of the confusion the meeting was declared to be dissolved. The Chartists then proposed three cheers for the charter, and three for Feargus O'Connor. They also proposed an adjournment to the Broadway, which was agreed to. Hundreds who had been unable to gain admittance, followed to the Broadway, and in a few minutes the large open space was filled, and shortly after the highway blocked up. The pump in the centre afforded an excellent rostrum. Dr. M'Dowell having ascended to harangue the multitude, was loudly and vehemently cheered. The address was, however, cut short by the arrival of Mr. Superintendent Mallalieu and a number of the force. The meeting was ordered to disperse, which order was met with determined opposition, upon which orders were given to clear, and Dr M'Dowell was pulled down from the pump, and several of the Chartist leaders were taken in custody to the station-house, the police being assailed by yells and groans.

SPORTING INTELLIGENCE.

ROWING MATCHES.

The Lambeth, Chelsea, and Bankside Regattas.

The Thames, on Monday, from London-bridge to Chelsea, was one continued scene of animation and bustle, of excitement and struggle, occasioned by three regattas, so arranged as to afford a diversity of sport for the extent of five miles. The unusual fineness of the weather drew to each a larger assemblage of persons than we ever remember to have met with at any similar wagers.

The match at Chelsea was the most attractive, the various steamboats during the day landing several thousand persons.

After two well-contested heats, at a little before seven, black, white, blue, and yellow, started for the grand heat. Yellow took the lead, but held it only a short distance, when black went into the first place; and, after a trifling foul against tide, yellow gave place to blue. Black held the lead, and won by half-a-dozen lengths—the names of the winners are John Thomas and William Cole; and, after a very severe contest between blue and yellow, in which it was difficult to determine which were the better men, blue came in second, and yellow third, white being fourth.

The Lambeth regatta was amongst men who have acquired much celebrity as wagermen. It was their twenty-second annual match in two boats, with six pairs of oars, for a purse of sovereigns, subscribed by the inhabitants of St. Mary's, Lambeth. Charles Maynard and Henry Shelton, whose colour was scarlet, took the lead and kept it with apparent ease, winning the heat.

The Bankside wager was a double scullers' one—the first time we remember it to have been so at these stairs, and there were men who had won the coat and badge, and had otherwise distinguished themselves, engaged in it. The contest was with twelve pairs of sculls, (two pairs in each boat), the heats, the distance being the same in all the heats.

It was a pretty start in the grand heat; they were scull and scull for a few yards, and then yellow drew ahead; pink, who was out her quarter, bumped the boat in rounding, but yellow held their own, and won by half a length only, after a very sharp struggle; pink second, purple third. The race was for a boat and good money prizes.

Great Boat Race between the Queen's Scholars at Westminster, and the Etonians.

It has seldom fallen to our lot to record a more animated or interesting struggle than that of Tuesday, between the scholars of Westminster and Eton, a struggle recommended by its display of stamina and science. The Shamrock steamer had been chartered by the Westminster scholars, and at half-past four it left Chandler's pier, at Millbank, and proceeded with the Westminster crew up to Kew, where, having divested themselves of superfluous articles of dress, they took their places in their rival boats. The Eton crew had considerably the advantage of their opponents in point of weight. The colours for Westminster were pink; that of their adversaries, the same as worn by the Cantabs, light blue. The river presented a most animated appearance, from the number of cutters and boats of other descriptions out. At seven preparations were made for the start. Betting was 5 and 6 to 4 on Westminster; but there was but little done at it. The signal for starting was given at five minutes past seven o'clock by Mr. Layton, of the Leander Club, who had consented to be umpire, and they went away from Barker's Rails to row to Putney-bridge, a distance of five miles and a half. The start was even and beautiful; the oars dashed in and out of the water like lightning. A hundred yards succeeded a hundred yards, and neither had the lead. They were oar and oar, or nearly so, for a quarter of a mile, and then Westminster drew gradually in advance. Off Barnes-terrace the Etonians made a desperate effort for the leading place; and, although not then above a length and a half astern, could not improve their position. The Westminster held the lead and went through Hammersmith-bridge fifty yards ahead, and arrived at Putney-bridge 28 minutes 14 seconds from the time of starting, and 32 seconds, or upwards of 100 yards, ahead of the Etonians. The shouts on all sides at coming in were deafening.

CRICKET.

On Tuesday a match was played in the Barrack-yard of the Cavalry-barracks, Spital, between the officers of the 1st and 2nd Regiments of Life Guards, each eleven having the assistance of five troopers; those officers of the 1st Regiment being Colonel Hall, Captains Alexander and Bulkeley, Lieutenant Wells, and two others. The officers of the 2nd Regiment were Viscount Drumlanrig, Colonel M'Donell, Captains Blane, Lawley, and Langley, and the Adjutant. The match was not played out, but on leaving off it was greatly in favour of the 1st Regiment.

GOODWOOD RACES.

Tuesday.—That Goodwood is the first meeting of the kind in the kingdom is an established fact that no one who has had the evidence of his eyes will gainsay. It is not from one important race, or from one peculiar feature, that Goodwood derives its reputation, but from the combination of many that make the extraordinary number and value of its two and three-years-old stakes, its magnificent cups, its handicaps, its profusion and variety of prizes, its excellent course, and the delightful scenery by which it is approached and surrounded. The company, wanting the single charm of royalty, surpasses all other meetings in rank and splendour, is generally large, and always without the annoyance of a mob. The arrangements, too, are conceived in the best possible taste, and are carried out with a precision and completeness that leave nothing to be desired, everything, in short, is quiet, regular, business-like, and, at the same time, in the highest degree enjoyable. We may state briefly that Goodwood-house is full of distinguished visitors, and that, with the exception of Petworth, all the gentlemen's seats in the neighbourhood are open to company.

In consequence of the number of events for decision, the racing commenced at half-past twelve o'clock. The principal events were—

The Drawing-room Stakes of 25 sovs. each.

Duke of Bedford's Envoy, 8st. 7lb. (Robinson)	1
Colonel Peel's Seahorse, 8st. 7lb.	2
Colonel Anson's Attila, 8st. 11lb.	3

Betting—6 to 4 on Attila, and 7 to 2 agst Envoy. Misdeal made the first running, followed by Englesfield and Albion, Economy fourth, Attila and Seahorse lying in the rear, away from their horses. They ran in this way for a mile and a half, when Englesfield took up the running, followed by Attila, Seahorse, and Envoy. Englesfield's lead, however, was short, as he ran against a post at the turn for straight running, and was put out of the race. Envoy then took the lead, and with Attila and Seahorse in attendance, went on to the distance; they then closed upon and headed him, having rather the best of the race till close to the chair, where Envoy went up with a rush, caught them, and won by half a length, Seahorse beating Attila by as much; the others were tailed off an immense distance.

Sweepstakes of 300 sovs. each, h. ft., for four-year-olds. Three miles and three quarters. (12 subs.)

Lord G. Bentinck's Mustapha (Rogers)	1
Lord Westminster's Van Amburgh	2
Lord Chesterfield's Mehemet Ali	3

Even on Mustapha, and 6 to 4 agst Van Amburgh. Mustapha took a tremendous lead at starting, kept it to the end, and won by twenty lengths.

The Gratwicke Stakes of 100 sovs. each, h. ft., for three-year-olds. Mile and a half. (67 subs.)

Lord Verulam's Robert de Gorham, 8st. 7lb. (Cotton)	1
Mr. Wreford's Wisewre, 8st. 7lb.	2
Lord G. Bentinck's Firebrand, 8st. 5lb.	3

Even on Robert de Gorham, and 7 to 2 agst Baleine.

Match, 1000 sovs. h. ft. Cup Course.
Mr. Johnstone's Charlet the Twelfth, 8st. 7lb. (Marson) .. 1
Mr. Lichtwold's Hylius, 8st. 2lb. (carried 8st. 4lb.) 2
Betting—6 to 4 on Charles the Twelfth. Hylius made all the running to the distance, where Charles the Twelfth went up, headed him, and, after a desperate race, won by a neck.
The Welter Stakes of 20 sovs. each. Gentlemen riders, &c. Craven Stakes Course. (7 subs.)
Duke of Richmond's The Currier, 6 yrs. (Lord March) .. 0
Mr. Holmes's Vulean, 5 yrs. (Capt. Pettat) 0
A dead heat, which was not decided when our account left.
The Innkeeper's Plate of 50 sovs.
Lord G. Bentinck's African, 3 yrs. (W. Howlett) .. 1 3 1
Mr. King's Sultana, 4 yrs. 3 1 2
Lord Rosslyn's Cornuto, 5 yrs .. .. 4 2 dr
Mr. Greville's Pickwick, aged .. .. 2 dr
Won very easy.

In consequence of the number of stakes, &c., and the loss of time with the gentlemen riders, the last heat was not over till seven o'clock—making nearly seven hours' racing.

The Welter Stakes—After the dead heat Vulcan and the Currier divided the stakes, and the latter walked over.

WEDNESDAY.—There has been no lack of sport this afternoon: but as the Goodwood Stakes alone has had any serious claim on our attention, we have been enabled to cast our eyes over the course, and to obtain the following list of visitors:—The Duke of Richmond's party; Duke and Duchess of Bedford, Duke and Duchess of Beaufort; Marquesses of Westminster, Exeter, and Normanby; Earls of Eglington, Stradbroke, Albemarle, Chesterfield, Verulam, Jersey, March, Uxbridge, and Rosslyn; Countesses of Chesterfield, Eglington, and Albemarle; Lords Maidstone, G. Bentinck, W. Lennox, A. Lennox, Alex. Lennox, Cantilupe, and Villiers. Ladies Agnes Byng, Eleanor Paget, and Constance Paget; Sirs J. Shelley, and W. W. Wynn; Honourable G. S. Byng, Colonel Peel, Captains Pettit and P. Williams; Honourable G. and Mrs. Anson; Messrs. Greville, Payne, J. Shirley, Bowes, Irby, and Houldsworth. In addition, we observed the Marquess of Worcester, Lords E. Russell, Heath, Andover, Macdonald, Paget, Kelburne, and Count Batthyany; Sirs H. Mildmay, F. Collier, and C. Cockerell; Honourable H. Pitt, G. Fitzroy, G. Murray, R. Colborne, Captain Boyle, Captain Poulett, G. Sandiland, A. Berkeley, — Ponsonby, General Gilbert; Messrs. R. and W. Etwall, D. Radcliffe, Clive, Delme, Newman, Booth, Codrington, J. Bayly, Gratwicke, Neville, Udney, Gardner, Rothschild, Knox, Stonehewer, F. Price, Shelley, Ladbroke, Wigram, Seymour, &c.

The running commenced at the usual time with:—

The Queen's Plate of 100 guineas. About 3 miles and 5 furlongs.
Mr. Forth's Vibration, 3 yrs., 7st. 4lb. (Bell) 1

Lord G. Bentinck's Misdeal, 3 yrs., 6st. 9lb. 2
Col. Peel's Garry Owen, 5 yrs., 8st. 10lb. 3
The lot started in a cluster, Elopement making play at a good pace for about half the distance. The Adela filly, Misdeal, Garry Owen, and Marshal Soult, then joined company with Elopement, and ran with her to the distance, where she declined, the Marshal following her example directly after. The race was continued by the Adela filly, Misdeal, and Garry Owen, and was contested with great spirit to the end, the filly winning by a head, and Misdeal beating Garry Owen by half a length. Nothing else was near.
The Goodwood Stakes, of 25 sovs. each, 15 ft., and only 5, &c.; the second received 50 sovs. out of the Stakes. Cup Course, 151 subscribers; of whom 101 declared, &c.
Major Hay's Retriever, 6 yrs., 7st. 11lb. (Murphy) 1
Lord Kelburne's c. by Muley Moloch, d. by Actaeon, 4 yrs., 8st. 9lb. 2
Mr. Shelley's Daddy-Longlegs, 3 yrs., 6st. 3
Retriever made all the running, was never caught, and won by six lengths. Albion was weighed for, but did not run.
THURSDAY.—Sweepstakes of 25 sovs. each, for two-years-old colts. (12 subs.)
Mr. Sadler's ch. f. Decisive, sister to Protection 0
Lord Chesterfield's ch. c. Peter the Hermit 0
Betting—6 to 4 on Peter the Hermit. Peter the Hermit walked over. Lord Chesterfield and Mr. W. Sadler divided the stakes.
The Molecomb Stakes of 50 sovs. each; half-forfeit. (15 subs.)

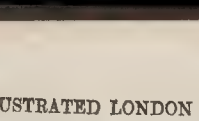
Sweepstakes of 100 sovs. each. Lord G. Bentinck's Miss Heathcott beat Sir M. Stanley's Uscd, and Col. Anson's Elopement.

The last two races were unexpectedly added in an addenda to the cards on Friday morning, and thus have terminated the Goodwood of 1842—the most valuable and splendid four days racing ever witnessed in England, delighting all that have attended, and who will look forward to the next meeting with the assurance that the national sport will be upheld in justice, honesty, and liberality, by the noble owner of Goodwood House. Our report reached us by the Lord of March Chichester and Bognor Coach, (driven by Richard Faulkner, whom the late Theodore Hook celebrated as being connected with the Portsmouth Rocket), which left the Course at half-past six, and was in town before one.



LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.—TUESDAY.
(Before Mr. Commissioner Fonblanque).

IN RE LEWIS DURLACHER.

This day was fixed for the choice of assignees in the matter of the bankrupt who was described as a dealer in pictures, of old Burlington street, but much better known in the fashionable circles at the west end of the town as a chromatist to his late Majesty George the Fourth, and also to her present most gracious Majesty Queen Victoria. He has been many years in business, but latterly it was not enough to support him in his early style of living, and of course of maintaining the patronage which he had experienced for many years. His debts, and liabilities are about £4000, and his assets are very small. The debts proved in the course of the day amounted to about £1300, and Mr. Samuel Moss Mawson, of Berner's-street, Oxford-street, was chosen assignee.

IN RE — DELAMAINE.—IMPORTANT TO FOREIGN CREDITORS.

This day was fixed for the last examination of the bankrupt, described as a wine-merchant, of St. Margaret-hill, Southwark, City. Amongst the proofs tendered in the course of the proceedings was one from many years in business, but latterly it was [illegible] on the ground of "insolvency."

The learned [illegible] said that in France [illegible] and other foreign cases similar to it, it was of such importance that it should be known, that if a foreign affidavit was sworn before a consul, it must also be attested by a notary. This could not appear to be complied with in the present case, but it was proper the should at length be informed that it was required by the statute.

The bankrupt having come to the truth of his accounts, and answered the usual interrogatories, was declared to have passed his final examination.

IN RE BARON DE BODE.

Mr. Woodroffe moved, that the vesting orders in this case should be discharged. The insolvent had been in custody many years. He had large claims on this Government, which there was great prospect of shortly proving beneficial to the creditors, one of whom had lately obtained a vesting order. This step had entirely deranged the affairs of the estate, which would have required to begin de novo, had not the friends of the insolvent come forward and paid the existing creditors' debts, and the insolvent was now at liberty.

The Court dismissed the vesting order.

ASSIZE INTELLIGENCE.

MIDLAND CIRCUIT.—NOTTINGHAM, JULY 25.
(Before Mr. Baron Parke).

POISONING.—Benjamin Hurst, aged 24, and Hannah Hurst, his wife, aged 23, were placed at the bar, charged, upon the coroner's inquisition, with the wilful murder of Thomas Robinson, at the parish of Radford, on the 7th of March last. Mr. Mellor conducted the prosecution; the prisoners were defended by Mr. Wildman. After detailing the facts at some length, Mr. Mellor called several witnesses in support of his case. Mr. Wildman then proceeded to address the jury for the prisoners, contending that the evidence was insufficient to convict the male prisoner, and if it were sufficiently conclusive as to warrant the jury in finding his wife guilty, it could only be of the crime of felonious homicide or manslaughter. The learned counsel enjoined the jury to give the prisoners the benefit of the doubt, which he conceived they were justly entitled to, and thus save them from the awful sentence of death. His lordship was occupied more than two hours in summing up; after which the jury acquitted the male prisoner, and found the female guilty of manslaughter. The learned judge immediately sentenced her to [illegible] transportation. This trial lasted the whole of Monday, and terminated the business of the Crown Court.

WESTERN CIRCUIT—EXETER, JULY 25.
(CROWN COURT.—Before Mr. Justice Cresswell).

William Lezzard and Philip Messinger were indicted for breaking and entering the house of the Rev. W. Timothy Hayter, at Sidbury, on the 25th of May, and stealing therefrom a quantity of plate. From the failure of evidence as to the mode of their entrance, and as there was no second count charging them with breaking out of the house, they were acquitted of the burglary, but found guilty of stealing from the dwelling-house.

POLICE.

GUILDHALL.—WESTMINSTER LOAN AND INVESTMENT COMPANY.—On Wednesday a further investigation was made by Sir Peter Laurie into the affairs of the above company. It appears there were any more individuals in attendances who had suffered by this society. Mr. Cuff, a solicitor, came forward on behalf of a poor man named Hampson, who had been induced by the puffs to deposit the sum of £130 in their hands, being the proceeds of his hard earnings during his life, and in consequence he was now little better than a beggar. Mr. Smith, a gentleman in the room, stated he had a discounted bills to the amount of about £2000.—Sir Peter: Why, the liabilities are more than the asset on account, only £4000, so you must be in to the tune of about one half.—Mr. Smith (good humouredly): Just so.—Sir Peter: You ought to have known better, and made more inquiries before you parted with your money. Mr. Marshall, of Holloway, held a bill for £40, and asked Sir Peter whether he could have a warrant against Mr. Nicholls, one of the parties.—Sir Peter: If you come to-morrow, I will consult my clerk as to the question.—A long conversation then took place between both parties, which ended in Sir Peter saying his advice was, that the sufferers should attend at the next session of the Central Criminal Court, prefer a bill before the grand jury, and prosecute all the parties, and he would lend every assistance in his power to help them. The justice-room was crowded.

WORSHIP-STREET.—A grim-looking, sun-browned veteran, who gave the name of Charles George Smith, and stated that he held a commission in an Indian regiment, was brought before Mr. Bingham on Tuesday, and charged with riotous and disorderly conduct at the police station-house in Robert-street, Hoxton. From the evidence of Sergeant Godfrey and other officers of the H division, it appeared that on the preceding night the defendant presented himself at the station-house, and complained of having been grossly insulted by a little tailor whom he had accidentally met as an adjoining public-house, the landlord of which, with his assistants, had forcibly ejected him, on his resenting the indignity. He expressed his determination to have all the parties tried by court martial, and ordered a detachment of police to turn out and put them under close arrest. As the defendant was considerably inebriated, the sergeant ventured to suggest the propriety of his returning home and preferring his complaint in a cooler moment; but the imputations against his sobriety threw him into a towering passion, and he became so violent in his language and conduct, that they were compelled to lock him up. In the course of the night they were alarmed by a tremendous uproar breaking out in the cell in which he was confined, and in which two drunken tailors happened also to be immured, and on proceeding to ascertain the cause of it, they found the defendant pacing to and fro, uttering violent denunciations, and brandishing a clasp-knife, whilst the terrified tailors were cowering in a corner in momentary expectation that he would execute his threat of dismissing them into eternity, and "sending them to sup with Shah Soojah." The sergeant, with a little manœuvring, managed to disarm him, and the trembling tailors were removed to a safer apartment. The defendant assured the magistrate that his excited manner entirely proceeded from the effects of a wound in the head, received in the Indian wars.—Mr. Bingham asked the defendant whether he was at present actively employed in her Majesty's service.—The defendant said that he was now on half-pay, but he had serious thoughts of rejoining his regiment, in order that he might assist his old commander, General Sale, in his perilous position. The gallant general, next to himself, was the only Indian officer at all competent to grapple with the difficulties of our situation; and on his arrival he should recommend him to fortify the passes, the neglect of which, in the first instance, was the main cause of all our disasters. The old officer was proceeding with great gusto to descant further in the same strain, which evidently derived much of its animation from the unexhausted influence of the gin and water, when the magistrate said that he must recall his attention from the seat of war in India to the station-house at Hoxton, and the charge against him of having created a disturbance there, and made war upon the police. He had been locked up all night, which was a sufficient punishment for his intemperate behaviour, and he should now discharge him.—The old veteran thanked the magistrate with a stiff military salute, and marched out of court.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.—In reference to the case of a fellow named Alfred Crane, brought before the magistrate at this office, and which excited much public benevolence, an investigation was instituted by the poor-law commissioners, which has resulted in the detection of the gross imposture. Mr. Hall-wicke said, that in consequence of the publication of the case, upwards of 32l. had been transmitted to him for the benefit of the supposed destitute persons, and that upwards of 9l. had been expended. He also intimated, that, as the case was one of deception, he should return the money to the benevolent individuals who had subscribed so liberally to relieve the wants of persons supposed to be in distress, but who proved to be utterly unworthy of the sympathy the tale of their distress had occasioned. It appeared that Crane was a most accomplished vagabond—that he had deserted his wife, and had absconded from Andover with the woman lately represented to be his wife, to avoid a charge of felony.

UNION HALL.—On Monday two Jews, named Levi and Jonas, were charged with being concerned in robbing a little girl, the daughter of a laundress, under the following circumstances:—Brooks, a policeman, being on duty at Koningston, saw two Jews, with their coaches bags on their shoulders, accompanied by a sharp-looking boy, who had all the appearance of a "young prig," following up a little girl, who was carrying a large bundle of clothes. After a little time, the boy alluded to went up to the girl and said he would help her to carry the bundle, as she appeared to be very tired. The girl, unconscious of the character of the person by whom she was addressed, accepted of his "kind offer," the two Jews keeping behind at a "respectful" distance, when the boy desired the girl to walk on before him and follow the way. The young rascal, however, scarcely got the bundle into his possession, when he pulled out a gentleman's linen shirt from amongst the other things, and dropping it on the ground purposely, it was immediately picked up by Jonas, who crammed it into the bag of his companion. Levi and the boy were about repeating the experiment, when Brooks ran up and seized the two prisoners. The boy, however, made off across Kennington-common and escaped, but the two Jews were secured, and the shirt was found in the bag of one of them.—Levi said that he had no [illegible] that the property which he had no claim to, and was prepared to give it up to the [illegible]. —The other prisoner said that he found the shirt on the ground, and [illegible] it dropped out of Levi's bag, he was about replacing it when he was taken into custody.—Mr. Cottingham said that there was no doubt the two prisoners and the boy were acting in concert on the occasion, and that it was [illegible] the latter had escaped. The magistrate then committed the prisoners for a month each to hard labour at Brixton.

GREENWICH.—Henry Cramer, of No. 43, Devonshire street, Queen-square, civil engineer, was placed at the bar before Mr. Jeremy, charged with endangering the safety of the passengers on the Croydon Railway, and causing the death of Joseph Clutterbuck, the guard of the train.—Mr. Young, the secretary of the London and Croydon Railway Company, attended with the by laws of the company, and submitted, and that the indictment could only be supported under the 16th section of the General Railway Act.—Mr. May, who appeared for the defendant, urged Mr. Jeremy to settle the matter summarily, and that his client was objected to on by the fog inn and indiscreet conduct of the defendant, and that the company had felt it their duty, under the circumstances, to send the case to the assizes. The defendant's solicitor then endeavoured to bring the charge within the meaning and intent of the by-laws, by stating that the intention might be to defraud the company by removing from the third-class carriage to that of the first; but this was overruled by the magistrate, who said the defendant must answer for it as a misdemeanour under the General Railway Act, and the following evidence was then gone through:—Richard Jones, being sworn, said—I am a brass turner. I live at No. 3, Rose-street, Covent-garden. I was a passenger on the Croydon Railway on Sunday evening, the 24th inst. I was in the third-class carriage. The defendant was in the carriage with me. We left Croydon at twenty minutes past six o'clock. About three-quarters of a mile from Croydon, as near as I can say, the defendant got out of the carriage he was in and sat on the top of the one adjoining. One of the police guards told him to get down, and he did so, and at the same moment the guard was thrown off the carriage against the bridge No. 14, and was killed. The carriages were going at a very great speed at the time. It was an open carriage the defendant and I were riding in. Defendant was quite sober.—Joseph Seamann, sworn, said—I am superintendent of the police on the Croydon Railway. At 6 p.m. on the evening stated, I was going from one carriage to another, were I fell on the line, it would be quite sufficient to endanger the lives of those persons travelling by the train.—Defendant: Permit me to state, sir, that when an opinion is advanced it should be proved by facts. One me one single instance where the falling of a human body on the line has been the means of overturning the train. In America it not unfrequently happens that sheep and pigs cross the line during the progress of the train, and they have been invariably killed instantly on the line; and such, unless the body were of wood, or some such hard substance, would [illegible] incredible to pass from the peculiar construction of railway carriage wheels.—Mr. Jeremy said that he must send the case before a jury, and bound the defendant in sureties of £100, and two sureties in £50, each, for his appearance to answer the charge at the assizes at Guildford.

THE LATE CHARTIST DISTURBANCE AT DEPTFORD.—M'Donall, the Chartist leader, whose apprehension while addressing seditious language to a motley assemblage from the parish pump at Deptford, we have already noticed, was on Wednesday brought before the police magistrate, on a charge preferred by Mr. Mallalieu, the superintendent of police. The summary character of the meeting was sufficiently proved, and the magistrate required M'Donall to find sureties to keep the peace for six months, himself in £50, and two sureties in £25 each. A meeting on Blackheath was afterwards held, to discuss the usual subjects of declamation, but this separated quietly.

CORONERS' INQUESTS.

On Saturday night an act of self-destruction was committed by William Farmbey, butler to Mrs. Lane Fox, at her residence, 36, Curzon-street, Mayfair. It appears that about ten o'clock the female domestics, hearing the report of fire-arms, became alarmed, and on going into the butler's room, discovered the deceased sitting upright in an arm-chair, his left cheek and the roof of his skull completely blown off. In his right hand was clenched a double-barrelled pistol, both barrels of which appeared to have been recently discharged. The deceased, who had been indisposed for two or three days previously, was between 60 and 70 years of age. An inquest was held on the body on Monday, when the jury returned a verdict "That deceased shot himself whilst in a state of temporary insanity."

THE LATE FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE CROYDON RAILROAD.—Late on Tuesday evening a lengthened inquiry was gone into before Mr. Payne, the city coroner, at Guy's Hospital, on view of the body of Joseph Clutterbuck, aged 37, guard, one of the guards on the Croydon Railway, who was killed on the above road on Sunday evening last. From the evidence adduced, it appeared that about half-past six o'clock on the evening above mentioned, as the train that left Croydon at the hour stated was going over Croydon-common, a person named Cramer, who was in one of the third class carriages, attempted to get on the roof for the purpose of riding on the guard's seat; the deceased got up for the purpose of turning him off, which Cramer immediately did, and while deceased was in the act of descending off the carriages, the train, which was going very quick at the time, passed under the bridge, deceased's head came in contact with the brickwork of the archway, and threw him off the roof on to the chains between the two carriages. He was immediately got out. When the train came to the Jolly Sailor station he was found quite dead. Mr. Gregory, the resident engineer, stated that no person was allowed to ride on the guard's seat, and the directors had proceeded against Mr. Cramer under the General Railway Act. Mr. H. Cramer stated that on other railways he had rode on the guard's seat, and thought he could do so on the above line. He was very sorry for the unfortunate occurrence. The jury, after a short hesitation, returned a verdict of "Accidental death."

WRECK.—Captain Belcher, of her Majesty's ship Sulphur, on the 12th of July, being in lat. 46 40 N., and long. 10 21 W., fell in with part of a wreck. The vessel was of peculiar build, and, from her stowage, of light scantling. She had a main keel, keel, keelson, and upper keelson. She had been burned to her floor-heads, as far as about midway between the fore and main-masts; is a square-rigged vessel, but the keels and extremities of the planks did not exhibit any symptoms of being affected by the fire. She has probably broken up, after burning to the water's edge. As no barnacles were noticed, it may be inferred that this is a recent wreck.

FLORICULTURE.

The Fuchsia.—Of the many varieties of this flower, one, the Fuchsia Coccinia held an unrivalled place for many years in the floral collections of this country; this was owing to its early introduction from Chili in 1776, thirty-five years previous to the introduction of any other variety. The Fuchsia Corymbiflora, which our illustration represents, is perhaps as hardy as any of the species; it grows and flowers freely if planted in light, rich soil, about the end of May, and will soon form a fine head and an abundance of roots, which will require proper room. The soil can rarely be too rich. This species should not be cut down in the autumn, unless the shoots have died back; it should be left till the wood is completely ripened, and the leaves begin to drop off. During the winter it ought to be preserved from the frost and damp. When replanted it should be shaken out of the old soil; the roots will require trimming slightly; and if potted in a rich earth of compost, and gently watered, the plant will bear three times as many flowers as it would had it been cut down in the autumn. All the species strike freely from cuttings of the young wood, and they thrive much better with bottom heat and a bell-glass. Seeds are frequently ripened and vegetate freely if sown in a rather sandy soil, and many beautiful varieties have been produced from them. We cannot do better than refer to the observations we made use of last week, adding, perhaps, a caution, to protect the plants from the various insects that at this season are so prevalent.

Pigeon Expresses.—The Society of Progress of Brussels sent, some time back, 57 pigeons to Liverpool, with orders to have them let loose on the 4th inst. This was done accordingly, and the following is the result: The first pigeon returned on the 11th, and gained the chief prize for M. Camille de Bast, of Ghent, member of the society; the second came home on the 12th, belonging to the same gentleman; the third on the 14th, the property of M. Jolly, of Brussels; and the fourth later on the same day, belonging to the winner of the first and second prizes. The delay is attributed to the contrary winds which were prevalent on the day they were let off. Of the 57 pigeons, upwards of 30 had returned from London some time before, in another trial, and more than 20 have come back from Orleans, Tours, Vendome, and Lyons.

ANGLING.

To the Editor of the Illustrated London News.

THE EEL.

The eel has a long smooth body, moistened all over with a viscous liquer, which renders him very slippery. He is found in most temperate latitudes in the world; is very tenacious of life, and will live longer out of the water than any other fish. There has been great difference of opinion expressed by writers on the subject of the breeding of eels; however, this appears now to be best understood, and it is acknowledged that they produce their young like other true bony fishes. They are migratory, and appear to have the power of going into the salt or fresh water without any inconvenience. There are four sorts of eels—the silver eel, the grayish or grey eel, the red finned, and the blackish eel; this last has a broader, flatter, and larger head than the rest, and is reckoned to be the worst. But whether these distinctions are essential, or accidental, will admit of a doubt. The colour of the belly depends on the nature of the water, some being of a golden yellow, and others of the most silvery whiteness, in which case they are called "silver eels." This fish is very susceptible of cold, and is said to bury himself during the winter in mud; but although eels like to lurk in the mud, yet they are averse to muddy water, because they are liable to be suffocated by it. They are caught in nets, in the time of a flood, at mill dams and such like places; in the daytime they skulk among weeds, under stones, or the roots of trees, or among the planks, piles, or boards of weirs, bridges, or mills; the best time to angle for them is on a rainy or gloomy day, especially after thunder. Your rod must be strong; your line the same as for trolling, with an armed hook, and your bait must be ledger.

Sniggling or bressing for eels is a remarkable method of taking them, and is only to be practised on a warm day, when the waters are low. This requires a strong line and a small hook, baited with a lob worm. Put the line into the cleft of a stick at least a half from the last, and then trust it into such holes and places before mentioned, where he is supposed to lurk; and if there be one there, it is a great chance but he will take your bait. Some put that part of the line next the hook into the cleft of the stick; but however that may be, it must be so contrived that the line may be disengaged as soon as the fish takes the bait, without checking him. When he has swallowed it he is not to be drawn out hastily, but after he is tired with pulling, then you may make him more secure.

But by far the best method of taking eels is by laying night lines, which are to be fastened to the bank or a tree, in such a manner that it may not be drawn away with the fish, and the other end cast across the stream with a large plummet of lead or a stone, which will keep it in a proper situation. These lines are made of lanks, which may be bought at the fishing-tackle shops, and noosed at a proper distance from each other (about thirty inches to a piece of cord of eight or ten yards long; these hooks may be baited with worms, dace, gudgeons, or minnows. These lines must be taken up early in the morning. Dark nights in the autumn are the best for this kind of fishing.

Trimmers baited as directed for pike are often taken by eels; and you will often take them when barbel fishing, and baiting with a worm; in this case get him out as soon as possible, as he will soon eat and twine about that he will soon spoil, and most like y break or bite in two, your fine gut, with which you must fish for barbel; or at any rate, he will tie it into so many knots, that you will be some time getting it straight again.

THE MARKETS.

Corn Exchange.—Notwithstanding the arrivals of English wheat up to Mark Lane, since our last week's report, have not been to say large, the demand for that article has proved dull. However, the finest descriptions have been taken off at prices fully equal to those previously quoted; but the middling and inferior kinds have suffered an abatement of 1s. per quarter, without effecting a clearance. Of foreign wheat, nearly 20,000 quarters have come fresh to hand, while a large quantity has been brought forward duty free. We have experienced a very heavy sale for both red and white, and the currencies have declined from 1s to 2s per quarter. In corn under lock we have heard of no transactions. Wheat—Essex and Suffolk, Red, 52s 52s 54s 60s, fine 56s 58s 59s; ods, 55s 56s 57s 58s; White, 56s 56s 58s, fine, 60s 62s; superfine, new, 62s 63s 67s 68s, fine, 69s 70s; foreign, free, 51s 54s 56s 60s; fine, 58s 60s 61s; superfine, 62s 63s.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS,

AND THE LARGE ENGRAVING OF LONDON IN 1842.

Opinions of the Press.

We have the gratification of acknowledging our obligations to the leading London Journals for the very handsome and flattering manner in which they had thoughts proper to notice the exertions of the Proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, and we have also a similar duty to discharge towards our brethren of the provincial press and sister kingdom, from whom we have received an unanimous verdict of approval, couched in such terms that it really looks like egotism to quote their opinions. The sin of vanity, however, is much less heinous than that of ingratitude, and in this dilemma we cannot hesitate on which horn to impale ourselves. From all parts of the civilised globe, and from all parties, whatever their political shade or colour, we have received those flattering testimonials to our merits (which can only serve to stimulate us to future exertions); but our space precludes the possibility of quoting more than the few following, which may be taken as fairly indicative of the general tone with which our labours have been hailed :—

(From the Times, of Tuesday, Jan. 10).

LONDON IN 1842.—A splendid print under this title has been published by the proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, representing a bird's-eye view of the great metropolis from the summit of the Duke of York's column. The pictorial effect is really very fine; the perspective is well managed; the accuracy with which individual objects of interest are represented is as admirable as the beauty and the boldness of the general picture: while the [illegible] along with the [illegible] of lights and shades, reflects high credit on the artist, and upon the extent to which wood engraving has been perfected in this country. There could not be a more appropriate and [illegible] present (in so portable a form) to [illegible] and we can imagine the interest with which the "young ones," to whom London is "but as a dream, would gaze upon this fine picture of its glories.

(From the Morning Post, of Thursday, Jan. 12

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.—The proprietors of this ably-conducted paper have just presented to their subscribers a tableau monstre view of the west end of London and the palaces and public buildings for nearness of which and accuracy of perspective it is the best we ever saw. It is said that M. Claudet, with his [illegible] has been employed for [illegible] upon the [illegible] and both models [illegible] for the purpose of [illegible] Whether [illegible] be [illegible] a model representation [illegible] we cannot pretend to say, but [illegible] and [illegible] sent, are handed down to posterity with wonderful [illegible] to the usual mass of valuable information and the beautiful illustrations which adorn this journal, a compendious index is appended, which will render the volume when bound up invaluable as a book of reference for the events of the past year. The first volume is now published entire, and we most cordially congratulate the proprietors on the unprecedented success with which their endeavours to improve the public taste and morals have been attended. The extraordinary increase in their circulation must also operate as a check upon the [illegible] of the infamous trashy prints which have long been a disgrace to the woodcut era of this country, and which are to be superseded by the healthful influence of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

(From the Morning Herald, of Wednesday, Jan. 11).

It is with much satisfaction that we have observed the rapid progress which has been made in general estimation within the last few months by a publication of an entirely novel and decidedly meritorious character. This publication is the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, a weekly newspaper, which not only bids fair altogether to supersede many of its less worthy rivals, but has already made considerable progress towards effecting that desirable object. The weekly prints to which we allude have long enjoyed a factitious reputation, founded ostensibly upon their assuming to address themselves more particularly to the wants and wishes of the people at large, but, in reality, working for the advancement of all moral feeling, subverting all religious principle, and widely extending opinions of the most disloyal and pernicious character. These publications had unhappily absorbed a large portion of that class of readers who have only the opportunity of seeing a newspaper once a week, and to their evil influence may be attributed much of the discontent which has from time to time manifested itself among the working people.

The scope and tendency of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS are entirely the reverse of that which we have condemned. Its purpose is to improve at the same time both the mind and the taste of the people: to elevate the moral tone of the weekly newspaper press, and confine monkeyism to its proper sphere. This end has been fully attained by the judicious management of those who conduct the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. It presents at once an epitome of all the intelligence of the week, and a work of permanent value, and adds to that information original articles of abiding merit, connected with the most important or interesting topics of the day—the whole illustrated in the fullest and most perfect manner by the aid of wood engravings. Each piece of this work now lies before us, richly embellished with the most attractive engravings, and replete with the most interesting information. Each number would excite our wonder at the possibility of giving so much for so small a sum (the price being only sixpence), were we not assured, from good authority, that its circulation already nearly equals that of the most prominent among the Sunday papers. This is a natural result; for the attraction being as much for the eye as the understanding, the weekly purchaser will inevitably be led towards that which gives him pleasure to look at as well as to read. It is not to be inferred that the LONDON ILLUSTRATED NEWS has created a new class of readers—such a result is only the work of much time; but it has done even better, it has drawn within its vortex numbers of those who formerly read the only publications accessible to them, which added nothing to their information but a knowledge of vice or infidelity. At the same time we are gratified to learn that the list of subscribers comprehends a large number of the well-informed and highly-educated.

The most recent achievement of the LONDON ILLUSTRATED NEWS is the publication, in one enormous sheet, of a superb view of the metropolis, taken by the Daguerreotype process of M. Claudet, on a series of silver plates, combined to form two pictures—one a north and the other a south view of London, the point from whence they are taken being the summit of the Duke of York's column. These views are admirably executed; every object of interest is well brought out, and the most conspicuous features of the great city are at once discovered. To publish a plate like this was a great undertaking, but it has been as successfully accomplished as it was boldly conceived.

To ensure the complete success of the LONDON ILLUSTRATED NEWS, it has only to continue steadily in the career which it has so well begun.

(From the Morning Advertiser.)

LONDON IN 1842. This is the title of a magnificent plate which has been presented by the proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS to their subscribers on the occasion of the new year. It is certainly the most extraordinary example of pictorial illustration which has ever been published by a cheap journal, and giving convincing proof of the capabilities of the Daguerreotype process, applied on a large scale, and through the medium of a wood engraving. The extent of the prospect, comprising the whole of the south of the [illegible] city, from two points of view, the breadth of the masses into which the artist has divided the subject, the numerous [illegible] the skilful contrasts of light and shade all combine to make this the most eligible "Picture of London" which has ever been produced. It is, in short, the sole means by which foreigners and country readers can form to themselves any idea of the grand feature of the British metropolis, which, we may be pardoned for reminding our readers at the holiday season, is known to be paved with gold. The present number of the ILLUSTRATED NEWS is accompanied by a supplement of equal size. Both are replete with interesting letter-press, illustrated by wood-cuts of various execution, and such as must present a rich banquet to the lovers of pictorial art, the taste for which we rejoice to remark daily acquires greater strength and extension throughout the country.

(From the Globe.)

The ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS is unique in its character and design. The proprietors select the most interesting subjects connected with the [illegible] of the day, and supply a series of beautifully executed wood-cuts, [illegible] and letter-press descriptions, to illustrate and perpetuate their [illegible] In addition to the enterprise which marks the progress of this week [illegible] one of the patronage their undertaking [illegible] their regular subscribers [illegible] We draw attention to the journal as [illegible] unlimited approval; and invite an inspection of the engraving, which is exhibited in the window of the office, in justification of the terms of praise in which we have felt impelled to speak of it.

(From the Hereford Journal.)

The enterprise of the British press in procuring information is admitted on all hands, but it was reserved for the LONDON NEWS to go far beyond all its competers in pictorial embellishment. "London in 1842," a view taken from the summit of the Duke of York's column, is not merely remarkable for its gigantic dimensions, but for the correctness and delicacy of its details. It is worthy of an elegant frame, and a place in the library or sitting room. Besides this engraving, Nos. 35 and 36, with the supplement, are adorned with an almost endless variety of superior embellishments.

(From the Derby Mercury.)

In an age like the present, remarkable for the abundant resources to which the intellectual and inquiring mind may have recourse for increasing knowledge and information, the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS must be acknowledged to be without a rival. Valuable as an historical record of her most gracious Majesty Queen Victoria's visit to Scotland, and as a faithful delineation of the times in which we live, it abounds no less with spirit-stirring anecdote and affecting incident of every day occurrence. Some magnificence of its pictorial embellishments, alone, cannot but create the most pleasing interest in its favour in the general sentiments and opinions of its readers. We particularly recommend the volume for the past year, it appropriately bound, as admirably adapted for a Christmas present to the young of both sexes, certain that they will be delighted with its perusal, while, at the same time, it will form a useful and attractive addition to their libraries, and prove an entertaining companion on a lady's boudoir, or drawing-room

(From the Liverpool Courier.)

Decidedly the most spirited literary effort of the day is the getting-up of the above periodical, the plan of which is as novel as the execution is beautiful. The design, indeed, is one which would scarcely fail to be successful, containing, as it does, information on the passing topics of the day with pictorial representations, and thereby appealing to two of the strongest of the popular appetites—curiosity and the love of amusement. The only marvel is, how it can answer the purposes of the publishers, seeing the enormous expense they must be at, for a continued weekly succession of new cuts. By a most extended circulation alone can they possibly be remunerated; and we cannot doubt but in this they will not be disappointed. The ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS is honourably distinguished from many of the popular periodicals of the metropolis, and may be safely admitted into any family, being not less unexceptionable in its tone than it is attractive in its aspect.

(From the Bath and Gloucestershire Standard.)

We have been favoured with a map of London, presented by the spirited proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS to their subscribers. This artistical production is really of a first-rate character, and gives a convincing proof of the capabilities of the Daguerreotype process applied on a large scale, and through the medium of a wood engraving.

(From the Western Luminary.)

VIEW OF LONDON.—We have been much gratified with the sight of a new view of London, recently published by the proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. It was taken by the Daguerreotype process of M. Claudet, on a series of silver plates, combined to form two pictures—one a north, and the other a south view of London, the point from whence they are taken being the summit of the Duke of York's column. These views are admirably executed; every object of interest is well brought out, and the most conspicuous features of the great city are at once discovered. As a work of art, this picture deserves to be most favourably spoken of, and the proprietors of the LONDON NEWS are entitled to great credit for their liberality and spirit in bringing it out. Of that paper itself we are glad of an opportunity of saying a word in commendation. Its illustrations are executed with great skill, and its epitome of the news of the week is very full and correct.

(From the Liverpool Chronicle.)

We suppose the paper appellated the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS is now known to everybody, and purchased by almost everybody; if not, we would advise a commencement at once, for everybody ought to be in possession of so rich a fund of art and literature as embodies. Unlike the generality of illustrated works, the subjects get better and better, both as regards finish and design. The views of London, given with the final number for 1842, are beautifully and correctly engraved, and are of large size, and altogether form a work that is a proportion of the spirited paper all the success they deserve, and feel assured that the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS will outwing and outlast all the ephemera of the day

(From the Liverpool Albion.)

We believe that all our readers have seen or heard of this paper, which has recently been making such creditable efforts to gain public favour that it has become popular throughout the three kingdoms, and we have ever read its praises in the journals of the West Indies and of North America. All who have seen the numerous illustrations published in each number must be aware of their great excellence. The artists employed must be individuals of high ability, for the freedom, grace, and boldness displayed, are indications not only of long practice, but of great genius. In addition to the lavish embellishments given in each number, the proprietors have issued a series of silver plates with two superb views of "The Great Metropolis of England," which ought to be preserved with extreme care, as they are certainly extraordinary specimens of art

(From the British Gazette.)

It is really, in this age of puffing, quite refreshing to be able to speak sincerely in terms of praise of any new publication, and we are able to do so most unqualifiedly of this work. It is unique in its conception, design, and execution; bringing the art of the pencil to the description of the pen; and thus giving in an elegant, cheap, and compendious shape, the "very form and pressure," not only of the times we live in, but those of aye-gone days. With the first number of the present year, the proprietors have presented to the subscribers a splendid engraving of "London in 1842;" a picture which, whether we regard the conception of the design or the beauty of the execution, stands, we think, quite unrivalled in its kind,

(From the Wakefield Mercury.)

We have received the publication of the Colosseum Print of London, 4-4 feet large, beautifully executed, and certainly one of the greatest wonders ever produced in printing.

(From the Tipperary Constitution.)

LONDON IN 1842.—We have been favoured with two very splendid views of London, by the Proprietors of THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. We have shown them to persons who are intimately acquainted with the great metropolis, and they have unanimously pronounced them to be most faithful and accurate. Indeed we may say that we never met a little surprised when we opened those very beautiful and ornamented prints.

(From the Kilkenny Moderator.)

The last number of this very cheap, interesting, and ably-conducted publication contains the promised print of the "New View of London," which represents the great metropolis from the summit of the Duke of York's column. The print, which is given on an enormous sheet, is really magnificent. The views appear to be admirably executed, and the various objects of interest are fully developed. The last number is also accompanied by a large supplement, both containing a quantity of interesting letter-press, and a rare variety of beautifully executed wood-engravings illustrative of the different subjects treated of. In fine, we consider the ILLUSTRATED NEWS one of the best and cheapest publications of its kind.

LITERATURE AND FINE ARTS.—Some months since a weekly newspaper was established in London, called the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, which presented, or rather, at its commencement promised to present, the rare attraction of combining pictorial illustrations of public events and of the scenes of their occurrence. We confess we were anything but sanguine of its success when looking over the prospectus, and still less so when we obtained the first number, as the literary matter was excellent, well selected, and well arranged, and the illustrations really admirable. We could not even conceive how the proprietor would be able to keep up the interest, and still less so when we found the capital which was evidently required to support weekly, the talent which the first number displayed. In fact, we concluded that it was merely a gudgeon thrown out to catch a whale, and that each succeeding publication would be inferior to its predecessor, until eventually it would die a natural death. From a feeling of curiosity we purchased the second number, but there was no falling off developed. The last number is also accompanied by a large supplement, both containing a quantity of interesting letter-press, and a rare variety of beautifully executed wood-engravings illustrative of the different subjects treated of. In fine, we consider the ILLUSTRATED NEWS one of the best and cheapest publications of its kind.

NEW VIEW OF LONDON.—We have received a copy of the last number of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, a weekly newspaper of considerable ability, embellished with a variety of woodcuts, accompanied with an engraving, on an enormous sheet, representing London as it at present exists. The engraving is cleverly executed, every object of interest is neatly defined, and the most remarkable features of modern Babylon are at once recognized.

(From the Derbyshire Argus.)

LONDON IN 1842.—We took occasion, at the end of the past year, to notice a weekly paper then newly published, under the title of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. The wonderful success that has been progressing in public favour, and very deservedly so. The tendency of the paper is to improve at the same time the mind and the taste of the people, which object it carries out by well written original articles, and by beautiful engravings illustrating all the interesting occurrences of the day. We notice it now chiefly on account of a magnificent plate presented to its subscribers in the opening of the new year. It is a tableau monstre of London in two parts; a north and south view, taken by the Daguerreotype from the summit of the York Column. The picture must be correct since it was delineated by the glorious sun himself. All the prominent features of London can be at once recognized, by any one who knows that city, and for those who do not, the "Illustrated News" contains an index. To give some idea of the difficulty of preparing this enormous print, which is four feet six inches by three feet, we may mention that the Daguerreotype impression was first taken upon small plates of silver from the sun's rays, then copied, and the reflections divided in from nature. These engraved upon wood, to effect which a perfect plane was formed of a number of small blocks of four or five inches square. This plane had to be formed without line, speak, or flaw. The drawing upon the wood was the next step, and this was followed by the engraving. To effect this, eighteen artists were employed for two months, night and day, at the same time. The engravings were carefully separated to guard against accidents of the press, and finally launched to the public. To subscribers of six months previous, the plate is given gratis, to others it is sold for a guinea, if coloured two guineas

LONDON IN 1842.—The last number of the ILLUSTRATED NEWS—a weekly newspaper of considerable ability, and which is embellished with a variety of wood-cuts—is accompanied with an engraving, on one enormous sheet, representing London as it at present exists. The engraving is cleverly executed, every object of interest is neatly defined, and the most remarkable features of the Modern Babylon are at once recognised. The two views—one of which is a north, and the other a south view of London—have been taken by the Daguerreotype process of M. Claudet, on a series of silver plates, and the point of sight selected by the artist is the summit of the Duke of York's column. Altogether, the picture is the completest of the sort we have ever seen, and must have cost a world of time and trouble.

(From the Scotch Reformers' Gazette.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.—Truly it is the age of enterprise, and we make no apology for again referring to the above publication. It is now [illegible] that the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS is published weekly. The price of it is only one shilling. It can be sent free by post, as it is stamped like a newspaper. It assuredly deserves every encouragement, and we shall be glad to see it extensively patronized in Scotland.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.—The embellishments of this admirable publication appear to become more numerous and excellent with each succeeding week, and the volume will soon be complete; and the supplement is literally filled with pictorial illustrations, while the index affords a key to the social and political history of the world during the last six months. The most splendid effort of the proprietors is an enormous plate, entitled "London in 1842," and presented to the subscribers on the occasion of the new year. It represents a bird's-eye view of the great city from the Duke of York's column, and is a work of art, having been taken by the Daguerreotype process of M. Claudet. The effect is very striking: every object of interest is clearly discernible, and the neatness of execution and finish honourable to the artists of the country.

(From the Dundee Herald.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.—The proprietors of this splendidly-illustrated newspaper have presented their readers with a beautiful engraving of London, as it at present exists, on an enormous sheet, as a new-year's gift, and a frontispiece to the first volume of the work. It is a first-rate picture, cleverly executed, and is a noble triumph of art. There are two views, north and south, which, taken from the summit of the Duke of York's column, by the Daguerreotype process of M. Claudet, a key to it is given, by which every object of interest is clearly discernible, and the neatness of execution and finish honourable to the artists of the country.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS is a most admirable family paper, and gives, for sixpence, an excellent summary of the news of the week, a rich fund of literary matter, and, what is a great attraction, a number of beautiful pictorial illustrations of objects of interest.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.—The proprietor of this paper has nobly redeemed his promise of providing a weekly newspaper that should do honour to the age in which it was produced; and whilst he has so faithfully performed his part, we trust that he has been duly remunerated in receiving that ample support which his unexampled endeavours have so well entitled him to expect. The publication of the numerous splendid specimens of the graphic art, given weekly, the proprietor has presented the subscribers with two very magnificent views of "the City of the World," our own great metropolis, the unrivalled excellence in the production of which is of the highest order: indeed, the art of wood engraving must have received so powerful a stimulus, through the instrumentality of this paper, as cannot fail to raise it to an eminence which must make it the envy and admiration of the whole world of letters

(From the Kilkenny Journal.)

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.—We have already expressed our opinion of the merits of this extremely interesting paper. But the fact of the spirited proprietors having made a present to their subscribers of a magnificent print, entitled "London in 1842," calls for a fresh meed of approbation. These splendid views of London (one northern, and the other southern. They are executed in the highest style of art, and are produced in enormous sheet. If anything were wanting to complete the popularity of this elegant and admirable journal, it is now supplied by that chef-d'œuvre, "London in 1842.

(From the Kent Herald.

LONDON IN 1842. Under this title the proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS have published a print, gratuitously presented to their subscribers, of unequalled magnitude and excellence. It is a view of London, taken from the summit of the Duke of York's column, looking to the south over St. James's Park, and to the north towards Regent's Quadrant, embracing almost every object of interest in the vicinity, as Buckingham Palace, Westminster Abbey, Regent Street, the Athenæum, St. Martin's Church, the Reform and the Travellers' Clubs-houses, the Horse Guards, Whitehall, the Parks, St. Paul's Cathedral, &c. &c. It is probably the largest wood engraving ever undertaken, and could only be executed by the application of modern science, under the direction of great mechanical talent and a very large pecuniary outlay. The views were first taken separately by the Daguerreotype, combined by skilful draughtsmen, and transferred to sixty of the largest slabs of box-wood that could be procured. The execution of these and the obtaining from the whole an engraving of uniform excellence, is among the miracles of modern art. We understand it has occasioned quite a sensation in the metropolis, and will no doubt largely contribute to increase the already extensive popularity of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

The Westminster Review, Bentley Humfrey Company, published, at the outset of their business, a large print taken from the same position, bearing some similitude to the present work, but it is needless to say, much inferior to it in size and distinctness.

(From the Cork Southern Reporter.)

LONDON IN 1842.—We have received the first number for the new year of a weekly journal, entitled the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, accompanied by a print containing two views of the "Great Metropolis." Of the taste and ability displayed in the execution of this splendid work of art, we cannot speak in terms of sufficient admiration. It is unquestionably the most useful and elegant production in this line we have ever seen, and we are satisfied that some years hence such a print could not have been purchased under at least One Guinea. It has been however presented gratis to the subscribers of that journal, and will be a most acceptable present to all who wish for a correct and comprehensive representation of the several interesting and conspicuous features of the great city. This unique production has been executed by the Daguerreotype process of M. Claudet, on a series of silver plates, and affords the most unquestionable proof of the value of that extraordinary invention. The light and shade are taken judiciously managed, while the group of the many conspicuous objects is so correctly arranged as to form not merely a perfect picture, but a valuable reference for strangers to the most remarkable objects in London. Referring our readers to the advertisement in another column for a more minute description of this magnificent plate, we shall only say that the Proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS are entitled to the warmest support of every patron of art and literature, and that the enterprise which could conceive and successfully accomplish such an undertaking must ensure them that extensive patronage of their admirable periodical to which it is so justly entitled to. The illustrations in every number are numerous, the subjects well chosen, and the execution, in every instance, highly creditable to the artists. There is also a quantity of well selected and original matter contained in each publication, and it has this peculiar recommendation, that its object is to elevate the moral tone of that class who form the greatest number of the readers of Weekly Newspapers, while every thing objectionable is carefully excluded from its columns. We cordially wish it every success

ABOLITION OF THE SLAVE TRADE.

The execrable tyranny of the New Poor Law—the degrading thraldom of our factory-toilers for wealth—the wretched and semi-brutalised condition of the unhappy workers in our collieries and mines—are too palpable evidences that in spirit, if not in name, we have a practical slavery existing in the heart of England, and poisoning those beautiful streams of liberty from which all the land should drink alike—as the very waters of the health, and life, and light of its noble constitution. Pauperism, too, and the goading exigencies of distress have latterly so afflicted the general body of the people—that among the suffering lower classes there have been deprivations and wretchedness hardly inferior to what has been endured within the fetters of foreign slavery, although the cruelty has been less pregnant with torture and the reckless savagery of inhuman disregard. It has, therefore, almost grown into a habit with us, in our advocacy of English wants and wrongs, to cling to that species of charity which begins at home, and to declare that we had better concern ourselves about our white slaves in England, before we prepare the temple of freedom and humanity for the black slaves in other regions of the globe. There is some plausibility in this, and the infirmity of the doctrine is at least natural. The wrongs and distresses of our own poor do cry to Heaven, and work for remedy upon every impulse and passion of the human heart. But though it is in the nature of strong griefs in ourselves to weaken, if not deaden, the sorrow which we should otherwise feel in a contemplation of the afflictions of others—yet our nobler sympathies should repudiate this inaction of generosity and social love, and the higher precepts of a godlike philosophy should assert their lofty claim upon the nation's heart.

It is for this reason, then, that amid the unparalleled misery which is prevailing among our poor we can still afford to look abroad upon other human woes that are elsewhere the fruits of cupidity and crime. Honour and justice have hands that can grasp the world—they do not cry out against isolated evils and episodical wrong, but they gather within their glance all the human races on the globe, and have a voice of truth and eloquence that has promptings and echoes wherever man can feel.

The slave, therefore, who has the iron entering into his soul beneath the burning fire of the fever clime, has the glowing accents of a beautiful wisdom and a sympathising sorrow, pouring their cordial balm upon his spirit, even from the bosom of the old majestic Thames!

The orator in the senate of Britain is oracular with a denunciation of the blood-stained tyranny that is crimson on the Afric soil, and that glorious voice to which all humanity is bound to listen stretches over the million billows of the eternal ocean to draw its noble inspiration from the groan of a bleeding victim or the clanking of a burning chain!

Lord Brougham, in one of those fine flashes of well-prompted eloquence, which spread their light even over the darker and less questionable phases of his erratic genius, moved in the House of Lords on Tuesday, a resolution, pointing its impressive finger at the direct extirpation of the trade in slaves. To cleanse the soil of Christianity from blood—to wipe away the cruelty that mounts for vengeance unto God—to stem ferocity in its mad torrent, and palsy Mammon in his golden arm; but, above all, to flood back upon the world's community the pent-up feelings and affections of a million human hearts—so pouring another stream of civilization into the bosom of society—these were the motives of virtue that stimulated the exertions of the noble lord, and for these we must find words of right loving praise.

It is in accordance with all the high principles of humanity which this journal has been loud to advocate, not to abandon or overlook the great subject, and Lord Brougham has so permanently fixed it upon the English gaze, that the eye of the man and the Christian could not now be averted from it if it would. The slave-trade we have been for some years accustomed to think nominally abolished. Practically it is now clearly proved to be not so. Then, in the name of all human love and glory, let England lift her lordly arm, and strike down the blood-merchant in his sin! Let the lands that have been the soul of slavery, become its grave! let the very word die, and hearts and lips refuse it utterance, until the end of time. Lord Brougham began his impressive speech on Tuesday with the statement that:—"Half a century had now elapsed since Parliament, acting as the grand inquest, not for this country alone, presented to the indignation of mankind that execrable traffic, which, for three hundred years, had been the scourge of Africa and the disgrace of Christian Europe. To that righteous Act, counselled by all the genius of the age, sustained by its virtue and animated by its pious zeal, there succeeded a long, a criminal delay, for which Parliament was alone responsible. Though denounced, the enormity was protected; and after being universally condemned it continued to flourish and increase, till at length that sentence was recorded by Parliament which the voice of the public had pronounced, and the enormity was prohibited by law, and it became comparatively easy to obtain the unanimous consent of both houses of Parliament, and of the country at large, no longer to term crime a trade, but to treat the criminals as other felons were dealt with, and to make them at length undergo the punishment which had been inflicted on criminals far less guilty than they. How then was it, that full thirty years after this great consummation, he appeared before them to complain of slave-trading, and to ask for new laws to put it down; and this not against foreign states alone, but against subjects of the British Crown, subjects to the British law, who were violating their duty both to the Crown and the laws. He would show, not by vague generalities, but by more positive proof, that it was by the aid of British speculation, and the employment of British capital, that the slave trade, where it is still existed, was carried on."

Lord Brougham, to the disgrace of some of our shameless speculators—of those men who show to loathing how the lust of gold may overcome the energies of civilization—proved his case with a terrible though resistless evidence. We have not space to go into the whole details of the iniquity exposed. Suffice it that his Lordship proved the expenditure of annual millions of money in the purchase and sale of human beings in Brazil and Cuba alone—millions which could come only from the speculation and enterprise of such a country as this. He proved also the circumstances of the traffic—the expedients of horror, of torture, of black and burning crime, which were resorted to to keep up the dreadful trade. He made, in a word, a simple though fearful statement, and to the honour of our legislature it touched all hearts. The Ministers, by the voice of the Duke of Wellington, at once afforded their approbation to the resolution of the noble lord. The iron old duke, with his shrewd and superior intelligence, suggested that the honour of initiating some peremptory measure of slavery abolition should rest with the noble lord; and declared that in that event—which as a matter of glorious duty Lord Brougham will hardly tardily achieve—he would pledge the government to take it into immediate consideration, and to assist in making it the law of the land.

This is a great result gained—a result worthy of the genius of Brougham—worthy of the justice of Wellington—worthy of the honour, and prowess, and liberty of the British name. And let us not underrate its value because our poor are sad, and crippled, and distressed at home, but rather rejoice at the carrying out, in any measure, of those principles of which true freedom is the soul and essence, and which reflect a splendid lustre even upon the misery we endure, by proving to the world that no amount of domestic wretchedness can banish from the bosom of our country the impulses and sympathies which she would fain shed round in beautiful humanity upon all the world beside.

HILL COOLIES LANDING AT THE MAURITIUS.

The subject of the article which precedes this engraving, makes it not inappropriate that we should here introduce an illustration of another of those forms of human grievance, which closely, in our humble opinion, approximate to the crimes that are perpetrated by the slave-trade itself. Here are groups of that particular class of labourers which, in the East Indies, are termed hill coolies—inveigled from their native clime and home, and imported for the purpose of working out in a species of slave labour the ends of gain of the planters and merchants of the Mauritius. There is every reason to believe, moreover, that when seduced into the strange land they are not treated with even ordinary humanity; and owing to the state, or rather suspension, of the laws having reference to their condition in the colony, they have open to them no means of redress. They are in fact the objects of a traffic, which is in its spirit as iniquitous and as polluted with self-interest as that of slavery itself. The Times newspaper in a series of powerful articles has, however, forced public attention upon the subject; and we trust not to be ourselves backward in a fair and manly advocacy of the depressed and unfortunate cause of these aggrieved hill coolies. Our limits, however, in the present number of our journal, will only admit of our shadowing forth an idea of the evils of this sort of slave emigration by the illustration which is the subject of these remarks.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.—The Paris papers of Friday and Saturday were occupied with the preliminary proceedings of the Chambers. At a private meeting of Conservative deputies, 182 in number, the question of which of the three candidates for the Presidency of the Chamber should be supported, was discussed, the parties being M M. Dupin, Sauzet, and Salvandy. So large a majority in favour of M. Sauzet was, however, declared, that it was resolved the undivided support of the meeting should be given to him. His re-election is, therefore, certain. The general impression appears to be that M. Guizot's Cabinet will be found much stronger than it was last session, it having already secured the return of 14 out of the 18 presidents of the bureaux.

The translation of the remains of the Duke of Orleans from Neuilly to Notre Dame, where they are to lie in state three days, took place on Saturday. The spectacle appears to have been one of deep interest. After the various military bodies which preceded the funeral car, the Archbishop of Paris and a large assemblage of the clergy followed on foot—an unusual feature in such a ceremonial. Vast bodies of persons occupied the line of route, and conducted themselves with the greatest propriety. The number of spectators is supposed to have amounted to half a million. The King's reply to the Address of the Chamber of Peers was brief and appropriate.

The gerant of the Gazette de France was, on Friday, prosecuted for alleged seditious libels which appeared in that paper on the 19th and 20th ult., in articles referring to the contemplated regency, and having allowed judgment to go by default, was sentenced to two years' imprisonment and a fine of 24,000 francs. This proceeding has greatly increased the bitterness of the opposition papers, and it appears, to say the least of it, to have been singularly ill-timed.

Letters from Portugal of the 25th ult., mention that the commercial and slave-trade treaties entered into between that country and England, had been duly ratified, and had, of course, become law.

The Chamber of Deputies on Monday afternoon proceeded with the verification of the election returns, but that of Emile de Girardin, editor of the Presse, which excites the greatest interest, was adjourned till the next day, the Bureau not being ready with its report. Two other returns, those of M. Dilhau for St. Girons, and M. Allier for Gap, are also disputed; and the committees, by 17 against 14, have decided that an inquiry should take place into the facts, and M. Maugeune and M. Dufaure were named reporters. This is a movement against the Cabinet. M. Melheurat is named reporter for the Bargeneuf election, for which M. Girardin was returned, as well as for Castel Sanazin. He is opposed on two grounds—first, that he has not proved his nationality; and, secondly, that he does not pay the necessary qualification. The real objection is, that M. de Girardin, for various motives, is disliked by all parties. He killed Armand Carrel, of the National, in a duel—that accounts for the hatred of the Liberals; and his waspish manners and writings, independently of his personal conduct in momentary affairs, as well as in social life, make him obnoxious even to his own party. M. de Girardin's wife writes under the signature of Viscount Charles de Lunay, and has been patronized by De Lamartine and others.

PARIS, Monday, August 1. There was much talk this day at the Chamber of Deputies respecting a dispute which occurred between M. Lafitte, the Provisional President as the Senior Deputy, and Marshal Soult, at the procession of the Duke of Orleans, last Saturday. It appears that the programme for the ceremony did not contain the name of the President amongst the high functionaries to support the pall of the coffin. M. Lafitte, on meeting Marshal Soult, complained of this bitterly, and the latter replied that the Cabinet had decided, as the Chamber was not constituted, not to assign a place to the President. M. Lafitte replied to the Marshal, "The Chamber, Marshal, that you call not constituted, is the same Chamber that made the King and the Chamber of Peers such as it now is." The Marshal then proposed that the President should take the third place—that of Keeper of the Seals, the first being to the President of the Council, and the second to the Chancellor, President of the Chamber of Peers, M. Lafitte. The latter, however, declined to take any place inferior to that of the President of the Peers, as the Chamber of Deputies was part and parcel of the Executive. The Cabinet, endorsed with M. Lafitte's objections, proposed that he should hold the corner of the pall with the Chancellor in the same line, and this proposal closed the dispute, the Keeper of the Seals was then coupled with the Minister for Foreign Affairs at opposite corners.

It is rumoured that M. Piscatory, who failed in the elections, is to be nominated Minister Plenipotentiary to the Court of Athens. M. Piscatory's Greek fame in the former mission is by no means great.

As the Bourse the position of the ministry was regarded as precarious, in consequence of the Dufaure-Passy party being opposed to it.

The funds were higher in the early bargains, but declined towards the liquidation. The Threes 77f. 85c. to 90c., and 78f. 10c. the end of the month. The Fives 115f. 50c. Railroad Shares better. Belgian Funds ¾ higher. Spanish funds were rather better.

The visit of its Archduke Frederick, son of the late Duke Charles of Austria, to Algiers, creates some speculations. He arrived there on the 21st in the Bellona frigate, and on the 25th the governor-general, Bugeaud, dined on board the Austrian frigate.

SPAIN.—We learn by the Madrid mail of the 25th ult., that Senor Arguelles, the Queen's guardian, continued to make changes in her Majesty's household. Madame de Belgida, the friend of the Don Francisco family, had been replaced as lady of honour by Senora de Montijo, well known for her opinions in favour of the Carlists. This curious appointment had given rise to much commentary.

The Infante Don Francisco and his intriguing wife, with their family, were expected to leave at the end of the month at the latest for St. Sebastian.

The Madrid papers, which had been compelled to appear in half-sheets for some days on account of the printers' strike, were expecting compositors from the provinces, and by this mode it was hoped to put down the coalition.

It is stated in our private letters, that the concentration of Spanish troops on the Portuguese frontiers continued, the object being, it was supposed to suppress smuggling more effectually, although political motives are assigned in some circles.

The Madrid mail of the 24th reached Paris on the 31st, in due course.

It was concluded, from the tone of the Regent's organs, that a complete reconciliation between the Spanish and French governments was at hand, and it was rumoured that the terms of this reconciliation have been the formal pledge, on the part of Espartero, not to conclude a treaty of commerce with this country.

Accounts from Barcelona of the 25th state, that the shooting of Carlists was continued with the same vigour, by Zurbano's orders.

The Augsburg Gazette, in its Neapolitan news, states that during the sojourn of the French fleet under Admiral Hugon, off Naples, several fights took place between the crews and the Neapolitans. Admiral Hugon, it adds, had demanded the extradition of the naval pupils who had fought the duel at Naples, which had proved so fatal to one of them, and the demand had been forwarded to the King at Palermo. By our Toulon advices, we understand that his Sicilian Majesty had complied with the request, which was fortunate for the French officers, as duelling is punished with death or the galleys in the Neapolitan dominions.

Prince Metternich was to have quitted Vienna on the 28th, for Bohemia.

The Cologne Gazette, in its Vienna letters, states that the reports of the defeat of the Russians in Circassia are confirmed.

The last Russian papers announce officially the recognition of the present government of Portugal by the Emperor of Russia, and the appointment of Count Stroganoff, as Russian Ambassador at Lisbon.

TURKEY.—Our correspondent in the Turkish capital, in a communication dated the 13th ult., confirms the important news of the hostile collision that had taken place between the Turks and Persians. Our present advices have reached us viâ Vienna, and we are in daily expectation of dates to the 17th of July, to be brought by the overland Indian mail, or by the Levant mail, due at Marseilles on the 1st instant.

In addition to the details supplied by our Constantinople correspondent, we find in the Augsburg Gazette, under the same date (the 13th), from the Ottoman capital, a corroboration of the fact that the Porte had ordered all its disposable troops into Syria to march to the Persian frontiers. On the other hand, the Shah was rapidly advancing from Teheran, so that unless diplomacy has got the start we may expect to learn of active hostilities between the Sultan and Shah. The latter, amongst other grievances, demands an indemnity of three millions and a half sterling for the sacking of Mahmoera by the Ottoman troops some years since. Turkey, if she had even the will, has certainly not the power of paying this claim, so that a conflict appears inevitable. The Shah's troops are understood to be better prepared than those of the Sultan; to add to those embarrassments, is another outbreak at Nissa, on the Servian frontiers, the Bulgarians being again in open revolt against the Porte, excited, it was supposed, by Greek emissaries. The Bulgarians invite the Albanian and Servian Turks to proclaim their independence and shake off the Mussulman rule. The energetic measures adopted by the Ottoman government were expected to put down this outbreak, which, however, will leave its fruits behind in the moral effect on European Turkey.

Prince Mavrocordato, it is said, has at length been able to open the negotiations with the Turkish minister for foreign affairs for the commercial treaty between Turkey and Greece.

Our correspondent confirms the accounts received through Vienna, that the Austrian and Russian commissioners had come to an understanding with the Porte to settle the Bucharest disputes. Prince Ghika was to be secured from personal responsibility.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The Earl of Shaftesbury took his seat on the woolsack, in the absence of the Lord Chancellor.—Several bills were forwarded a stage. The Earl of RIPON moved the second reading of the Bonded Corn Bill. The object of the bill was to allow a certain quantity of bonded corn to be taken out of bond and ground into flour, or made into biscuit, which was again to be returned into bond, and not to be taken out till the duty was paid on the flour at the rate which might then prevail. The biscuits might be taken out for the purposes of exportation.—Lord BEAUMONT opposed the bill. He apprehended that it would open the door to numerous evasions of the corn-law.—The Earl of ROSSLYN, in reply, said that the noble lord seemed to forget that vessels could now provision themselves at Hamburgh, the United States, and elsewhere, which, by the operation of this bill, would be enabled to lay in their stock as cheaply at home. It appeared to him that the bill would remedy a great inconvenience, and injure no one.—After a few words from Lord MONTEAGLE in its support, the bill was read a second time. In reply to the Marquis of LONDONDERRY, the Earl of ELLENBOROUGH said that no intention existed to alter the present packet system between Portpatrick and Donaghadee. The Earl of ABERDEEN laid on the table copies of treaties relative to the suppression of the slave trade; also a bill for suspending the operation of an Act now in force for suppressing the slave trade, as far as related to Portuguese vessels, which was read a first time.—Lord RADDALE, in the absence of the Earl of Devon, moved the third reading of the Mines and Collieries Bill.—The Marquis of LONDONDERRY opposed the third reading. After a discussion, in which Lord Redesdale, Lord Campbell, the Marquis of Londonderry, and Lord Wharncliffe, took part, a clause was added, on the motion of Lord WHARNCLIFFE, to remedy the defect which had been pointed out by the Marquis of LONDONDERRY, to the effect—"The owners and occupiers of such mines and collieries, or their agents, are hereby required to furnish the means necessary for such person or persons so appointed to visit and inspect such mines, collieries, buildings, works, &c.—The bill was then read a third time and passed.—Their lordships then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS. MONDAY.

Several bills were forwarded a stage. On the motion of Mr. P. M. STEWART, it was ordered that no new writ be issued for the borough of Ipswich until the report of the committee on the last election and the evidence be printed.—On the motion of Mr. MACKINNON, the Southampton writ was ordered to issue. In the discussion of this motion Sir R. Peel assured the house that it was the intention of her Majesty's Government to give their general support to the bill then in progress for the suppression of bribery and treating.—In reply to Mr. P. HOWARD, Sir J. GRAHAM said that it was his intention to proceed with the Bankruptcy Bill; but, in order to introduce some additional clauses, at the suggestion of influential merchants of the city of London, he proposed to re-commit the bill on Wednesday.—Mr. T. DUNCOMBE moved that the petitions he had on a former day presented from Dr. M'Doual and the inhabitants of Deptford be referred to a select committee.—Sir J. GRAHAM opposed the motion. The doctor had been apprehended and detained in custody in consequence of taking an active part in a disturbance between the Corn-Law League party and the Chartist party at a meeting convened by the former. There had been much violence and tumult, and it did not appear to him that there was any reason for the appointment of a committee.—After considerable debate the house divided—For the motion, 30; against it, 89; majority against Mr. Duncombe's motion, 59.—In committee of Ways and Means several resolutions were taken without opposition. On the order of the day for the further consideration of the report on the Tobacco Regulation Bill, an opposition, began by Mr. Duncombe, and aided by Mr. Hawes, Dr. Bowring, and Mr. M. Philips, was overruled by a majority of 53 to 9.—The clauses were then agreed to.—The report of the Ecclesiastical Corporations Leasing Bill was brought up and agreed to, after a long discussion, in which Mr. V. Smith, Mr. Hawes, Mr. HUME, Mr. Brotherton, and Sir J. Graham took part. The right hon. baronet said he intended to introduce some amendments on the third reading, which was ordered for Friday next. The County Courts Bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed on Friday. The report of the Bribery at Elections Bill, with some verbal amendments, was received.—Sir J. GRAHAM obtained leave to bring in a bill to annex the county of the city of Coventry to Warwickshire, and to define the boundary of the city of Coventry. The bill was read a first time. The house then adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The Lord Chancellor presided.—The Insolvent Debtors' Bill was read a third time and passed; after which Lord BROUGHAM tendered to their lordships the thanks of all the insolvent debtors in England for the abolition of imprisonment for debt.—Lord CAMPBELL withdrew the bill of which he had given notice, on the subject of Irish Dissenters' marriages until next session, in consequence of a statement from the Lord Chancellor respecting the appeal relating to that subject before their lordships' house.—The Earl of ABERDEEN moved the second reading of the bill relating to treaties with Portugal and the slave trade. The object of the bill was to enable her Majesty in Council to suspend an act for the suppression of the Portuguese slave trade, which would no longer be necessary when the ratifications of the treaty had been exchanged. The bill was read a second time. Lord BROUGHAM then rose to submit his motion on the subject of slavery, which he had twice before postponed on account of the absence of the Lord Chancellor. It was now half a century ago, said the noble and learned lord, since Parliament, acting, not for this country only, but for the whole world, presented to the indignation of mankind the execrable traffic, which for more than three hundred years had been the scourge of Africa and the disgrace of the Christian world. After that righteous act, counselled by all the genius of the age, advanced by pious zeal of the humane part of mankind, there succeeded a long and criminal delay, for which Parliament was alone to blame. After being uniformly condemned, yet slavery flourished: but at length the infamy was punished by Parliament enacting laws of a more stringent force. When it was held to be illegal to be engaged in slavery, comparatively it was an easy task, and he had the good fortune to be instrumental in obtaining the unanimous assent of both houses of Parliament, and, he might add, the assent of the whole country, to treat the crime as a legal trade, but to treat those who were engaged in it as felons, and as other criminals had been treated—far less criminals than the former; then, indeed, the subject presented a very different aspect. How came it, however, to pass, that after 33 years had transpired, and after what had been accomplished, he had to stand up there to condemn the trading in slaves, to ask for new laws to put it down, to call for declaratory acts of Parliament to give force to those which already existed? And how happened it now, for instance, that he had to ask this not on account of foreign nations, over whom, he would say, we had no authority—not to ask it on account of those over whom we had control, who were subjects of the crown, and amenable to the laws of the country, but who had neglected their duties both to the crown and to the law? He would ask their lordships, by evidence which could not be disputed, that it was through the instrumentality of British subjects, and by the employ of British capital, that the slave trade was carried on in numerous foreign countries. He would go at once to prove that British capital had been so employed. Their lordships were aware that in Cuba he said that they were aware, because it appeared from papers which were on the table by command of her Majesty, the report of the commissioners inquiring into the subject of slavery he alluded to their lordships were then aware that in the island of Cuba (and he should confine himself to Cuba and the Brazils, in the observations such he felt it his duty to make on the present occasion (there were very great wrong-doers as regarded slavery. In Cuba, it appeared, that between the years 1829 and 1836 there had been an increase of twofold in the manufacture of sugar, the quantity having increased from 166,000,000lbs. to 370,000,000lbs.; and the number of slaves, between 1837 and 1841, had increased by 32,000. There were at that time in the island 91,000 employed in the plantations, which, with the additional 32,000, made a total of 123,000 slaves. In the Havanah there was a yearly importation of 50,000 slaves, and the price of each had risen from 60*l.* to 80*l.* Not less than 1,000,000*l* had been expended in that traffic, whilst the whole export of Cuba amounted to about 3,000,000*l*. If he took their lordships to the Brazils, how stood matters there? Since 1829 there were, in Rio de Janeiro 364 vessels with slaves, containing about 109,000, and these at the cost of 80*l*. each. It appeared that within three years there had been 17,000,000*l*. expended in slavery in the Brazils. It was useless to ask whether such large sums as had been expended in Cuba and the Brazils were the property of the foreigner or the subjects of the British crown. It was painful to be obliged to confess that it was alone from this country that such supplies, to the amount stated, could come. Those who entered into such speculations might as well be aware of the state of the law, and in what way the new negroes were to be employed. In the first place there was a public recognition made by one of the senators of the Senate of Bahia, who publicly declared "that the law had fallen into disuse which had been passed for the abolition of the slave trade." The noble and learned lord here read a memorial from the Provincial Assembly of Minas Geraes, as well as Bahia, as we understood, addressed to the General Assembly, in which they unblushingly called for a total repeal of the abolition laws. Nothing, in his opinion, could match the audacity of these memorialists, calling for the interference of the government in behalf of piracy and ill-doing—for a repeal of the law which denounced it as a crime, and that, too, on the ground that the law was set at defiance, and could not be enforced by the judges of the land. Now, those who invested their capital in such a traffic knew full well what they were about. Their lordships might, however, think that he was wrong in attributing to British guilt what had taken place. He would not do so. He would say that he was not wrong. On the 14th of July, 1838 (he felt it right to mention the date that no doubt might exist), the English consul settled at the Brazils wrote to Lord Palmerston, informing his lordship "that the understanding that the slave-trade were for the most part the result of British enterprise." He begged now to bring the following fact under their lordships' notice, which proved, that though the slaves were the victims of evil-doers, they might sometimes escape detection, yet they were happily sometimes found out. A vessel, it appeared, was seized, carrying Russian colours, on the African coast, and taken to Sierra Leone, where she was released, the court thinking (though that was in error) that it had no jurisdiction. This vessel ought to have been condemned, but she was released, and being released she was sold. Where was she sold? In the City. By whom was she purchased? By a merchant who had been naturalised, he having been a foreigner, who had been established in the City for twenty years. Who was the person for whom she was purchased? A Spaniard—a notorious slave-trader. She was then had an English name given it, and it was sent forth on its voyage, and she touched at Cadiz. It might be thought that she was intended to make an innocent voyage to Cadiz only, but what was the fact? She was again seized on the African coast, her fittings-up having all been appropriated for carrying on the slave-trade, and condemned for being engaged and abetting in the slave-trade. If their lordships could believe that this vessel was merely engaged in an innocent voyage to Cadiz, that the transactions in the City by the parties whom he had described was without blame, then he confessed that their measure of belief was greater than his. He possessed another case which he begged to mention, that of an American-built vessel, registered as the owner residing in Liverpool (indeed, there was no doubt of the fact. She was fitted from Liverpool to the Brazils with an English crew. She had no sooner arrived in the Brazils, having been consigned there from Liverpool, than she was sent out for the African coast. These facts he (Lord Brougham) had from a gentleman who was there. Seven-eighth of the crew refused to leave the ship because they had contracted, as they imagined, to return to Liverpool. She was found afterwards on the coast of Africa, and, for being engaged in the slave-trade, detained. She was proceeding from that coast with a cargo of from 70 to 80 slaves, and was destined for an Englishman settled in the Brazils. Not to multiply cases, he would only give one more instance, in which there was not a shadow of doubt that the vessel was fitted up for being engaged in the slave-trade. It appeared that the person who fitted out the vessel was as notorious a slave-trader as ever existed, and yet this man (he obtained a return) was one of from 25 to 30 mercantile houses in Brazil as to his honour and integrity—a man who was as well known as being a slave-trader as his name was well known at Rio de Janeiro. Now, among the names signing his certificate it did so happen that one-half were English merchants, and that the guilt which attached to such inhuman practices rested on their heads; but there was no denying the fact that they were accessories to this guilt, inasmuch as they reaped profit and gain by it. It was not necessary, nor, indeed, would it be useful to exaggerate on such a subject. Indeed, exaggeration would only diminish its horrors. He defied the imagination of man to conceive, or the pen to specify the miseries or shackles which were manufactured in England for the unfortunate victims to coerce them during the middle passage, nor did he particularise the fitting-up of their dungeon on board. It appeared, however, beyond all doubt, that of the English money insured those vessels and fitted them out for the inhuman traffic, vessels like those which Captain Denman took, one of which, of only 57 tons burden, had 581 negroes on board, that is eight to one ton

TOBACCO.

Snuff is very little credited of the pernicious and deleterious quality of this plant, and indeed of all the various tribes of the sts, birds, or reptiles, has ever been known to taste of it. It has been reserved to man alone to make of this poisonous plant an article of daily necessity for the gratification of his depraved appetite.

TWILIGHT.

Dear art thou to the lover, thou sweet night,
Fair fleeting sister of the mournful night!
As at an appointment one he stands apart,
Companioned only by his beating heart,
And with an eager turn not heeding
The vision of a shade rather [illegible] folds
Fast through the grove, and gain the open mead.
True to the hour as lovers hearts agreed!
At length she comes. The evening's holy grace
Makes the glory of her radiant face.
The curtain of the daylight flung around pale
Hangs round her like the shrouding of a veil;
As turning with a bashful, timid thought,
From the dear welcome she herself hath sought,
Her shadowy [illegible] drawn against the sky
Checks, while it chastens, his impatient eye.

WHIMSICAL CALCULATION.

What a noisy creature man would be, were his voice, in proportion to his weight, as powerful as the grasshopper, which may be heard at the distance of one-sixteenth of a mile. The kobben weigh about half an ounce, so that a man of ordinary size weighs about as much as 1000 kobbens. One kobben must weigh at least as much as four grasshoppers. Assuming, then, that a man weighs as much as 16,000 grasshoppers, and that the voice of one of these may be heard at the distance of one-sixteenth of a mile, that of a man, were it in proportion to his weight, would be audible at the distance of 1000 miles; and, what, as a sound, as would ran the risk of bringing the house about his ears, as it was [illegible] at the sound of the trumpets. Assuming, further, that these weights are [illegible], which is something more than [illegible] and that it is [illegible] to the [illegible] and a half a spring, a man of 150 pounds weight would by the same rule, be able to [illegible] a spring over a space of 12 [illegible] miles, and, consequently, [illegible] from New York to Cochin China, or round the world in two jumps.

INDIA AND CHINA.

BOMBAY, June 18.—The intelligence from India by the present overland mail is of no particular importance. Matters in Affghanistan remain nearly in the same state as before. The army of General Pollock remains inactive at Jellalabad. The prisoners and hostages remain in the hands of the enemy, and are treated as well as can be expected under the circumstances. Three children had been born in captivity. Negotiations for the release of the prisoners had been going on between Akhbar Khan and General Pollock, through the medium of Captain Mackenzie, who was permitted to come into Jellalabad on parole, but their nature had not transpired. The hostages were said to be in keeping of the high-priest of Cabul.

Cabul was in a state of revolution! An attack had been made by Akhbar Khan on the Balla-Hissar, which signally failed; and, we are told in a letter, dated Jellalabad, 26th May, that Akhbar Khan's treasury being exhausted, he endeavoured to raise a loan in the city, offering exorbitant interest, but so low in estimation has he fallen, that he could not procure the two lacs he was negotiating for. As a last alternative, he endeavoured to rally around him all the fanatics of the country, by proclaiming a religious war, involving death to every infidel; but here again he failed, those to whom he appealed declaring that the infidels had not injured them, but, on the contrary, by a lavish expenditure of money, had enriched the country. Thus low stands the Buruckzee party just now.

By far the most important topic of intelligence is the immediate withdrawal of the British troops from Affghanistan. Of this there has been as yet no official announcement; but it is generally believed, even by those who would wish it otherwise, that an order to that effect has actually been issued. An order from the Adjutant-General's Office, Calcutta, dated May 14, commences thus:—"Instructions having been issued for the withdrawal within the British provinces of the troops serving west of the Indus, it has become necessary to make arrangements for the comfort of the different corps during their march across the Punjaub." As this is a subject of some importance, it may be proper to bring into one view the arguments which have been adduced for and against the probability of this alleged abandonment of Affghanistan, and it must be confessed the preponderance is in favour of the former. The Bombay Times of this day says:—"Our readers are aware that this measure is one which we have all along most strenuously advocated. Without adverting to the enormous and cruel injustice of a continuance or renewal of the war, it may be enough to state that, according to Sir Robert Peel, it has already cost us nearly seventeen millions sterling, and can only be maintained at an outlay of above three millions a year. Of this last-named sum, two millions, at any rate, are sent into Affghanistan in coined silver money, and never returns to us; so that for every month the war continues, we have the circulating medium of India diminished by nearly £170,000 in specie withdrawn from the currency of the empire. We consider the order said to have been issued by the Governor-General, the most wise and manly one that could have been resolved on. Our funds are so embarrassed, that we were this time last year on the eve of bankruptcy, till the China ransom money reached Calcutta; and this year the construction of the celebrated Doab Canal has been postponed for want of means to carry it out."

The Agra Ukhbar, of the 9th of June, received to-day, has a ridiculous story about the Commander-in-Chief having ordered the retrograde movement without the concurrence or even knowledge of the Governor-General,

The Delhi Gazette, of the 8th, a trustworthy authority, says:—"The first open symptom of the intention to leave Jellalabad for the provinces, seems to have manifested itself in the recal of the party which had been ordered towards Peshawar, to bring up the baggage left there; and next, the construction of rafts for the conveyance of heavy baggage down the river; and, perhaps, the most unequivocal, the very great pains taken by General Pollock to counteract the effects the rumour might produce the moment he became aware it had gone afloat in the camp."

A dreadful hurricane has taken place at Calcutta, destroying numerous houses, and damaging about fifty vessels on the river, with great loss of human life. The loss of boats with produce down the river will be enormous, and of ruinous amount. This will be chiefly of sugar, saltpetre, rice, and cotton.

At Bombay two ships have been destroyed by fire within the last fortnight. The Vansittart, formerly one of the East India Company's China ships, and the Cornwallis, both on the eve of sailing for China with cotton cargoes. The loss of property amounts to above £100,000. It was strongly suspected that these fires were the work of incendiaries, and the suspicion is confirmed by the circumstance of another ship, also ready for sea, and to sail for China to-morrow, having been discovered to be on fire, but it was promptly extinguished. It appears that the Lascars had prepared a large quantity of combustible matter, placed it below a cask of spirits in the hold, and then set fire to it. The fire-engines from the Government steamers were sent on board, and speedily extinguished the fire, but the Lascars all jumped overboard, and attempted to escape in boats, but they were all seized, and are now in confinement. These people get six months' pay in advance; it therefore becomes their interest to destroy the vessel, in order to release them from their engagements. These are the people for whom a spurious sympathy is frequently excited in London.

Commercial affairs here are in a most depressed state. The Bombay Times says:—"Nothing can be more unfavourable. Prices of all descriptions of imports are miserably low; while those of exports are by far too high, notwithstanding the low rates of freight, to be safely shipped. The season is now over, and no business of consequence will be transacted till after the monsoon, without any prospect of improvement even then."

The King of Oude departed this life the middle of May, and his eldest son, Sooryah Jah, has been crowned in due form.

CANDAHAR.—Brigadier England, who left Anetta on the 26th of April, arrived with his convoy at Candahar on the 9th of May. The Ghilzies had attacked Kelat-i-Ghilzie on the 21st of May, and were repulsed by the garrison. Colonel Wymer, with 5000 men, was to march to the relief of Kelat-i-Ghilzie, and it was doubtful if General Nott would advance on Ghuznee. Lufter Jung was still near to Candahar, and reported to be collecting troops for another attack. The force at Candahar was about 10,000 fighting men, but without sufficient carriage for an attack on Cabul.

JELLALABAD.—Nearly 10,000 men of all arms at this place, badly off for supplies, shelter, and carriage. An advance on Cabul was impossible, for want of camels, &c. General Elphinstone was buried with military honours. His report had been received, by which it appears that Sir W. M'Naghten intended to seize the Affghan Chiefs, but Akhbar Khan discovered the plot, and seized Sir William. The Khyber pass was open. The Seikhs are still at Jumrood and Ali Musjed. The prisoners are reported to be well treated.

The latest dates from India are, Macao 12th of April, Jellalabad 26th of May, Candahar 25th of May, Calcutta 7th of June, Bombay 19th of June.

CHINA.

(From the Malta Times of July 25.)

We have news to the 12th of April from China, only eight days later than that last received. It appears that after the attempt formerly mentioned, to destroy the garrison at Ningpo, the Chinese encamped, about 6000 strong, some eleven miles to the westward, with a view of cutting off our supplies. A force of about 1100 men embarked, and were towed up the river by the steamers till opposite the enemy. An attack having been made, the Chinese were dispersed in every direction, leaving from 600 to 700 dead upon the field. They fought with much more determination than on any previous occasion, hence their loss. We had three killed and ten wounded. The troops returned next day to camp.

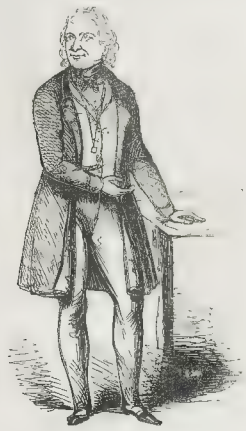
An Imperial messenger was on his way to offer 40,000,000 dollars as part of the expenses of the war.

IMPERIAL MESSENGER.

It is said a force of no less than 30,000 is collecting, once more, to attack Ningpo. It is also affirmed that Sir Hugh Gough is about to execute a movement on the capital of the province of Chekeang, and will probably carry the whole of the troops along with him. After the first affair at Ningpo, the enemy's treasure chest fell into our hands. It contained no more than 2000 dollars. By the time the last of the reinforcements now on their way to China have arrived, we shall have 56 ships of war, 17 of which are steamers, in the Chinese waters, with 40 to 50 transports and store-ships, and 15,000 fighting men, besides mariners, who may be employed on shore. We have already slain nearly 8000 Chinamen, and captured and destroyed 1819 pieces of artillery. It is said that the Chinese are preparing to rebuild the Bogue Forts. Our readers are aware that in addition to the sum as compensation, the Celestials have ceded Hong Kong as the price of peace.

HONG KONG.

POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No. VIII.



MR. WAKLEY, M.P.

We last week made the world more familiar than ever with the features of one member for Finsbury; and we now place his colleague bodily before our readers, granting them permission, although the subject is not dead, to dissect him according to their pleasure. Here, then, is Mr. Wakley, M.P. for a metropolitan borough, coroner for Middlesex, editor of the Lancet, ex-editor of the Ballot newspaper, popular declaimer and pretended friend to everybody, and medical attendant to nobody at all. All the range of his practice falls out of his profession, and he has the happy peculiarity of having no occasion for his education. His "curiosities of medical experience" would not be particularly crowded in the smallest pill-box of his craft; and as the Irish definition of poverty is, that state in which a flea may skip about in a man's pocket without fear of knocking its head against a halfpenny, so the English condition of Mr. Wakley's medical repute is beyond all fear of becoming endangered by the existence of a patient. He has devoted himself to the after-death business of life, and he takes himself politically to the curing of nothing but the British constitution. In this he is a bit of a nostrum-monger, as may be easily supposed.

Mr. Wakley is, we believe, the son of a small farmer, from whom he imbibed just so much of a taste for husbandry as has kept him cultivating his own interests ever since he began the active business of existence. He knew the value, in pushing his ambition, of an organ in the press; and as he made the Lancet available for professional power, so he thought that the establishment of the Ballot newspaper might obtain for him the possession of political influence. He did start the paper, but he did not establish it; for medical as might have been his reputation, he could not succeed in keeping it alive.

He, however, by dint of active and untiring perseverence, made some written and oral impression upon the public mind. He industriously induced a belief that one of the glories of the country should be a medical coronership, and to that bourne he carried both it and himself at last, keeping, as far as we have yet been able to see, all the advantages of the position upon his own side. In his capacity of coroner, he has displayed more activity than intelligence. He fancied to invest it with the highest style of judicial dignity—to stilt it upon pomp—into a sort of giant that should be the right arm of the constitution. He was to be a great infallible doctor and judge—the goose that should save the capitol—not upon one occasion but all, and, to boot, whether it should be in danger or not. Any influence he really possessed he obtained from the press; and therefore in the first days of his coronership he set the same press at open defiance; would allow no intimation to be given of his inquests; and would have excluded reporters from their proceedings, if the newspapers had not been a great deal stronger than the coroner, and rather more potent both for good and harm. The result was, therefore, that the flippant coroner got laughed at, of which the flippant newspapers were the principal cause. Seriously, Mr. Wakley made a fool of himself over these matters; but having been properly rebuked, he has since had the good sense not to make his insignificance too prominently intrusive.

As an M.P., we do not believe there is any particular reason to rejoice in or repudiate him. He is going with the popular stream, and is one of the most sensible of the noisiest class of Radicals. He works with some manliness in his calling, and vindicates his opinions in a straightforward way. He, however, attained for himself during the present session, the most unenviable distinction, of being the public detractor of the venerable poet, Wordsworth. Everybody pitied, though some were angry with Coroner Wakley then. They could not but commiserate the intellect that was diseased enough to disparage a mental greatness, which it could neither reach nor comprehend. His literature, however, does not extend beyond the Lancet; and we should say that the locale of his peculiar poetry was rather his pocket than his brain.

He has—apropos of pockets—tumbled, we believe, into considerable wealth—and is, take him all in all, a tolerably respectable public functionary and member of society. His order of oratory is declamatory, here and there tinged with a dash of constitutional humour. He is not without his influence even upon the community at large, owing to the sterling good sense of some of his propositions, and the general rouse shrewdness of his parliamentary remarks. His advocacy of the poor commands respect, and although he has "a mixed renown," there are thousands who regard him as a man of mettle and of mark.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

NETLEY ABBEY.

We this week take for our nook of interest a portion of the fine old ruins of Netley Abbey—one of the most beautiful features of our romantic scenery, and celebrated far and wide in the verses of all our poets. Even Thomas Ingoldsby this month makes it the subject of a legend in "Bentley's Miscellany," introducing it in some opening stanzas of considerable grace and beauty; but then as suddenly bursting into the mad and laughter-fraught burlesque, in which he is so inimitably good. We must prefer, however, to put before our readers the more genuine feeling of Lisle Bowles—

"Fall'n pile! I ask not what has been thy fate,—
But when the weak winds, wafted from the main,
Through each low arch, like spirits that complain,
Come hollow to my ear, I meditate
On this world's passing pageant, and the lot
Of those who once might proudly in their prime
Have stood, with giant port: tall, bow'd by time
O'injury, their ancient boast forgot,
They might have sunk, like thee; though thus forlorn,
They lift their head, with venerable hairs
Besprent, majestic yet, and as in scorn
Of mortal vanities and short-lived cares.
Even so dost thou, lifting thy forehead grav.
Smile at the tempest, and tame's sweeping sway."

These beautiful ruins have also been finely described by Keats and Miss Mitford. They stand on the declivity of a hill, rising gently from the Southampton water, surrounded by venerable woods, through the intermediate openings of which, a fine view of the opposite shore is obtained. The Abbey is about three miles from Southampton, and may be approached either in boats from the quay, or by a delightful walk or drive, passing over the new floating bridge on the river Itchen; an undertaking that reflects great credit on the spirited proprietors, and is of great benefit to the town and neighbourhood. Formerly the visitor, walking to Netley Abbey, was permitted to pass through the beautiful grounds of the late W. Chamberlayne, Esq., but this privilege has been of late years discontinued.

In either sailing or walking to Netley Abbey, the visitor will obtain a fine view of the village of Hythe, Cadlands (the seat of A. B. Drummond, Esq.), Fawley Church, Calshot Castle (one of the fortresses built by Henry VIII.), with the hills of the Isle of Wight in the distance, forming a most delightful sea and woodland picture.

The ancient name of this religious house was Letteby Abbey, conferred on it by Henry III., who founded it in the year 1239, and filled it with the Cistercian order of monks, brought from the neighbouring monastery of Beaulieu, and dedicated to the Virgin Mary. This establishment continued till 1527, when it shared the fate of other religious foundations, from the vengeance of Henry VIII., at which period this community consisted of an abbot and twelve monks.

Netley Port is situated on the shore at a short distance from the Abbey, and is generally supposed to be connected with it. It was built by Henry VIII., at the same time as Calshot Castle, as a protection against the invasions of the French.

Netley ruins are now the property of Thomas Chamberlayne, Esq., nephew of the late W. Chamberlayne, Esq., M.P. for Southampton, to whom they were lately bequeathed. Weston Grove, his late residence, a marine villa, is delightfully situated. The extensive grounds, reaching nearly to the Abbey, are beautifully laid out, having commanding views of the surrounding country, forming the most picturesque and romantic scenery. In the grounds is a spiral column, erected by the late proprietor, to the memory of Mr. Fox; the inscription was written by the celebrated Dr. Parr, which, we believe, has not been affixed.

STEEP-HILL CASTLE.

WINTER RESIDENCE OF THE QUEEN DOWAGER.

The pretty and picturesque castle which here catches the reader's eye, assumes now a new interest, from its having been selected as the future residence of that illustrious lady, the Queen Dowager. A correspondent suggested it as a fitting subject for illustration, and it will be seen how readily we have complied with his request. Steep-hill was a spot once celebrated as the Queen of the Undercliff of the Isle of Wight; but which has latterly changed its character, that simplicity and air of wildness which formerly distinguished every feature, having given place to magnificence and polished decoration: the comfortable thatched cottage, for so many years the favourite retreat of Earl Dysart, has been succeeded by this splendid castle; and several neighbouring rustic cots have been removed (to the advantage of the occupants), to give an extent of ground corresponding with the style of the new mansion.

The place is now, notwithstanding the change, extremely beautiful, and has become more interesting than before, from the circumstance of the Queen Dowager having selected it as her abode. The residence of that exemplary lady in the Isle of Wight, will be hailed with joy by all its inhabitants; and we have only to hope that the pure air of that delightful spot may long be the means of preserving in health and strength one who is so universally regarded with the esteem and affection of the people.

Close to Steep-hill is the pretty little town of Ventnor, which, since the year 1830, from being little more than a hamlet, has risen to its present importance, in consequence of the very general opinion entertained by medical men in favour of the Undercliff, as being the most desirable spot in Great Britain for the winter residence of invalids, especially those whose complaints require a mild climate. Every house, therefore, is furnished with accommodations for lodgers; and there are now several resident medical practitioners, and shops in almost every line of business.

THE FASHIONS.

PARIS, Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin, le 2 Août, 1842.

Mon cher Monsieur,—Before entering on the gloomy details of the new fashions in mourning, which I must do next week, I send you a sketch of a walking costume, which, though so simple as to appear nothing, is, whether we regard the richness of the delicate green silk of which it is made, the graceful elegance of the shape, or the charming lightness of the black net-lace shawl, must be pronounced, by the eye of taste, one of the most lady-like dresses which has appeared in the present season. The bonnet is peculiarly graceful in its style, and, unlike your English straw baskets, ornaments, rather than encumbers, the head. From what contrariety of fashion I know not, but at present the skirts of our dresses are made double, by a tunic or shorter petticoat of the same stuff, edged, if in muslin, with lacework and ribbons of silk nuance, or if in foulard, organdies, or other fabrics, with embroidering in braid work (soutaches), and in these Grecian patterns are very generally introduced. Indeed, this soutache is rapidly increasing in fashion, and has been worked out very elegantly on a tunique of white organdie on a skirt of the same, the embroidery being of the Grecian pattern, embroidered in double soutache of white silk and gold. To such an extent is this new fancy-work carried, that armorial bearings and cyphers are worked with it on escutcheons of lace, for pocket-handkerchiefs; and scarfs, robes, cardinals, and camails, are each and all of them now brodées en soutache. I know of no other novelty (otherwise than in mourning) than to say that crape was the favourite material for bonnets, and that feathers were giving way partially to flowers, which were beginning to be worn, not only in the bonnets but the dresses; those with dark leaves and bright berries were the most admired, the leaves in general, being made of velvet nuance. JULIE.

ROMAN INSCRIPTION DISCOVERED AT BATTLE BRIDGE.—A Roman inscription has within these few days past been discovered at Battle-bridge, otherwise, by an absurd change of denomination, known as King's-cross, New-road, St. Pancras. This discovery appears fully to justify the conjectures of Stukeley and other antiquaries, that the great battle between the Britons under Boadicea, and the Romans under Suetonius Paulinus, took place at this spot. Faithful tradition, in the absence of all decisive evidence, still pointed to the place by the appellation of Battle-bridge. The inscription, which, in parts, is much obliterated, bears distinctly the letters LEG. XX. The position is sketched by Tacitus; and antiquaries well know that on the high ground above Battle-bridge there are vestiges of Roman works, and that the tract of land to the north was formerly a forest.

CHINESE CURIOSITIES.—Among the articles brought home in the Wellesley, from China, is the identical cage in which the unfortunate Mrs. Noble was confined for six weeks by the Chinese. It resembles the coop in which birds and small animals are sometimes brought to this country. It measures two feet eight inches in length, one foot six inches in breadth, and two feet four inches in depth; the top, or cover, has a small hole for the head to come through. It is very roughly made of fir stakes, and will, we understand, be sent to the British Museum, where it may be of interest, as showing the mode of punishment to which the British have been subjected by the "brothers of the sun and moon." The circumstance of Mrs. Noble's capture will be fresh in the recollection of most of our readers. She was the wife of the captain of an East Indiaman, wrecked on the coast, where her husband and child were drowned. She herself only survived with a few others, who fell into the hands of the Chinese, to suffer treatment worse than death. Most of the crew of the Wellesley have brought home some trophy of their services in China of no intrinsic value, and we are sorry to hear that some of them have been deprived of these little gratifications by the custom-house officers.—Devonport Telegraph.

FLY FISHING EXTRAORDINARY.—A small party from Barnsley were fishing in Rockley Dam, Stainborough Park, on Saturday week, when a fly thrown by Mr. W. Parker was taken by a large rat, which was securely hooked and brought to land, to the no small amusement of the parties, who had never witnessed such a "draw" before.—Leeds Intelligencer.

ANNUITIES.—On the passing of the Property Tax Act, a paragraph appeared in some of the evening papers, purporting to be an extract from the London Gazette, requiring, in pursuance of the act, that all persons entrusted with the payment of any annuities were required to deliver to the Tax-office an account in writing of the amount of such annuities, under a penalty of £100. This statement was completely erroneous, and has been productive of great inconvenience to the authorities at the Tax-office and the public. The fact is, that the notice in the Gazette applied to colonial annuities and dividends only.

The Papal Calendar, published at Rome, has just appeared for the year. According to it the Pope will complete his 77th year on the next anniversary of his birthday (September 18th), in the 11th year of his papacy. There are at present 60 cardinals, at least this is the number put down for the college. There are six cardinal bishops, 43 cardinal priests, and 11 cardinal deacons. Russi, the oldest cardinal, is 87, and Schwartzenberg, the youngest, is 33. The ages of all the cardinals make 3580 years, the average of which is 59 1-3.

The projected new Chapel Royal at Buckingham Palace, which is to be completed by next season, is to be constructed on the site of the conservatory, joining the middle of the building at the southern extremity, and will be on a level with the lower state rooms, being approached by the lower dining-rooms. The works will be commenced about the end of the month.

SIMPLE TRUTH.—A ludicrous mistake occurred at a funeral in Marylebone. The clergyman had proceeded with the service until he came to that part which says, "Our departed brother or sister;" he then turned to the mourner who stood nearest to him and asked whether it was a brother or a sister? The man, imagining it referred to the relationship to himself, very innocently replied, "No relation at all, Sir—only an acquaintance."—John Bull.

FARRINGDON-STREET IMPROVEMENT.—The commissioners appointed to carry into effect the City improvements have entered into engagement forthwith to complete the line of street leading from Farringdon-street, for the formation of the street to Clerkenwell-green, contracts having been signed for the erection of houses on each side of the above spacious new street, and which will be second-rate buildings. Leases will be granted by the Lord Mayor, commonalty, and citizens of London, as expressed in the terms of the contract, for 61 years at a peppercorn rent, and subsequently at such yearly rent as may be determined upon. The contracts have been taken principally by private speculators. During the next session of Parliament it is intended to apply for an act to proceed with the line through Cow-cross to Clerkenwell-green.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"J. Walters," Norwich. -All the numbers of our journal are now reprinted, and may be obtained by order of any newsman or bookseller.
"H. Saunders," Exton, who complains that he is unable to obtain the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, as he lives too far from any news-agent or bookseller, should give his order to the nearest postmaster.
Colosseum Print. -We refer all our correspondents on this subject to the general notice which appeared in our last week's paper.
"Fanny."—We return our fair and clever correspondent many thanks for her very pretty sketch for our column of "Nooks and Corners," which we shall insert in an early number. Can "Fanny" oblige us also with a brief historical description?
"T. B."—His idea of the View of Nottingham coincides with our own, the pretended artist will not be employed again.
"An Admirer," Liverpool.—We have two editions for the country. The first is published on Friday evening in time for post; the second is published on Saturday evening. The second edition contains later intelligence, and the engravings are equally good.
"Constant Reader."—Under this signature we have received thirty-seven letters this week! We wish our correspondents would adopt a more distinctive die. As we are upon this subject, we may as well hint that legibility is desirable.
"Rev. R. Harrison," Templecombe, will be entitled to the engraving
"A. B."—No difference whatever, if the person be identified.
"F. C. W." reached us too late.
"An Admirer of Improvement," Stroud.—We presume our correspondent has not seen the wrapper.
"Edward Claride" will find what he requires in another part of our paper.
"The Ladies of Westford." -Their wishes shall be immediately complied with.
"J. B. L." cannot recover.
"D. W." -We think Holland's book on Angling a very excellent one.
"Miles," Aberdeen.—The kind of news referred to would, we fear, occupy too much of our space; but we will endeavour to insert it as frequently as we can.
"Moneta." We will answer in our next.
"C. T. B."—The "Emigrant's Farewell" is highly creditable to the writer, but we have not room for it. The same observation is applicable to "Lines to a Mother."
"Yorkshire Agricultural Society."—The sketch which we were kindly favoured with by a correspondent did not reach us in time to enable us to give an engraving of it.
"J. Wilson," Abbotsford.—We thank our correspondent for his offer, and shall be glad to receive the verses. The readiest mode to transmit them to us would be by post. The Duke of Orleans's funeral will be given. His last question we cannot at present decide.
"T. S." Leeds, should procure a Wrapper, price 2d., and get his bookseller to stitch his Nos. into Parts. Part I., 3 Nos. ; Part II., 3 Nos. ; Part III., 4 Nos.
"J. S." Winchester, should order the person who supplies his paper per post, by the Saturday's post from London; the engravings are equal, and the paper is better printed. The Friday night's edition is intended for our friends in remote parts of the empire.
"W. P."—We feel obliged for his painting; we will give an engraving of it in an early number. His "Angler's Reverie" is too long for insertion.
The Wrappers are now charged 2d. each, and are published every month, for the convenience of subscribers who wish to have their numbers stitched in parts.
Correspondents not answered this week will be answered in our next.

Parts I. and II., containing Five Numbers each, stitched in a handsome Wrapper, may be had, price 3s. 6d. each. Part III., containing Four Numbers, price 2s. 6d., will be ready August 13th. Part IV., containing Five Numbers, price 2s. 6d., will be published September 17th; and may be obtained by order of any bookseller or news-agent in the kingdom.

Next week we shall present to our numerous readers a beautiful view of the city of Bath; and, under the head of "Popular Portraits," a full-length portrait of Mr. Roebuck, M.P.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 6, 1842.

A police case occurs in our paper which demands some notice. It will be seen that a gentleman appeared before Mr. Rawlinson, to state the particulars of an outrage which had been committed upon his sister and upon another lady in her company—an act of wanton atrocity perpetrated in the open streets. This was the destruction by corrosive liquid of two valuable dresses worn by the ladies in question; but it appeared that the mischief had gone further than the garments, and inflicted a personal injury upon one of them, which had caused a necessity for her placing herself under medical advice, and also a temporary amount of acute suffering. The lady had offered a reward of £50 for the apprehension of the offender, and the gentleman who made his appearance before Mr. Rawlinson came to proclaim the circumstances of the transaction, and to furnish the press and the police with such data as might—and almost must, in emphatic terms—lead to justice. But Mr. Rawlinson cut short the information about to be given for the public service, and exclaimed that he would listen to no more—"he did not sit there to supply paragraphs for the newspapers."

This phrase in itself seems to us indecent enough. It is one of the duties of Mr. Rawlinson to listen to matter for newspaper paragraphs, if the publicity of that matter be of consequence either to the punishment of delinquency or the preservation of peace.

The Lord Mayor and City magistrates, as well as others, have originated the most serious and wholesome public benefits by the disclosures which have been elicited in their offices by the assailants of every kind of civil wrong, and which derived all their virtue from the interpretation of the press. Bubble schemes have been broken up; wholesale forgeries detected; wicked swindling rendered abortive; and all sorts of impostures made nugatory, by the simple, though often requested, publications of the press. Moreover, human hearts have been opened to kindliness—and distress has been benevolently relieved through the same channels—and the blessedness of charity has been a thousand times evoked by that silent monitor which, by its mute intelligence, has made hapless misery known. How, then, can—if the law would allow us we should almost say—how, then, dare Mr. Rawlinson, or any other distributor of justice (for "distributor of justice" is what a magistrate should be, in the most public sense of the word), say that he does not sit upon the bench to afford to any British subject the means of proclaiming a wrong which is punishable in his own court, and which must take the initiative of its discovery there, nominally in the first instance, but practically, through the newspapers, in the next? Why, the newspaper reports of matters of this class and order have vindicated the rights of civilization a thousand times and more. And, to say the least, an English magistrate should never, by word or hint, assist the protection which concealment may afford to crime. An open breach of public order is committed against the property and persons of inoffending ladies. A direct act of infamous and wanton cruelty is inflicted almost in the spirit of the malice of ancient barbarism. For this act there is a direct felonious punishment; and the law should pounce upon the offender with activity and strength. And yet, when it comes to be recorded and proclaimed—when the aggrieved party comes to furnish the clue to the apprehension of the criminal—when he invokes the publicity that is almost certain to discover the guilt, he is told that the magistrate, who should pay him deference and attention, does not sit in his place "to furnish paragraphs for the newspapers." The declaration appears to us to be both undignified and unjust.

The members of the Anti-Corn-Law Conference, who for the last few weeks have formed a parliament in Palace-yard, that may be said to have divided the attention of the country with the assembly in St. Stephen's, separated on Monday last. The question which now arises is, what have they effected, what has been the result of their meeting? The answer seems to be nothing directly, but much indirectly; no practical plan of action has been proposed, but so much has been stated and proved as to the condition of the country that a very general impression has been produced of the necessity of some course of action, which the League itself seems unable to frame or set in motion. The only two suggestions we have seen are, one to convert the League into a corn-trading society; and the other, "total abstinence" from the use of excisеable articles, and a passive resistance to the levying of the assessed taxes. The absurdity of both these projects we need not waste a moment in demonstrating. The value of the labours of the Conference, then, is to be estimated from the weight of the facts they have exposed in their discussions; these facts prove the necessity, as they must form the basis, of future legislation. This is a result not for the first time produced by the congregation of organised bodies: it has followed every occasion where the right of free discussion has been asserted and maintained, and never may that most valuable of our privileges be violated or put under restraint! We are now speaking of an abstract principle; were we to go into details, and apply a rigorous examination to the discussions of the delegates, we should find much, very much, that we could wish had been left unsaid. We lately expressed our opinion on this and some other points connected with this subject, with sufficient strength, and we are sure in a spirit of earnestness. We have the satisfaction of knowing from many quarters that our views have been approved of by those whose good opinion we feel proud of gaining, and shall zealously endeavour to preserve. We need not repeat, then, that much of the language used by some of the delegates has not impressed us with a favourable idea either of the wisdom of their heads or the goodness of their hearts. "A man, says the poet, "may curse his better angel from his side," and even in the same manner a body of men may scare from them the co-operation of others by violence and intemperance, may alienate from them the sympathy which alone can give them moral power. We will endeavour to furnish an idea of what we mean. The Manchester Guardian, some time ago, published accounts of the state of trade in that town, which were a shade more favourable than those for some time preceding. Prospects of an abundant harvest are given in every quarter; for both these ameliorations of the state of the country who can be too thankful? Yet, when our amending prospects have been alluded to in the Conference, we fear we have detected a—what shall we call it?—not absolute regret, perhaps, but at least a disposition not to believe them. The more darkly, the more despondingly, the more fearfully the state of the people was painted, the louder was the applause of the delegates! Ay! applause, the sounds of gratulation, of rejoicing, and approval, at the heart-sickening details of woe, and want, and misery, terrible to hear, fearful to reflect upon—details that should be heard in silence, or whose fittest acknowledgment should be a tear! But, however perverted by circumstances may be the feelings of men, the benevolence of Providence is continuous in its action. The prospects of plenty from our harvest have been since confirmed, are almost converted into certainty. The changes of our commercial system are beginning to operate, and there is a growing feeling of returning confidence, bringing with it increased activity, which Heaven forbid we should condescend to conceal. Let us hope that the unexampled endurance of the suffering thousands who have been subjected to so fearful an ordeal is about to be rewarded. The League has many honest and sincere men among its body; it has some talent, and much energy; but its work seems the statement of facts, or what its members believe to be facts, with the liability of contradiction or disproof if they are otherwise. But all its power depends on public opinion, and this it cannot alienate without falling into contempt. We have pointed out a tendency to this result, and it would do well to rid itself of the political fanatics and unreasoning demagogues who seem to be mixed up with it. Perhaps, for its own credit, the wisest step for the present was to break up its sitting. The reports of its discussions have produced a considerable effect: would that effect have been equally favourable if there had not been considerable omissions? The League owes much to the judgment of its journals. Many of its members will know well what we mean.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, Sunday.—This morning the Queen and Prince Albert, and the Prince and Princess of Saxe Coburg, and the royal suite, attended Divine service in St. George's Chapel. An address and petition from merchants and rate-payers from the borough of Marylebone, was on Saturday presented to her Majesty, for the opening of Waterloo, Southwark, and Vauxhall bridges.

COURT GOSSIP.—The first visitor invited to Windsor since the return of the court to the Castle, was "the bride," Lady Emlyn, the quondam Miss Cavendish, maid of honour. Her ladyship arrived at the Castle yesterday, accompanied by her husband. During its visits to Claremont, the court generally abandons a great portion of its regal state. The Princess Royal may be here seen trotting about the grounds on her little pony, or playing on a large cloth, spread on the lawn—the Prince of Wales sprawling about, in vain endeavours to reach the boundary of his dominion—that is to say, the said table-cloth. The Dowager Lady Lyttleton maintains a constant surveillance over the royal children.—Cheltenham Looker-On.

Her Majesty, it is said, means to honour, in an especial manner, the next birth-day of his royal highness Prince Albert, which takes place on the 26th inst., when the Prince will enter his twenty-fourth year. A large party will be entertained to dinner at the Castle, and her Majesty will, it is understood, afterwards have an evening party, for which cards of invitation will be issued to the principal nobility and gentry in the neighbourhood.

WINDSOR, Monday.—This morning her Majesty, accompanied by his royal highness Prince Albert and the Princess of Saxe Coburg, walked through the Slopes to Adelaide Lodge. Afterwards his royal highness Prince Albert and the Prince of Saxe Coburg, attended by Lord Sydney, Colonel Bouverie, and Mr. Anson, enjoyed several hours' rabbit shooting over Norfolk farm. The rabbits, which have been strictly preserved, were found to be extremely numerous, not less than between 120 and 130 having been killed in about an hour and a half, and 50 of them by his royal highness Prince Albert, who is a most excellent shot. During the morning upwards of 50 brace of partridges were started (but, of course, left unmolested), which is a fair augury of the capital sport which is in reserve for the Prince and his friends when the regular season commences, on the 1st of next month. The birds appeared nearly full grown, and well on the wing. The pheasants in this portion of the royal preserves, although not so plentiful as the partridges, were found to be very numerous, and there are hares in abundance. The royal party proceeded to the preserves, and returned to the Castle on horseback.

Her royal highness the Duchess of Gloucester and her lady in waiting arrived at the Castle this morning, and lunched with her Majesty.

The Duke of Cambridge and the Princesses Augusta and Mary of Cambridge, the Marquis of Exeter, Lady A. Somerset, and Baron Knesbeck, arrived at the Castle to-day on a visit to her Majesty.

WINDSOR, Tuesday.—Her Majesty, accompanied by his royal highness Prince Albert, and the Prince and Princess of Saxe Coburg, walked through the Slopes to Adelaide Lodge. The Duke of Cambridge and the Princess Augusta went to Frogmore and paid a visit to her royal highness the Duchess of Kent. The Queen, accompanied by the Princess of Saxe Coburg, and the Princesses Augusta and Mary of Cambridge, and attended by Lady Jocelyn, Lady C. Cocks, Lady A. Somerset, and the Hon. Miss Devereux, rode out in the Park in pony carriages in the afternoon. His royal highness Prince Albert, the Duke of Cambridge, and the Prince of Saxe Coburg, attended by the Marquis of Exeter, the Marquis of Ormonde, Lord Jocelyn, Colonel Buckley, and Colonel Wylde, rode on horseback.

A most extraordinary horse (perhaps the smallest in the world) arrived at the royal mews, in Sheet-street, yesterday afternoon, by the Great Western Railway, from town, as a present to her Majesty, from Java (in which island it was foaled), of the diminutive size of only twenty-seven-and-a-half inches in height—indeed not near so tall as many of the Newfoundland and other dogs belonging to her Majesty and his royal highness Prince Albert. This extraordinary little animal, which is rising five years old, is of a dark brown colour, well formed, and extremely quiet and playful. It appears to be somewhat out of condition; but, with the necessary care which will be bestowed upon it in the royal stables, it will, in the course of a very short time, recover from the effects of a voyage.

WINDSOR, Wednesday.—Her Majesty and his royal highness Prince Albert, accompanied by the Prince and Princess of Saxe Coburg, walked to Adelaide Lodge this morning. This afternoon her Majesty, his royal highness Prince Albert, and Prince Ernest, rode out in the Park on horseback. The Princess of Saxe Coburg, Lady C. Cocks, and Lady Jocelyn followed in a pony carriage. Her Majesty the Queen Dowager, attended by the Countess of Sheffield and the Hon. William Ashley, arrived at the Castle on a visit to her Majesty. His royal highness the Duke of Cambridge, and the Princess Mary and Augusta of Cambridge, took leave of her Majesty, and returned to town this forenoon.

The Marquis and Marchioness of Lansdowne and Lady Louisa Fitzmaurice left town on Saturday for Dover, en route for Germany; and embarked at Dover on Monday.

VISIT OF THE PREMIER TO ROSS-SHIRE.—We are informed that extensive preparations are in progress at Redcastle, the seat of Colonel Baillie, M.P., in this county, in expectation of a visit from Sir Robert Peel, immediately after the prorogation of Parliament. Sir Robert is passionately fond of Highland scenery; and at the Glasgow banquet he spoke in terms of the warmest admiration of a short tour he had when a youth in the Western Highlands. There are differences of opinion here, as elsewhere, as to the public character and conduct of Sir R. Peel, but come when he may amongst us, he will receive "Highland welcome."—Ross-shire Advertiser.

His excellency Earl de Grey, Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, and suite, Mr. Justice Pennefather, Captain Acome, Baron Oston, and Sir John Becket, embarked on board the steam-ship Wilberforce, on Sunday afternoon, at Blackwall, for Antwerp.

Sir Robert Peel left town on Tuesday morning for Windsor Castle to have an audience of the Queen. The right hon. baronet returned to his residence in Whitehall-gardens soon after 3 o'clock.

Lady Stuart de Rothesay has returned to Whitehall from visiting the Marquis and Marchioness of Waterford at Curraghmore, county Waterford, Ireland. We understand that some days before her ladyship's departure, the Marchioness of Waterford was considered entirely recovered from the effects of her recent accident. The Dowager Countess of Caledon, who had also been staying with the noble Marquis and Marchioness, has left the above seat for Caledon Hall, county of Tyrone.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE ANTI-CORN-LAW CONFERENCE.—At the meeting of this body on Monday, Mr. Taylor, the chairman, informed his audience that "their mission was fulfilled," "their work was accomplished," "their duty done." He concluded as follows:—"We have exposed the evil, suggested the remedy, denounced the wrong, and warned the government of the consequences of persisting in that wrong; and it remains for us to return to our constituents, and tell them that all our efforts to obtain justice for them have failed (hear), and that we can hold out to them no prospect of improvement, no hope of relief. I trust the people will use no violence, but not submit to be starved; that they will respect property and life, but not permit their children to perish by famine." An address to their constituents was afterwards submitted for approval to the meeting, and the "conference" was then declared to be dissolved.

CLOSING OF ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.—On Monday a notice was posted on the doors of St. Paul's Cathedral stating that "During the cleaning of the church there will be no performance of divine service, but that due notice would be given when it would be resumed." The edifice is in a very dingy state from the accumulation of dirt and dust, but it is understood that none or very trifling repairs are required in the interior. Workmen are at present engaged in repairing the exterior of the dome.

The surveyor who has, by the direction of the churchwardens, examined the steeple of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, which was struck by lightning in the great storm of Wednesday night, is of opinion that the greater part must be pulled down, and that the total cost of rebuilding it will exceed £2000.

THE THAMES TUNNEL.—This undertaking was opened on Monday for the first time on the Wapping side of the river, and upwards of 500 visitors of all nations passed through the tunnel as far the shaft on the Rotherhithe shore. The High-street, Wapping, was thronged with people, who were allowed to view the shafts and the double staircase for foot passengers. The descent to the tunnel is now easy and convenient, and the western arch is very dry and comfortable. At mid-day there were upwards of 100 visitors promeanding in the tunnel, and upon an inspection of the visitors' book, the names and residences of more than 30 Americans from different parts of the United States were found to be entered, together with those of persons from all parts of Europe, and many from Asia. One-half of the visitors were foreigners. The erection of the circular staircases in the shaft on the Surrey side, now closed to the public, will be commenced forthwith by the contractors, Messrs. Peto and Grissell, who have completed the staircases on the Middlesex shore. The time allowed for the performance of the contract is three months, when the tunnel will be opened as a thoroughfare for foot passengers; and the toll to be charged is, we understand, to be 1d. each person.

EXCHEQUER BILLS.—(From Tuesday's Gazette.)—Her Majesty having been pleased, by letters patent under the Great Seal, dated 9th September, 1839, to appoint Thomas Spring Baron Monteagle, of Brandon, to the Office of Comptroller-General of her Majesty's Exchequer, and three of the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, by a warrant under their hands, dated the 5th April, 1842, having appointed Arthur Eden, Esq., to the office of Assistant-Comptroller of her Majesty's Exchequer, notice is hereby given, in pursuance of an Act, passed in the present session of Parliament, intituled "An Act for further regulating the preparation and issue of Exchequer Bills," that the said Comptroller-General and Assistant-Comptroller have each of them full authority to sign Exchequer Bills under the said act, in their own names respectively.

DEATH OF MR. BEVERLEY, THE COMEDIAN.—We have to record the death of Mr. Beverley, formerly manager of Covent-garden Theatre, and one of the oldest members of the by-gone school of English comedy. His first appearance in London took place about forty years ago. He shortly afterwards became lessee of the Queen's Theatre, and then of the Richmond and Woolwich Theatres, besides several other minor theatres. He has left a family of four sons and one daughter.

EXTRAORDINARY SEIZURE.—On Friday Mr. W. Hemp, the sheriff's officer, accompanied by a broker and attendants, proceeded to St. Katharine's Dock, to levy for arrears of sewers' rates, amounting to upwards of £600. The presence of these unwelcome visitors having been partly anticipated, the secretary, Sir J. Hall, and several of the directors, were present, and the sheriff's representative was requested to fix on some particular article of sufficient value to cover the amount. This having been agreed to, the broker looked around, and at length fixed his eyes very wistfully on the two immense and splendid pieces of ordnance, each weighing nearly twenty tons, which had just arrived from Woolwich en route to the dominions of Mehemet Ali; but deeming their calibre too large for his purpose, at length selected a powerful crane, in value about £2000. The usual forms of the seizure having been concluded, the company replevined, entering into the usual bonds, which will bring the matter before a civil tribunal, and leave the gentlemen of the long robe to settle a dispute which has arisen between the St. Katharine's Dock Company and the Commissioners of Sewers, as to whether a sewers' rate was fairly chargeable, the company contending that the deed of purchase for the site of the docks expressly declared that it was to be "free from land-tax, tithes, and all rent, rates, charges, encumbrances," &c.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE.—On Wednesday morning, about half-past one o'clock, a fire broke out in the Rose public-house, Wild-street, Drury-lane. The inmates, with the exception of Mr. Cross, the landlord, and his son about twelve years of age, had retired to sleep. By fifteen minutes after its first discovery the whole contents of the house was one burning mass, and only a few minutes elapsed before the engines of the County and the West of England offices arrived, and were set to work, well supplied with water, but all Mr. Cross's property was destroyed, and some of the small houses in Wild-passage were greatly damaged, and the poor inhabitants have sustained some loss by the hasty removal of their furniture. The utmost exertions were used by a strong body of police, under Superintendent Sandrock, to arrest the progress of the fire at its commencement, but unfortunately they were unable to do so. The loss is estimated at about £100.

ANOTHER DESTRUCTIVE FIRE.—On Wednesday morning, while the fire in Great Wild-street was raging, a messenger from the G division, in Rosomon-street, arrived with intelligence that another fire had taken place in the house of Mr. Rawson, Bowling-green-lane. Thither the London Establishment engines and firemen repaired, when it was ascertained that the whole of the lower part of Mr. Kitchen's dwelling-house and tobacconist shop were in flames. For some time the fire threatened the total destruction of that and the adjoining buildings, but the firemen having been well supplied with water, by three o'clock the danger to the surrounding property ceased, but not until the whole contents of the shop and nearly all the furniture were consumed. The family escaped with the greatest difficulty. How the fire originated was unknown.

FIRES.—Between 9 and 10 o'clock on Sunday night last a large fire was discovered raging on the premises, No. 11, Cock and Hoop-yard, Houndsditch, near Aldgate workhouse. The premises were entirely burnt out. The fire appears to have commenced in the front room, first floor, occupied by a female named Simons, an importer of leeches, who is fully insured, but the origin remains to be explained.—About an hour afterwards another fire broke out on the premises of Mrs. Ward, baker and biscuit maker, No. 424, Strand, at the corner of Bedford-street, and was attended with much damage. It is supposed to have commenced in a cellar underneath the kitchen staircase. The loss will fall on the Westminster and British offices.

POSTSCRIPT.

Saturday Evening.

WINDSOR, Thursday.—The Queen and Prince Albert, and the hereditary Prince and Princess of Saxe Coburg and Gotha, enjoyed their accustomed walk in the forenoon; and in the afternoon her Majesty, accompanied by the Duchess of Kent and the Queen Dowager, took a drive in the Park.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Lady Charlotte Dundas, Lord and Lady Haddo, and the Hon. Henry and Mrs. Ashley joined the dinner party in the evening.

Her Majesty is expected in town on Wednesday next, preparatory, it is believed, to the prorogation of Parliament.

The Queen, with that delicacy of feeling which has ever distinguished her Majesty, has had no musical performances at the Castle since the death of the Duke of Orleans, until Thursday evening (the funeral ceremony having then taken place), when the band of the 2nd Regiment of Life Guards performed during dinner, and her Majesty's private band was in attendance.

The Queen Dowager takes her departure to-day (Saturday), for Gopsall, the seat of Earl Howe, in Leicestershire. On Monday her Majesty leaves Gopsall for Burghley House, near Stamford, in Northamptonshire, to honour the noble owner with a visit. The Countess of Jersey and Lady Clementina Villiers, and a highly distinguished circle, are invited to meet the illustrious visitor. It is her Majesty's intention to remain at Burghley until Thursday, and will then return to Earl Howe's.

Captain Lewis, of the Peninsular steam-packet, Montrose, and Lieut. Fraser, Admiralty Agent, arrived by special train from Southampton, at 10 minutes past two, p.m., this day (Saturday), with important despatches from Lisbon to the Foreign Office.

The Right Hon. Lord Walsingham was married, this morning, to Augusta Louisa, eldest daughter of Sir Robert Frankland Russell, Bart., of Thirkleby Park, Yorkshire.

PORTSMOUTH, Friday.—There is now no doubt that it is the intention of her Majesty to proceed to sea before the summer is over. Orders have come down to get the royal barges in readiness, and to expedite the necessary fitting up of the Royal George yacht, so that it may be in readiness to receive her Majesty at the shortest notice.

MARRIAGES IN HIGH LIFE.—Thursday, at Norwood Church, the Earl of Cornwallis was married to Miss Julia Bacon, daughter of Mr. T. Bacon, of Redlands, near Reading, Berkshire.—On Wednesday, at St. George's, Hanover-square, Lord Templemore conducted to the hymeneal altar Miss Paget, niece of the Marquis of Anglesey.

WHITEHALL, Aug. 4.—Charles George Young, Esq., York Herald, has been appointed Garter Principal King of Arms, vacated by the death of Sir William Woods, Knight, late Garter; and Edward Howard Gibbon, Esq., Mowbray Herald Extraordinary, has been appointed York Herald.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—Mozart's "Cosi fan Tutti" was brilliantly performed on Thursday evening at her Majesty's Theatre, for the benefit of Signor Costa, who was summoned to receive the compliments of the audience upon the occasion.

LONDON BRIDGE.—In consequence of the partial repairs which the carriage road of this bridge is about to undergo, the following notice was yesterday issued by the Lord Mayor:—"Notice is hereby given, that on and after Monday, the 15th day of August instant, no carriage, cart, waggon, or other vehicle, will be allowed to pass over London-bridge into the City.—By order of the Lord Mayor."

LIGHT GOLD COIN.—The following notice was issued:—Bank of England, August 5, 1842.—The public are informed that, on Monday next the 8th instant, and until further notice, light gold coin in amounts from £10 to £50, will be received in the Rotunda, at £3 17s. 10½d. per oz., from 9 o'clock in the morning till 3 in the afternoon.

THE FIRST DAY OF OYSTERS.—The sale of oysters for the season commenced on Thursday, according to annual custom. The supply was abundant, the quality remarkably good, and the demand for this much prized luxury unprecedented. There were 50 sail of vessels at Billingsgate in the morning, 30 of which arrived during the previous night. At 6 o'clock, and not 12, as was at first determined, the hatches were opened, and a tremendous rush took place, and there was much competition among the vendors to obtain the first supply. Not less than 15,000 persons attended the market during the day, and the amount expended in the purchase of oysters the first day was not less than 7000*l*. The supply at Hungerford Market, as compared with Billingsgate, was inconsiderable, but the oysters there realized about the same prices.

CRICKET. KENT v. ENGLAND.—The match with Kent and England terminated on Thursday shortly before two o'clock, by Barker fetching 29 and Fenner 19 runs, which gave, with 9 byes and 1 wide ball, a score of 58. Thus giving the palm to England, with 9 wickets to go down. Good had been in the previous evening, but was bowled by Hillyer without scoring.

The match with the gentlemen of England against the gentlemen of Kent began shortly after the above match had terminated; and when the game ceased for the day, Kent, which first took the bat, had effected a score of 161 at the price of 8 wickets. Messrs. Fagge, Jenner, and Baldock have yet their wickets to go down.

NOTTINGHAM ELECTION.—We have the whole proceedings of the nomination before us at considerable length; but our limits will only afford us an outline of the facts—which are as follows: Mr. Walter was proposed by Mr. Hardwicke, and seconded by Mr. Charlton.—Mr. Sturge was proposed by Mr. Bean, and seconded by Mr. Cripps.—Mr. Feargus O'Connor was proposed by Mr. Sweet.—And Mr. Vincent, the Chartist, by another elector. The two latter propositions were merely given to afford the gentlemen in question to make legitimate electioneering speeches as well as the bonâ fide candidates, which they did with a liberal and spirited amount of oratory. Messrs. Sturge and Walter also addressed their friends at considerable length. At the close of the official proceedings, a show of hands was taken, and declared to be in favour of Mr. Sturge. A poll was demanded on the part of Mr. Walter. We shall give the result of the election in another edition.

FRIDAY, TWELVE O'CLOCK.—State of the poll:—

Walters	1256
Sturge	1184
Majority	72

The usual electioneering tactics have been followed—bribery, intimidation, and violence have been used—the town is in a very excited state, but no serious damage has hitherto been done. The poll will finally close at five o'clock.

At the final close of the poll at five o'clock (Friday), Mr. Walter was elected by a majority of 81.

DISTURBANCE NEAR GLASGOW.—We are sorry to learn that the colliers in the neighbourhood of Glasgow have nearly all turned out for higher wages. They are holding large public meetings, to which they generally go armed with sticks. Their proceedings created much alarm in Glasgow and the vicinity on Tuesday and Wednesday.

AGRICULTURE.—The great cattle show of the Highland and Agricultural Society of Scotland began at Edinburgh on Tuesday last, and was most fully attended.

EXTRAORDINARY ESCAPE.—About six o'clock on Thursday evening, as an elderly female was crossing the end of Lisle-street, Leicester-square, she was knocked down by a cab, and a wheel of the vehicle passed over her neck. Several persons instantly ran to her assistance, and conveyed her to the shop of a surgeon, when, strange to say, on examination, her neck, with the exception of some slight bruises, was found to have escaped injury, and she was shortly afterwards enabled to return home.

LAW.—GUILDFORD, THURSDAY, AUGUST 4.—GREVILLE v. CHAPMAN AND ANOTHER.—This was an action brought by the Hon. Mr. Greville against the defendants, who are the proprietors of the Sunday Times newspaper, for publishing a libel upon the plaintiff in that paper. The libel complained of was contained in a report of the proceedings of the last Epsom Races, and the plaintiff was accused of having withdrawn his horse Canadian from that race, in order that he might win several large bets that he had made against him. The defendants put several pleas upon the record, which were, in fact, tantamount to a plea of justification.—Mr. Thesiger, Mr. Bodkin, and Mr. Peacock, were for the plaintiff; the Solicitor-General, who was specially retained with Messrs. Platt and Taylor, was for the defendants. After a trial of long duration, and which, in the report, occupies several columns, the jury having (after the summing up) consulted for a few minutes, returned a verdict for the plaintiff—Damages £250.

DARING HIGHWAY ROBBERY.—Mr. Lovegrove, the proprietor of the Crown and Sceptre Tavern, Greenwich, and of the York Hotel, Bridge-street, Blackfriars, left his home to accompany a relative over the heath, at about nine o'clock on Thursday evening. He had passed along the upper wall of Greenwich-park, from the top of Maize-hill, and there parted with his friend. When he reached the cross-roads, near Vanburgh-fields, it had become so dark that he did not perceive two men who had been following him. They carefully watched an opportunity, and springing from behind, threw him on his back with a violent blow on the head. He cried out "Murder!" which one of the men in a glazed hat partly stifled by griping his throat. The other villain ripped up his clothes from top to bottom, dragged a valuable gold watch and guard from his neck, (breaking the latter), taking his cravat and whatever else they could find. By this time he had become so insensible that the thieves, having secured their booty, were content to escape. Mr. Lovegrove's recollection only serves to describe the robbers' dress as something like that worn by sailors. The police, under Mr. Mallalieu, are taking the most active measures to discover the retreat of the criminals.

POLICE.—MARLBOROUGH STREET.—Henry Norman, the son of an opulent tradesman in the neighbourhood, was remanded till Monday, on a charge of stealing a gold watch and appendages, value £52, the property of the Chevalier Wiercenskie, a Pole, residing at No. 3, Queen-street, Haymarket.

On Thursday, policeman 83, I. Division, was charged, at Union-hall, with assaulting Mary Ann Luxton. He was severely blamed for his conduct, and fined 10s., which amounts to discharge from the force, the infliction of the smallest penalty being so treated by the Commissioners.

Several cases of furious driving of omnibuses were brought before the magistrates, at Clerkenwell, on Thursday, and fines inflicted. The dangers arising from the practice are, however, now becoming so common, that the magistrate stated he should in future commit to the House of Correction, with hard labour, as the Act empowered him to do.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRES.—On Friday morning a fire of an alarming description was discovered raging in the warehouse belonging to Messrs. Kennett and Co., shipping oil merchants, &c., situated in Lime-street, Fenchurch-street, City. Upon the arrival of the engines, which was very speedily, they were instantly got into operation, and in the course of half an hour the fire was safely got under.—On Monday morning last a destructive fire happened in the village of Thorncombe, in Dorchester, which terminated in the destruction of three houses in Back-lane, and seriously damaged many other buildings.—On the same day, about eight o'clock in the evening, a fire broke out in the extensive seed mills of Mr. Foord, situated at Lenham, in Kent, about eight miles from Maidstone. The flames raged furiously for a length of time, and destroyed the greater part of the premises and the valuable machinery that they contained. The origin is not known.

Friday night a fire broke out on the premises belonging to Mr. R. H. North, coal and coke merchant, No. 36, Silver-street, Golden-square. The fire was extinguished in about two hours, but not before considerable damage was sustained.

MELANCHOLY SUICIDE.—On Thursday morning the utmost consternation prevailed in Walworth and the neighbourhood, in consequence of Dr. Brewster, who resided at No. 6, Trafalgar-street, Walworth, having just terminated his existence by cutting his throat. Various reasons have been assigned for the commission of the act, one of which is, that Dr. Brewster was in the habit of drinking brandy to excess; but although it appears he did drink much, it was not to such excess as had been said. Another opinion prevails that the gout had affected his brain and driven him to madness. An inquest was held on the body on Friday, and the jury returned a verdict of "Temporary insanity."

On Thursday morning, Mr. Chappell, the landlord of the Salutation Tavern, Garden-stairs, Greenwich, attempted to take away his life by cutting his throat with a penknife. The incision is not expected to prove fatal.

CHARGE OF MURDER, AT UNION HALL, Friday.—William Lenny, a beer-shop keeper, of Bexley-street, Peckham New-town, was brought before James Traill, Esq., charged with the murder of his wife. Inspector Campbell, of the P division, stated that the police were informed that a man had beaten his wife in such a brutal manner that she died shortly afterwards. The prisoner and his wife, who was on the eve of her confinement, had a quarrel, arising from her coming home intoxicated. In the course of the dispute, the wife threw a pewter pot at the prisoner's head, upon which he turned upon her and gave a tremendous kick in the lower part of the abdomen, and she died in less than ten minutes of the hemorrhage. The prisoner, who appeared to be in great distress of mind when placed at the bar, was remanded.

PARIS, August 3.—The Toulon journals state that Admiral Hugon's squadron is again preparing for sea. It is taking in three months' provisions, and it is expected to sail in the course of next week. The new Transatlantic steamer Labrador is to be launched on Sunday next.

The Quotidienne states from Teeplitz, July 23, that the Duke of Bordeaux has derived great benefit from the waters of that place. We learn by the Tage, which has arrived at Havre from St. Petersburg, that the news of the death of the Duke of Orleans had produced a great sensation in that city.—Galignani's Messenger, August 5.

ELECTION OF M. SAUZET.—August 5.—M. Sauzet has been elected President of the Chamber. Before the first scrutiny the numbers were:—Sauzet, 210; Odilon Barrot, 131; Dufaure, 39; Dupin, 16; Berryer, 3. No candidate having the "absolute majority" required, a second scrutiny was proceeded with, when the ministerial candidate was elected by a majority of 25. This first defeat of the opposition is regarded in Paris as of considerable importance.

THE LATE DUKE OF ORLEANS.—The remains of the late Duke were interred at Dreux on Wednesday. The funeral ceremony was most imposing. The service lasted two hours and twenty minutes. Among the corps diplomatique was Lord Cianricarde, who had come from London expressly to assist at the funeral ceremony of his royal highness, who honoured him with his friendship.

SPAIN.—The Madrid journals of the 26th, with only one or two exceptions, censure in the strongest terms the conduct of General Zurbano in Catalonia, which they say is distinguished by barbarity and atrocity to all who are suspected of being enemies of the government.

Letters from Constantinople of the 13th ult., announce that the Schah of Persia was making preparations for a war against Turkey, and that one Persian force would march to Bagdad, and another to Erzeroom. A part of these troops were already on their way. The cause of quarrel is the disputed boundary line. Meanwhile the Turkish authorities have collected 3000 troops on the frontier, and all the disposable forces in Syria have been ordered to march on that quarter.

WESLEYAN CONFERENCE.

The annual conference of the Wesleyan Ministers being appointed to be held this year in London, the various committees, preparatory to the assembling of the conference itself, met for the transaction of the business entrusted to them.

On Friday, July 22nd, at nine o'clock, the committee of the schools at Kingswood and Woodhouse Grove assembled; and in the afternoon and evening of the same day, the committee of the contingent fund, that of the children's fund, and the education committee met according to appointment. The report of the education committee contained much interesting matter. From the returns received (though upwards of 80 circuits had omitted to report), it appears that there are in England 3393 Sunday schools, to which are attached 989 libraries, and in which 370,380 children receive instruction from 68,473 teachers. The increase in the number of scholars in the day-schools during the past year is 5469.

On Tuesday the 26th, the preachers and gentlemen invited to attend a special meeting of the missionary committee, with many country friends, assembled in the Centenary Hall, the Rev. James Dixon, president for the last year, in the chair.

The proceedings having been commenced with the usual religious exercises, the Rev. R. Newton introduced to the meeting the Rev. Dr. Soule, one of the bishops of the Methodists' Episcopal Church in the United States, and the Rev. Thomas Sargent, a member of the Baltimore conference, and travelling companion of the bishop.

The general minutes of the managing committee were read by the Rev. John Beecham, and the financial minutes by the Rev. Elijah Hoole. As usual, the details were interesting, and displayed great watchfulness and economy, on the part of the committee, in matters of expenditure.

Votes of thanks were presented to the Treasurers, Messrs. Farmer and Scott; and also to the Secretaries, Drs. Bunting and Alder, and the Rev. Messrs. Beecham and Hoole.

The Committee of the Theological Institution was then formed, and proceeded to business.

The Reports for the year were read by the Rev. William Barton, one of the Secretaries, and the statements of the governors, tutors, and examiners, afforded the most gratifying evidence of the religious character and intellectual progress of the students generally. The Financial Report was read by Thomas Farmer, Esq., the Treasurer, and showed that, in the item of Annual Subscriptions, there had been an advance from £1805 to £1921.

OPENING OF THE CONFERENCE.

At nine o'clock on Wednesday morning, July 27th, the preachers assembled in the City-road Chapel, to commence the business of the ninety-ninth Annual Conference.

The Rev. James Dixon having taken his place as president, gave out the hymn on the 444th page of the Wesleyan Hymn-book, beginning—"And are we yet alive?"—after which he called upon the Rev. George Marsden and the Rev. Robert Newton to engage in prayer.

The religious services being concluded, the names of the preachers constituting the legal conference were called over, and they took their places as usual, according to seniority. Inquiry was then made as to the vacancies in the legal hundred which had occurred during the year, by death or superannuation. These were found to be eight—six in England and two in Ireland, and they were filled up as follows:—the Rev. Messrs. William Evans, John Bustard, John Radford, George Cubitt, Thomas Garbutt, and Joseph Pretty were elected from the English ministers, and the Rev. Messrs. Robert Masaroon and William Crook, from Ireland.

After these preliminaries, the conference proceeded to the election of a president for the ensuing year. On the votes being taken, it was found that the choice had fallen upon Dr. Hannah, Theological Tutor in the Wesleyan Institution at Hoxton.

The Rev. Robert Newton was then, in the usual manner, elected to be the Secretary.

Both elections were duly confirmed by the legal hundred.

PORTRAIT OF DR. HANNAH.

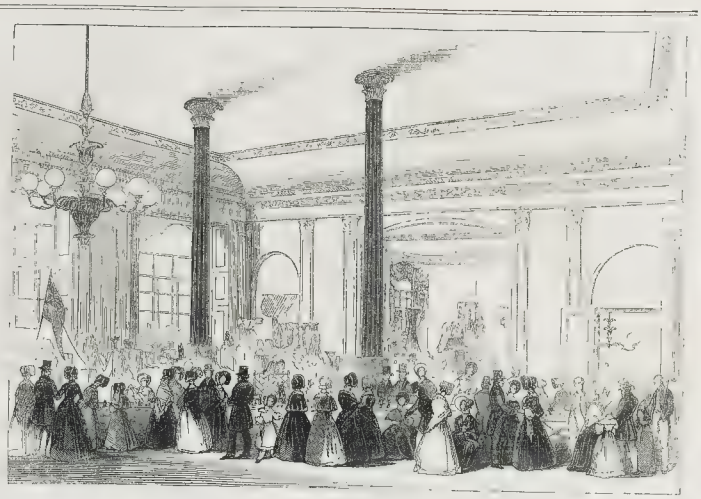
From twelve to one o'clock, there was a public prayer meeting in the conference chapel, which was very numerously attended; after which the business of the conference proceeded in the usual manner.

On the motion of the ex-president, the Rev. James Dixon, seconded by the Rev. Robert Newton, a dutiful and loyal address was voted to her Majesty the Queen, on her recent escape from assassination. Addresses on the same subject were also voted to Prince Albert and the Duchess of Kent.

On the motion of the Rev. George Marsden, seconded by the Rev. Richard Reece, the thanks of the conference were voted to the Rev. James Dixon, the ex-president, for the able and judicious manner in which he had discharged the duties of his office. The thanks of the conference were likewise given to the late secretary, to the sub-secretary, and to the journal secretary, and to the official letter-writers.

The Rev. Messrs. William Stuart, Thomas Waugh, and Fossey Teckaberry, were introduced to the conference by the Rev. Robert Newton, as the representatives of the Irish conference. He also stated that they were accompanied by "their old and valued friend, the Rev. William Ferguson." They were affectionately welcomed, in the name of the conference, by the president, to whom the Rev. Thomas Waugh replied, on behalf of himself and brethren. The address of the Irish to the British conference was then read. It was stated that the Wesleyan societies in Ireland had, during the year, lost no fewer than eight hundred and sixty-nine members by emigration; though these, it is hoped will be found to the general cause of Wesleyan Methodism, or at least, to that of a sound Protestant Christianity, in other parts of the world.

The Rev. John Scott and the Rev. Peter M'Owan were appointed as the committee to prepare an answer to this address, to be laid before the conference.



THE CONFERENCE.

The conference then proceeded to the usual business, according to the order observed in the questions and answers of the printed minutes; the first question being—"What preachers are this year admitted into full connexion with the conference?" The different districts were called over, and the names taken down. These inquiries—with what may be termed one or two intervening casualties—occupied the conference from Wednesday afternoon till the close of the Saturday's sitting.

In the course of Thursday, the Rev. Richard Reece introduced to the conference the Rev. Joshua Soule, D.D., one of the bishops of the Wesleyan Episcopal church in the United States, as representative of the general Wesleyan conference in America, together with his travelling companion, the Rev. Thomas Sargent. After Dr. Hannah had bid the bishop and his esteemed travelling companion welcome on behalf of the conference, as well as for himself, Bishop Soule spoke at some length, thanking the conference for the affectionate welcome which he had received, and giving a general statistical account of the Methodist Episcopal church in the United States, and also of their domestic and missionary operations. The conference was likewise briefly addressed by the Rev. Thomas Sargent.

The conference did not sit on Monday, in consequence of the public religious service held on the forenoon of that day in the City Road Chapel,—the preachers sitting in their usual places, and the remaining portions of that chapel being occupied by the very large congregation which attended. The ex-president (according to the regulation of a former conference) preached on the occasion. The public examination of the young men, of which we shall give some account next week, commenced in the evening.

On Tuesday morning, before the business of the day was commenced, the president was requested, by an unanimous vote, to publish the sermon which he preached at City Road Chapel on Sunday forenoon; the ex-president was, likewise, by a similar vote, requested to publish the one which he delivered on Monday.

The conference then entered upon the business which came next before it in point of order, and which is always felt by the assembled ministers to be one of a very melancholy interest. The question was—"What preachers have died since the last conference?" The names of the several districts being called over, it appeared that twenty-three have died in Great Britain, and eight upon foreign Missionary stations. The names of the twenty-three in Great Britain are these:—John Calladay, Donald M. R. Coghill, Joseph Collier, Jonathan Edmondson, sen., Nathaniel Elliott, Joseph Entwistle, sen., Thomas Furze, William Gilpin, Edmund Grindrod, Ellis Hall, John Henley, William Howarth, William Jones, Edward Milward, Charles Rawlins, Samuel Sewell, John Straw, John Taylor, Elias Thomas, John Walmsley, George Warren, John Wheelhouse, and Edward Wilson.

Those of the eight on the foreign stations were Charles Bates, Wilson Lofthouse, William Walden, John Cameron, William Redfern, Henry J. Wyatt, James Goodricke, and William Thackaray.

Of these ministers, the usual obituary memorials were furnished by their district committees for insertion in the Conference Journal. They will be found also in the "Annual Minutes" published immediately after conference.

This record of mortality being completed, the conference entered on the regular and annually-made inquiry touching the character of the ministers in connexion with it, or on trial for such connexion. For this purpose the name of every minister is read by the secretary, in relation to the question, found annually in the published minutes—"Are there any objections to any of our preachers?"—This examination was not concluded when the hour of adjournment arrived.

It has not often been our lot to record feelings of pleasure and gratification such as we experienced upon visiting the sale of ladies' work, and other articles, at the Centenary Hall, for the benefit of the Wesleyan missions, during the last few days. Our readers are doubtless aware that several Christian ladies, animated by a desire to promote the missionary cause, have been, for several months past, zealously devoting their time, money and influence, to procure articles for sale on this occasion. The sale commenced on Friday, and was continued on Saturday, Monday, and Tuesday. Our expectations, though raised beforehand to a high pitch, were more—far more—than realized. We never saw, upon any similar occasion, so many specimens of rare, useful, and beautiful workmanship, as were presented on visiting this scene of true zeal and benevolence. Nor can we refrain from expressing our entire and unqualified approbation of the courtesy and deportment displayed by the ladies who undertook the fatiguing task of presiding at the different stalls. The gentlemen assisting them were also exceedingly attentive and polite to the numerous customers.

Where all was excellent, and where even the most fastidious could find nothing to censure, it may appear invidious to select any stalls for particular notice; but, for the information of our country friends, we will mention those which to us appeared to furnish the 'most splendid and striking display. On entering the room the stall presided over by Mrs. Farmer and Mrs. Hall, struck our attention from the splendour and beautiful workmanship displayed in different articles, especially in those made of German wools.

Amongst others we noticed gold rings and necklaces from Ashantæ, valuable shells, a curious Chinese globe, cases of varied coloured butterflies, a variety of shells, &c. &c. In short, there seemed to be supplied, by the forethought of the ladies, everything which is required from infancy to old age. The following ladies also presided at tables:—Lady Ellis and Mrs. Elliott; Mrs. Keeling and Mrs. Urling; Mrs. W. H. Smith; Mrs. Osborn; Mrs. Thornton, Mrs. C. Harrison, and Mrs. Newstead; Mrs. Vanner and Mrs. Williams; Mrs. Day and Mrs. James; Mrs. R. Wood and Mrs. Hall; Mrs. Liggett and Mrs. Vaughan; Mrs. John Scott; Mrs. Jobson and Mrs. Farrar; Mrs. Perkins and Mrs. Jeremiah Smith; Mrs. Roupe; with several whose names we could not at the time learn.

We are exceedingly glad to announce that the receipts on Tuesday night amounted to fifteen hundred and sixty pounds.

This sale has excited extraordinary interest. We have conversed with many persons, who agree with us, that they have met with nothing equal to it. The rare and valuable curiosities from the stations of the Wesleyan Missionary Society have excited uncommon interest.

At the missionary table of Mrs. Bunting and Mrs. Beecham, great interest was excited by the exhibition of a rich gold and silver paper, a present from the King of Ashantee to the Wesleyan Missionary Committee, as an expression of his friendship and regard, which resembles one sent at the same time as a present from his Majesty to the Queen of England. We understand that the King expressed much gratification at the present of a splendid carriage (made by Mr. Sims, of Queen-street, and which, previous to leaving this country, received the approbation of her Majesty the Queen and Prince Albert), by the committee of the Wesleyan Missionary Society. It is especially gratifying to learn that the mission in Kumasi has been commenced under the most favourable auspices; the King having given land for the erection of a place of worship, and allowed a mission school to be established for the instruction of the people

THE CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. V.

ST. MARYLEBONE.

The parish of Marylebone is, perhaps, one of the most interesting in London, for a variety of reasons, some of them being very opposite ones. It grew out of the little village of Tyburn, a name that for a long period had an ominous and ugly sound; and contained the pleasure-garden and the place of punishment of the metropolis—the Tivoli and the Place de Grève of London. The Newgate novels of Mr. Harrison Ainsworth have done much to increase the stock of public knowledge as to both these peculiarities: "Jack Sheppard" ends his career at Tyburn; and in the "Miser's Daughter" (we believe) one of the scenes is laid in "Marybone Gardens." The site of these gardens was near the east end of the church, for several years they were much resorted to by the public, more generally perhaps than even Vauxhall in the hey-day of its prosperity; but brick and mortar have long since covered every vestige of the "gardens," which were suppressed in 1773. The present Bowling-green Alley was their southern boundary; and here it was that the "dukes," mentioned by Lady Wortley Montague, "at Marybone bowled time away."

This church is situated about three miles north-west of St. Paul's. It fronts York Gate, one of the entrances to Regent's Park, and is located so as to command ecclesiastical influence over an equally admixed congregation of rich and poor, although the former appears to predominate when we glance at the numerous assemblage within the walls of St. Marylebone on Sunday. Many of the nobility hold seats in this church.

The subject of our sketch is the new parish church. It was built by subscription, and was finished and consecrated on 4th February, 1817. The first incumbent was the Rev. Archdeacon Heslop. The Duke of Portland and Sir James Graham were first church-wardens. The building is a massy pile of weighty masonry. The principal front is graced with a square portico. This portico gives support to eight pillars of Corinthian mould, which bear a solid pediment without ornament. The roof, around the entire of the building, is edged with light balustrade, which imparts a singularly pleasing effect in the appearance of the whole structure. The tower, or steeple, is composed of a square base, containing the clock, supporting a turret encircled with light Corinthian columns, and bearing a number of sculptured figures, which support a dome surmounted with light stone-work and vane. The contract for building the church was at first restricted to £27,000; but, with sundry alterations and improvements on the original plan, it was ultimately finished at an expense of about £70,000. It is a chaste design; and the splendour of its masonic finish reflects great credit on the architect, Mr. Wade. The interior corresponds with the elegant outward appearance of the building. It is fitted up with two hanging galleries. A painting of "St. Joseph, with the Virgin and Child," is affixed to the wall above the altar. The side walls are adorned with marble tomb-pieces, upon which the names, and titles, and virtues of those whose remains are interred within the parish burying-ground are tastefully chiselled; armorial-bearings and other devices are likewise engraved on these sad records of the past. The inside building is lighted with gas lamps hanging from the galleries. The pulpit, towards the south end of the church, is a very handsome erection, supported on a square base, but without the usual appendage of upper or sounding-board. A fine estimate of the entire size of this church will be conveyed, when we inform our readers that it affords accommodation to 3000 sitters. The official labours of four clergymen are required—an evening lecturer, two curates, and rector. The present incumbent is the Rev. J. H. Spry, D.D.

BUCKINGHAM PALACE FROM THE PARK.

The palace of the good, and home of one
Whom England fondly to her bosom folds;
Her royal temple shining in the sun!
Rich casket that a richer treasure holds!

Home of her honoured Queen! who not alone
Sheds a sweet lustre thro' the happy place,
But with a group of loves around her throne,
Shares the dear life she only lives to grace!

A fair and princely husband at her side,
Gallant with buoyant youth—and near, apart,
Two spotless infants, pouring all the tide
Of childhood's love-lit joy upon her heart!

As there by devious paths fond people stray,
And thro' the green enclosures idly roam,
They lift up eyes of thought, and proudly say,
"That royal palace is an English home!"

And if it shrine a Queen, it shrines beside
Such sympathies as most do bless the cot;
Affections, all domestic, there abide,
And grace the grandeurs that impress the spot!

This is the spirit that all England loves—
This is the life that glad lens all her breast—
The influence of the heart, that gently proves
Its sweet dominion over all the rest!

And half the soul-wing'd prayers that reach the sky,
When the Queen's dwelling strikes the subject's view;—
Or breathed 'mid smiles, or hallow'd with a sigh,
Are given to bless the wife and mother too!

Wife, Mother, Queen! long may she know such tide
Of bliss as virtue unto peace imparts;
And her proud palace in its regal pride,
Be still the palace of her people's hearts!

LONDON FROM BUCKINGHAM PALACE.

Here from her dwelling turns our queenly flower,
A gaze upon the city of the world,
Where, in the pride of a majestic power,
The flag of commerce proudly waves unfurled!

Where there are stirring millions at their work
Like the hived bees:—where thought strides on by stealth,
And in whose bosom all the fountains lurk,
That spring unseen the rushing streams of wealth.

Where shines her Thames with silver wavelets curled,
Among its moving waters, bosom-spread
With ships and craft, the wings that sweep the world,
And bring back riches to its golden bed!

Where Pride sets up her temple, and the might
Of half a world of nations seems enshrined!
And Commerce fills her lap with mad delight,
And Pow'r with dreamy grandeur thralls the mind!

And this her throne, this wondrous city-home,
With all its million pulses of warm life,
O'er its far vastness her fair eyes may roam,
As on a queendom with her glory rife!

And will not thoughts spring up in her young soul,
That high philosophy should here inspire,
Thoughts that may well a monarch mind control,
And into Wisdom calm Ambition's fire!

Love thoughts, that, wond'ring, whisper to the heart,
This city and these millions—are they mine?
Then may I to their life a charm impart,
And sway them with an influence half divine!

Yes, Queen! when thy sweet eyes these treasures brim
With tearful pleasure,—and even love grows vain,
Go kneel alone with God, and pray to Him
To bless thy mighty people with thy reign!

GRAVE OF SIR WALTER SCOTT.—A correspondent of an Edinburgh paper who, the other day, paid a visit to the grave of the late Sir Walter Scott, at Dryburgh Abbey, expresses regret at not finding it marked out either by horizontal or head-stone, or any marking on the wall, to indicate the resting-place of the mortal remains of the great Magician of the North. Not even a turf is spread on his grave, or on that of his lady next to it.

The Duke of Bedford has disposed of Eaton, his Lordship's estate in Lincolnshire. Mr. John H. Day, of St. Neot's, is, we hear, the purchaser.

We regret to have to announce the death of Sir Thomas Dalrymple Hesketh, Bart., which took place at his seat, Rufford Hall, Lancashire, on Wednesday last. Sir Thomas was in his sixty-fifth year, and is succeeded in his title and estates by his eldest son by his first wife, now Sir Thomas Henry Hesketh.

His Excellency Edham Bey, Minister of Public Instruction to Mehemet Ali, and one of the most distinguished generals in the Egyptian army, is about to visit this country; indeed, his excellency's arrival is daily expected. We understand the object his excellency has in visiting this country is to thoroughly inspect the different systems adopted in our national institutions connected with literature and art.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

IMMENSE STEAM VESSEL.—The Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty have ordered Mr. Oliver Lang, master shipwright of the Woolwich Dockyard, to submit a plan of a steam-vessel of 1650 tons burden, and suitable for engines of 800 horse power, with a crew of 300 men. To convey some idea of the magnitude of a vessel of 1650 tons burden, propelled by engines of 800 horse power, it may be observed, that the largest first-class steam frigates at present in the British navy, the Geyser, Devastation, and several others, do not exceed about 1000 tons and 400 horse power, and that the Penelope, 42-gun frigate, at present being converted into a steam-vessel, by being lengthened 60 feet, will only be fitted with engines of 650 horse power. The steam-vessel ordered to be designed by Mr. Lang was, in addition to another steam-vessel of great dimensions, with engines of 800 horse power, named the Dragon, originally ordered to be built at Woolwich, but since countermanded for the purpose of being built at Sheerness, or Chatham.

PORTSMOUTH, July 30.—The Dragon, 72, at Milford, is in future to be called the Fame, a new steamer, to be named the Dragon, being ordered to be built. The Pique, 36, is being hurried for immediate service; and is reported ready on the 8th of August. We are sorry to hear that her esteemed captain, Henry Forbes, is obliged to resign the command of her, in consequence of the illness with which he was attacked in the West Indies. The Resistance trooper, Commander Patey, arrived this afternoon from Quebec, last from Cork, where she disembarked the 56th Regt., from Quebec. The Resistance will proceed again to Quebec, with the reserve battalion of the 71st Regiment, now stationed at Chichester. The Southampton, free trader for Calcutta, sailed yesterday morning; the Agincourt, for the same destination, will sail on Monday. The Moffat is at Spithead, taking in convicts for Van Diemen's Land. The ship George the Fourth is taking in 400 tons of bread, at Spithead, for China, with which she will proceed after landing the St. Helena Corps at that island.

By a Parliamentary return of all mates of the Royal Navy, it appears that the total number who have passed their examination for lieutenants, up to the 3rd March of the present year, is 387.

PLYMOUTH, July 31.—It would appear as if the Admiralty completed employing the 10-gun brigs again, as they have made inquiry as to the time it will take to give the following 12 a refit for immediate temporary service:—Alert, Star, Pandora, Delight, Hope, Lapwing, Lyra, Magnet, Pigeon, Sheldrake, Tyrian, and Seagull. These brigs were engaged in the packet service, and have been recently paid-off at this port, as the royal mail steamers have superseded them. The Wolf, 18, sloop, Commander O. J. Hayes, went out of harbour into the Sound yesterday; she will be paid advance of wages on Monday. The Spy, 3, brigantine, Lieut. Com. Raymond, came into harbour on Friday. Her defects will be made good by the 5th, when she will sail with supernumerary officers and men for the coast of Africa. The Adventure transport, Roskilly, Master, sailed yesterday with stores for Pembroke. The Hamoaze lighter, Tozer, Master, arrived here yesterday with old stores from Pembroke.

IN HARBOUR IN COMMISSION.—The Caledonia, 120, guard ship, flag of the Port Admiral Sir David Milne, G.C.B., Captain A Milne; the San Josef, 110, flag of Rear Admiral Sir S. Pym, K.C.B., Capt. F. Burgoyne; the Wellesley, 74, Capt. T. Maitland, to be paid off; the Spy, 3, Lieut. Com. Raymond; the Confiance, steam-tug; the Sylph, tender; and the Rochester, the Hamoaze, and the Camel, lighters.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

LIGHT FOR ALL NATIONS ON THE GOODWIN SANDS.—By a telegraphic report received on Saturday night at Watson's General Telegraph Office, information was forwarded that "the caisson lately placed on the Goodwin Sands, burst during the evening."

EXPECTED NEW BEACON IN THE PENTLAND FRITH.—THURSO, July 27.—The Skerry, of the Island of Stroma (Pentland Frith), has been surveyed, with the view to the erection thereon of a beacon.

CAUTION TO MARINERS.—SUNKEN ROCK OR WRECK.—The Pearl, from Nantes to Falmouth, was assisted into Scilly, and ran on the beach at St. Mary's, being very leaky, having struck on a sunken rock or wreck about fifty miles from Pamboeuf Hedle Island, bearing N. E. ¼ E., distant three miles.

FIRE AT SEA.—The Oriental, arrived at Buenos Ayres from Liverpool, took fire at sea from the spontaneous combustion of part of the cargo, and the remainder is supposed to be considerably damaged by the immense quantity of water poured into the hold to extinguish the fire.

NEW YORK, July 6.—The Jacob Pennel, from New Orleans to Rotterdam, put into Portland the 30th ult., very leaky, having struck on the bar below the former port, and must discharge. 13th.—A brig, mast gone, head off shore, and apparently a total wreck, was seen the 16th ult., 10 miles S. W. of Cape Hatteras. The Atlantic, from Digby to Boston, was lost near the mouth of Bear river.

ST. ANDREW'S, NEW BRUNSWICK, July 8.—The Ada, from St. Vincent's, got ashore at the Ledge, the 6th inst., and is expected to become a wreck.

ST. JOHN'S, NEW BRUNSWICK, July 16.—The Brutus, from Porto Rico to this port, was wrecked on Grand Manan during a fog, the 6th inst.; crew saved. The Isabella, from Halifax to Jamaica, was wrecked on Philip's reef, near Turk's Island, the 7th ult.; crew and cargo saved.

QUEBEC, July 9.—The Charlevoix, in proceeding down the river, got aground at Sorrel Mail, the passengers (taken off by the British American) arrived here.

WELLS, July 29.—The Rose, of Goole, from Folkstone, has been towed in here dismasted.

PENZANCE, July 27.—The Earl of Devon, sunk here, has been brought nearer the shore; at low water her deck can be seen.

LERWICK, July 24.—The Caledonia, of Kirkcaldy, has arrived from Greenland with 600 seals and 1 fish.

BERWICK, July 29.—The Rhine, from Leith to Rotterdam, has been assisted in here with loss of mainmasthead, topmasts, &c.

GIBRALTAR, July 21.—Her Majesty's steamer Geyser arrived here from Portsmouth, took fire the 18th, which was fortunately extinguished, and proceeded on the 19th for Malta.

DEAL, July 31.—The wreck of a ship about 500 tons, totally dismasted, apparently North American build, was passed the 24th inst., in lat. 51, long. 10, by the Anglesea, arrived in the Downs.

PLYMOUTH, July 30.—The Sarah (sloop), from Liverpool, with salt and flour, was lost last night on the rocks near the Stays. Crew saved.

LISBON, July 25.—The Amanda, from Girgenti to Havre, which put in here the 12th of April, leaky, and afterwards condemned, has been refitted, and is now ready to receive cargo.

CARTHAGENA, July 20.—The Thompson, from Barletta, put in here the 18th inst., leaky, and must discharge part of her cargo.

PROVINCIAL.

WHOLESALE FORCED MARRIAGES.—We understand the old and abominable system of joining together paupers in un-holy wedlock for parish purposes, which prevailed in some ill-managed districts previous to the passing of the New Poor Law Bill, has been revived at Bradford. On one occasion, within the last fortnight, five or six boys (they may very properly be called) and as many women, were driven to the parish church to be married, for the sole purpose of qualifying them to be sent to Australia; the object of this wholesale legal prostitution being to rid the parish of what is blasphemously called the surplus population.—Wilts Independent.

MATRIMONY AT MANCHESTER.—The distress of the town does not appear to throw any impediment in the way of persons entering into the holy state of matrimony, for on Sunday morning the officiating minister read upwards of 200 notices of banns of marriage at the Collegiate Church; and this independent of the numerous applications for the ceremony by licences at the other churches and dissenting congregations in the town, as well as at the superintendent registrar's office.

MOST DISTRESSING ACCIDENT AT SOUTHERN-DOWN.—On Thursday the 21st ultimo, two young ladies of the respective ages of fifteen and thirteen, only daughters of George Gethin, Esq., of Newport, while bathing in Dunraven-bay, ventured out too far, and being carried away by the strong current round that dangerous point called Trwyn-y-Witch, were unfortunately drowned. It would appear that the eldest, being nearest to the shore, on perceiving the imminent danger of her sister, rushed to her assistance, and becoming involved in the same vortex, met with a similar fate. Their mother, bathing also at the same time, witnessed the heart-reading scene; and, although at so short a distance, was unable to render her drowning children any aid, having, in her ineffectual efforts to rescue them, nearly lost her own life. Her sad shrieks, however, soon collected the few persons that were on the sands, and, among others, the distracted father, who, melancholy to relate, arrived at the spot only a few seconds after the disappearance of the last of his two children. Upon the mournful intelligence reaching Dunraven Castle, Lady Adare immediately sent off an express to Bridgend for a medical attendant, and appeared on the shore herself, directing all things necessary, such as blankets, cordials, &c., to be in readiness, in case they should be fortunate enough to recover either or both of the bodies. In about 45 minutes after their disappearance, the body of the eldest was observed washed up on a ledge of rock, and was instantly conveyed to the castle, when everything that human skill could suggest to restore suspended animation was resorted to under the immediate directions of medical aid, and the constant superintendence of Lady Adare, who for four hours persevered in her charitable efforts—but, alas! in vain—the fiat had gone forth, and the gentle spirit of an amiable and innocent girl had returned into the hands of him who gave it. Steps were afterwards taken, and persons appointed to watch the shore, when a party, under the guidance of the Rev. D. W. Jeffreys, curate of the parish, succeeded, between twelve and one o'clock on the following morning, in discovering the body of the youngest opposite the castle. On Friday morning an inquest was held on the bodies by W. Morgan, Esq., when the jury returned a verdict of "Accidentally drowned," suggesting, at the same time, that a notice-board should be erected warning strangers of the danger of bathing near the fatal spot, especially at low-water, the foreman, the Rev. D. W. Jeffreys, stating, that the Viscountess Adare had anticipated such a proposal, and had already given directions for this purpose.—Cambrian.

A USEFUL HINT.—BRIGHTON, August 1.—A curious announcement was yesterday made from one of our pulpits, and has been attended with some unpleasant consequences. At the close of his sermon at the Chapel Royal in the morning, the Rev. S. R. Drummond, the officiating minister, addressing his congregation, remarked, that although it might be considered a novelty for a clergyman to speak from the pulpit at the close of the service, he wished to tell them that there were now among the congregation two notorious pickpockets, and that it would, therefore, be well for them to be careful. Such an announcement coming from the pulpit, and just at a time when the town is full of that description of marauders, waiting to pick up the unwary at the coming races, created a sensation; and, as if by common consent, the eyes of the congregation were turned in the direction of a pew where sat two gentlemanly-dressed strangers, who had entered the church during the reading of the Litany. The two strangers on leaving the chapel were followed as far as Castle-square by a large portion of the congregation, when they asked the meaning of such an attendance, and were informed by one of the headboroughs, that they were suspected to be pickpockets. The gentlemen protested their respectability, which they offered to prove to any gentleman in the crowd who would accompany them. No one else coming forward to do so, the headborough got into the fly, which was driven to the house of a respectable lady resident in Brighton, who stated that the suspected pickpockets were the curate of Barton-on-Humber and a fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge, residing at Blackheath. We hear that the parties called upon the preacher in the afternoon, and that in consequence of his conduct being unsatisfactory to them, legal proceedings are to be at once commenced against him.

MEETING OF THE COLLIERS AT WESTBROMWICH.—Monday.—This morning the populous village of Westbromwich, situated about midway between Birmingham and Wolverhampton, was invaded by at least ten thousand persons connected with the coal and iron trades in the neighbouring districts. This immense concourse of persons met for the purpose of combining against the proposed reduction of wages, notice of which expired on Saturday; and it is a circumstance of a very singular nature that only about five masters out of fifty in this immediate locality have actually carried the proposal into execution. These men came principally from the neighbourhood of Walsall, Bilston, Dudley, and Wednesbury; but after coming to a series of resolutions, precisely similar to those agreed to by the colliers in South Staffordshire, they separated with perfect quietness. The military were turned in at ten o'clock, but the parade of strength and preparation had the happy effect of preserving tranquillity. Similar meetings will be held to-morrow, but nothing need be apprehended.

THE LATE LOSS OF LIFE NEAR CHATHAM.—Although several of her Majesty's ordinary boats have been searching the river Medway since Monday afternoon for the bodies of the six unfortunate persons belonging to the Shearwater, surveying-steamer, who, it will be recollected, were drowned by the overturning of a boat near Chatham, it was not till Sunday evening that any were discovered, when that of Mr. Thomas Carrol, the surgeon, was picked up within a short distance from where the melancholy occurrence took place. It was immediately taken ashore at Upnor together with another body, supposed to be one of the seamen, which was at the same time found by another of the boats, where they await an inquiry. Mr. Carrol has left a wife, residing at Harwich, to deplore his loss. They had only been married four months. The names of the other sufferers are David Edgar and William Marshall, quarter masters; Thomas Sparrow, boatswain's mate; Henry Kemp and Henry Bond, seamen. It is a singular fact that Lieut. Cudlip, who was the only one of the boat's crew that was saved, is the only surviving officer of the unfortunate ship Fairy, which foundered at sea during the dreadful storm in November 1840, he at that time having charge of the Fairy's tender, which outlived the hurricane. All the sufferers, excepting the deceased Bond, were married men, and have left children living at Harwich.

THE RAILWAY STATION AT WOLVERTON.—An entertainment was lately given to 236 of the children belonging to the day and Sunday schools connected with the great railway station at Wolverton, on the London and Birmingham Railway. After tea the children were examined in the presence of their parents, by the chaplain of the station, the Rev. G. Weight, M.A., in the scriptures, in the elements of Euclid, and other branches of knowledge, and numerous reward books were given for proficiency. The Episcopal chapel at the station having been found much too small, it has been determined that a church and parsonage-house shall be erected there, and about £3500 have already been subscribed or promised in aid of this object. Wolverton is the only railway station in England where any permanent provision is made for the moral instruction of the people.—Railway Times. [Are we to understand our contemporary that this institution is supported at the expense of the railway company? If so, we think it highly meritorious and worthy of more general adoption. But if the fact be that there is no other connexion between these schools and the railway than that they happen to be situated near one of the stations, then we regard it as a most egregious puff.]

SYMPTOMS OF IMPROVEMENT.—After the most severe and prolonged distress which this country has known in modern times, it gives us heartfelt satisfaction to see a few rays of light break in upon the gloom. The exhaustion of the resources of all classes will make any revival of trade both slow and precarious; and we see no reasonable ground for expecting durable prosperity until our manufacturers are put upon an equal footing as to the chief necessaries of life with their foreign rivals, whose goods are now competing with them in the principal markets of the world. But it is certain that the fearful stagnation of the last three or four months has been in some degree owing to the suspense about the tariff, and to the consequent locking-up of some considerable classes of foreign commodities in bond till the reduced duties came into operation. That event having taken place, sales of goods are resumed, and the seaports begin to display greater activity. The very favourable weather, also, not only cheers the spirits, but affords substantial ground for hoping that food may become cheaper and more abundant, in which case manufacturers and trade cannot fail to receive a stimulus. The markets of Liverpool and Manchester have experienced a decided improvement within the last fortnight. At Liverpool, where prices and operations are governed by the barometer more than by anything else, and where, as corn falls cotton rises, and vice versâ, there has been a material revival, both in the cotton market and in most other branches of trade. We wish it were in our power to state that an improvement was already manifest in the counties of the manufacturing districts of Yorkshire, but there appears to be no grounds for such an assertion. All we hear would lead to an opposite conclusion, and this is borne out by the reports of the state of trade during the week at the seats of our staple manufactures—except, perhaps at Bradford. At Derby the distress is unmitigated. The increased commercial transactions in the seaports may be expected, however, to act favourably on the manufacturing districts, and to relieve them in a portion, at least, of the depression which is at present almost overwhelming.—Leeds Mercury.

ACCIDENT TO THE ROYAL MAIL.—An accident, which might have been attended with very serious consequences, occurred on Tuesday last, as the south mail was preparing to start from the Queen's Head Inn, in this town, after having changed horses. It appears that one of the wheelers had been rubbing his head against the hook of the pole, when the rein was caught, and on the animal throwing up his head, it was drawn tight, which caused the whole to break off at a full gallop. The coachman, with the reins in hand, was just about to mount, and one of the stable boys had hold of the leaders. The latter was dragged a short distance, but succeeded in extricating himself; but the coachman hung on by the reins, and succeeded in keeping pace with, and directing the course of, the horses down Pilgrim-street, thus avoiding Moseley-street, and the precipitous hill of Dean-street. When opposite the "Fox and Lamb," the mail came in contact with an unyoked cart, which it threw over, but immediately afterwards its career was fortunately stopped by a large waggon, which was completely whirled about by the force of the concussion. The guard had previously attempted to check the progress of the horses by putting on the screw drag, but in doing so he was thrown with great violence from the coach, happily, however, without sustaining any serious injury. One passenger threw himself off on passing Messrs. Finlay and Charlton's, and also escaped the danger. The horses having been brought to a stand by the waggon, as above described, were instantly secured and removed from the coach. The passengers then alighted, and another coach having been procured, the luggage was transferred, and the mail proceeded.—Newcastle Journal.

NOTTINGHAM ELECTION.—Monday, August 1.—To-day the hum of war has been sounded through every nook and alley of the town. Mr. Sturge, Feargus O'Connor, Mr. West, of Macclesfield, Chartist lecturer for Derbyshire, and other leaders, arrived in Nottingham this morning, and addressed the committees. At one o'clock they addressed an immense concourse of people, from a waggon in the market-place, all of whom were most unanimous in their receival of the popular candidate. A numerous meeting is called for Wednesday night, at which delegates from all parts are to attend; 60,000 people are expected to be present.

MEETING OF MERCHANTS AND MANUFACTURERS OF MANCHESTER.—On Tuesday last, at three o'clock, a meeting of the merchants and manufacturers was held in the Town-hall, Manchester, to receive the report of the deputation appointed on the 19th ult. to wait upon ministers, and urge upon their notice the appalling distress which prevails in the manufacturing districts, and the necessity of adopting such legislative measures as may revive trade and give remunerative employment to the industrious classes. A platform, for the accommodation of the deputation, was erected at the Cross-street end of the centre compartment of the hall. At three o'clock the doors were thrown open, and in a few minutes the centre of the room was filled. Mr. Robert Gardner was called to the chair, and, having stated the objects of the meeting, he said Mr. Chappell, who had taken a lively interest in the proceedings of the deputation, would inform the meeting what they had done in London. Mr. Chappell then came forward, and was received with loud cheers. He addressed the meeting at great length, and detailed the proceedings of the deputation whilst in London, as did also several other members. A number of resolutions were adopted, and thanks having been given to the chairman, the meeting separated.

IRELAND.

Reprieve from Execution.—The town of Tullamoore was on Friday crowded by people from all the surrounding parts of the country to witness the execution of Walter Whelehan, for the inhuman murder of his wife. A reprieve having been received only in the morning, the police were actively engaged making the fact known; but it was not generally credited, and a considerable concourse remained nearly all day at the front of the gaol. The reprieve is only a temporary and brief postponement of his execution, issued in consequence of an error in the warrant to the Sheriff. The matter is under the consideration of the Lord Chancellor, and no doubt is entertained that a proper warrant for the execution of the culprit will be immediately issued, as there is not a single extenuating circumstance to be found in his favour Trial of Samuel Gray.—Samuel Gray was on Thursday tried at the Monaghan Assizes for feloniously firing at James Cunningham, with intent to murder him, at Ballibay, on the 26th of November, 1840. Sir Thomas Staples, Q.C., stated the case, and called several witnesses, who clearly deposed to the truth of the facts stated.—Mr. Whiteside (Queen's Counsel) addressed the jury for the prisoner, and after the examination of two witnesses for the defence, the trial was adjourned to next morning, when the trial was proceeded with, and lasted the entire day. The jury retired at eight o'clock in the evening. The jury was composed of about an equal number of Protestants and Roman Catholics, and, after having been locked up a considerable time, they were discharged without agreeing to a verdict.

Galway, July 29.—Judge Torrens left this morning for Dublin, having despatched the Crown business in the course of three days. The calendar was light, and some of the cases which it contained were postponed. A second edition of the duel farce was enacted in the prosecution of Mr. Lynch, who killed Mr. Kelly in an affair of honour, about a jockeying transaction, near Ballinasloe, last year. The seconds were indicted at the summer assizes last year before the Chief Baron; but all the witnesses produced on the part of the Crown declined, with one consent, to give any account of what they had seen, alleging that they did not choose to criminate themselves; and as the House of Lords had provided a screen for them by its decisions on Lord Cardigan's trial, the court was precluded from entering into any inquiry; and the prisoners were discharged from the dock. Yesterday Mr. Lynch, the principal in this affair, was arraigned, and, after a similar formality, pronounced to be not guilty.

Two young gentlemen named Blake, sons of a gentleman of consideration in the neighbourhood of Tuam, were arraigned on Friday, for having cut off the ears of a man who had been a servant in their father's family. They pleaded guilty, and were sentenced to be transported for fifteen years. This judgment has produced a great sensation, and no small degree of displeasure. The prosecutor has seduced a young woman, an illegitimate sister of the young men, for whom they entertained a great affection; and the fellow having abandoned her, to marry another, they took the law into their own hands, and "lynched" the offender in the manner described.

The Marchioness of Waterford has just gone abroad for the first time since the late severe accident. Lady Stuart de Rothesay and the Countess of Caledon, mother and aunt of the Marchioness, have taken their departure from Curraghmore.

Next year's meeting of the Royal Agricultural Society of Ireland will take place in Belfast. The society's revenue this year is £2000.

The Rev. Charles Butler Stevenson, Rector of Callem, Kilkenny, who lost his wife last week, by the upset of their carriage, was formerly lieutenant in the Royal Dragoons and Scots Greys, with the former of which he served at Waterloo.

A new and powerful steamer has just begun to ply between Liverpool and Londonderry. It is expected that she will perform the voyage in eighteen hours.

Extraordinary Case of Hydrophobia.—A fine bay saddle mare, belonging to a gentleman of this city, died of this shocking malady on Wednesday, in Dublin. She had been out as usual the day before, exercising in the Coburg-gardens, and there first evinced symptoms of sulk, and attempted to lie down, when the groom immediately rode her home. In the stall she appeared more uneasy still, tottering from side to side, and at last fell, but recovering herself, biting and snapping at every object. Mr. Watts, the eminent veterinary surgeon, was sent for promptly, and, on seeing her, pronounced that she had been bitten by a mad dog, and could not survive more than a day. Her mouth was then tied up to prevent the animal tearing herself and doing injury to all about her. The mare during the night struggled under the paroxysm of the disease to release herself, and became so furious that she dashed against the stable walls, and broke part of the timber work, foaming at the mouth, and cutting herself about the head and eyes by plunging against the enclosure in which she stood. Death at last closed the poor creature's sufferings. The mare had evinced a slight lameness in one foot, but no signs of a cut or bite there.—Limerick Chronicle.

THE THEATRES.

THEATRE ROYAL HAYMARKET.

Massinger's play of a New Way to Pay Old Debts, was represented on Monday evening. The Sir Giles Overreach of Phelps was a careful and judicious performance, particularly in the earlier scenes of the play. It was evident, that with a laudable attempt at originality, he avoided making those peculiar points which "the Kean" has rendered so familiar in the character; but he fully succeeded in pourtraying that intense selfishness, which, seeking its own aggrandisement, boldly breaks through all obstacles, and sets all laws, human and divine, at defiance. In the powerful delineation of the character, in the fifth act, he partially failed. We say partially, for, with a good conception, his acting of this difficult scene was marred by an over-anxiety to produce effect. Mr. Phelps has, naturally, an excellent voice, and is clear and distinct in his enunciation, but on the stage speaks in a deep and artificial tone, which, if sustained through a long play of five acts, weakens the voice so much that, when required for any extraordinary efforts, it fails. This was evident after the first outbreak of his violent resentment at Waldora. The line, "Were it in a church, by heaven and hell I'd do it," was given with a concentration of fixed malignity that was appalling; but when seeking the deed that was to make Wellborn "give himself the lie, the loud lie," he should have spoken in a self-satisfied and sarcastic manner, not vociferative.

The passage, commencing "Some undone widow sits upon my arm," was delivered with great beauty of expression; but the following line, "Ha, what are these?" should not be addressed to the characters on the stage. Stung with despair, and maddened at the frustration of his plots, he had here lost all consciousness of the presence and reality of his enemies, and his imagination peopling the void with strange fantastic shapes, he desperately battles with the horrid fiends that come "to scourge his ulcerous soul," and falls exhausted in the supernatural conflict.

Vining, in Wellborn, completely misunderstood the character throughout. Instead of the bold, reckless spendthrift, who is too proud to beg or borrow aid, he made him a whining fellow, that with his fortune had lost all spirit. Farren's Marall was a perfect embodiment of knavery and servility. It is a proof of exquisite art, when a character so thoroughly detestable, can be rendered in its delineation so highly entertaining.

NEW STRAND THEATRE.

One of the best and most appropriate burlettas, ever played in this little house, which, in itself, is a sort of "Punch's theatre," was produced on Monday night. It is a dramatic caricature humorously sketched, and capitally executed.

The bill deliverer of an exhibition of wax-work, obtains permission to show his sweetheart the figures at night after the company have left. She falls asleep in the room, wishing she could be a queen, if only for half an hour. The clock strikes twelve! "at that dread hour the figures are wont to walk" and talk. Her spirit has entered the figure of Queen Elizabeth, and her young man's that of Napoleon; a conversation ensues among these beings of waxen mould, full of excellent repartee and light sparkling jests. Bonaparte complains of being obliged always to wear his "grey great-coat and cocked-hat," even in the dog-days; Shakspeare of neglect; and Commissioner Lin of the barbarians, who devour "junks;" Queen Elizabeth, stretching her notions of prerogative rather too far, offends her companions and is unanimously turned out of the assembly—her rage and indignation burst the bonds of sleep—she wakes, and finds "'Twas but a dream."

The living representation of "wax-work" was admirably managed; and if we select Commissioner Lin for especial notice, it is because, on being wound up, he mechanically "nodded his head" with irresistible drollery. But the "model" for all lads of wax, or ladies either, that wish to act, was Mrs. Keeley. Excellent as all the figures appeared while stationary, they walked like beings of flesh and blood; not so Mrs. Keeley, she moved a thing of wax! as if her spirit was aware of the fragile nature of its tenement, and as she slowly and stiffly advanced to the front of the stage, we positively joined in her apprehension of the consequences of a fall! We hope, "speaking by the card," Wax Wonders may run all the summer—"equivocation would undo them."

VAUXHALL GARDENS.

We love a masquerade—it is an epitome of the world. We may shake hands with the Esquimaux, without the danger of losing our fingers, by exposure to the frost; stroll with an African, without dreading to encounter a lion or tiger in our path; smoke a hookah with a Turkish bashaw; and, stranger still, chat with the fair slaves of his harem without the risk of the bow-string or the sack! Of all places Vauxhall is the best adapted for such an entertainment. In a room, however ample its dimensions, the same characters, by continually passing and repassing, weary the eye, but in the gardens we see them now mingling in the dance, then dispersing, and again emerging from the trees, to listen to the concert. Instead of a heated atmosphere, we have the freshness of the summer breeze; and the countless stars that spangle the deep blue mirror of the sky seem the reflex of the glittering lamps that illuminate the scene. If tired of the glare of light and noise, you wish for change, turn into the walks. The fabulous garden of Aladdin here is realized! diamonds, emeralds, and rubies are sparkling on each bough, and their effulgence sheds a subdued light, in unison with your wishes. The first masquerade of the season was given on Wednesday last, and was well attended, about 4000 visitors being present. We suppose "rumours of wars" have created a martial spirit in our isle, military dresses being prevalent amongst the gentlemen. The ladies evinced a decidedly classical taste, by far the greater portion appearing in Greek attire—there was the usual sprinkling of gentle brigands, Christians, Jews, &c.

Some of the masqueraders appeared to labour rather more than could be conducive to their own enjoyment. "A Jack in the green," for instance, surrounded by active and untiring myrmidons, toiled and danced incessantly. A knight, cased in complete armour, far excelled all the heroes of the Odyssey, for he told us he had forged his arms himself. A drunken Bacchus, reeling about with an empty goblet, asked us to treat him to a pot of half-and-half; and there was a Jim Crow, continually wheeling about, with a face not masked, but positively blackened. We suspect these gentlemen must have been hired for the occasion. The illuminations were all in good taste; the fireworks, in theatrical parlance, "went off well;" and the fire-balloon ascended gracefully, with the pyrotechnic exhibition that was to accompany it, but soon went out of sight of the spectators in the garden, though it doubtless amused those who were in a better situation for viewing the explosion. Morning broke upon the revellers, to the great detriment of their gay appearance. We lingered with the last to gaze upon the view of Hamburgh at day-break, which, as the light gradually and partially revealed it, attained an appearance of reality, that amply compensated for the delay. It is a very fine work of art; and now it has been divested of the clumsy pantomime change, that was intended to represent the conflagration, presents an interesting view of the city previous to the unfortunate calamity.

Miss Adelaide Kemble.—We copied from a Glasgow paper a paragraph stating that the banns of marriage between M. Sartoris and Miss Adelaide Kemble had been published in that city. Now we believe to be the case; but a correspondent informs us that there is no truth in the report that the lady is a widow, having two children at Milan. She was engaged to be married to Signor Cartegenova, her instructor, but he died. Cartegenova was a bass singer, who paid this country a visit a few years back.

Purcell's King Arthur is to be brought out at Drury-lane Theatre, on a most extensive scale; the celebrated song, "Come, if you dare," is in that opera.

Rossini's Semiramide will be the first novelty at Covent-garden Theatre in the operatic way: the two principal parts will be supported by Miss Adelaide Kemble and Mrs. Alfred Shaw, who will sing the celebrated duet, "Eben a te ferisci," with the charming morceau "Giorno d'orrore." The English adaptation will be by Mr. Chorley, we believe. Benedict will be the musical director, and R. Hughes leader of the band.

LITERATURE.

THE MAGAZINES.

We are really in that perplexing state so strongly expressed by our neighbours the French, when they complain of the embarras de richesses. However, we must do our duty to our readers and magazine writers, by saying something of the various matters claiming the attention of criticism guided by candour, wherefore we shall leave our peculiar "faces and begin." First and foremost, we will bestow a well-deserved word on our Burlingtonian friend Bentley. This enterprising provider for the reading public has, among many other gems in verse and prose, advanced the banner of waving rhyme to the honour of Netley Abbey, under the name of Thomas Ingoldsby. This subject has been noticed by ourselves, and we are gratified by the circumstance, as proving how "great wits jump."

NETLEY ABBEY.

BY THOMAS INGOLDSBY, ESQ.

Perierunt etiam Ruinæ.
The very Ruins now are tiny.

I saw thee, Netley, as the sun
Across the western wave
Was sinking slow,
And a golden glow
To thy roofless towers he gave;
And the ivy sheen,
With its mantle of green,
That wrapt thy walls around,
Shone lovelily bright
In that glorious light,
And I felt 'twas holy ground.

On this holy ground we must leave our friend Ingoldsby, in the hope that no profane foot-fall will desecrate it. "Richard Savage" is carried on with undiminished spirit, and the "Visit to Malta," the "Night Cab," and the general arrangement, in short, will prove to every reader that this Magazine is much like Prince Albert, a "sterling halfcrown's worth" and no mistake.

Frazer.—The two articles to which we should most earnestly direct the attention of our readers in this periodical, are by the "eminent hand," Morgan Rattler. The one is entitled "Illustrations of Mirabeau, and the First Three Years of the French Revolution." The second, "The Italian Theatre, by an Old Hand." In these two papers, various in their subjects, the same energetic intellect is displayed, and withal that depth of tenderness, which is ever conducive to the possession of pre-eminent powers on the part of any writer. "Nimrod's Life and Times" is an article worthy of an attentive perusal. "Rushings" is full of fun—nor need we pass over a queer, rambling paper called "The way to set about it," in which Germany and the Germans are treated pretty much as they deserve. Altogether the number keeps up the old character of Regina, and more we need not say.

Ainsworth seems to be going a-head, as the Yankees have it; but we would submit to our curly-headed friend, that the "Miser's Daughter" is too liberally supplied with space. Half of the magazine is filled with the daughter of this miser. "Polly O'Brien," by that most beautiful of all beautiful women, Lady Harriette D'Orsay, is, as everything falling from her bewitching pen, every way worthy the approval of the judicious reader. John Oxenford has chosen a hero, in classical language, called "Nero." Laman Blanchard has gone down into the grave, under the title of "The General Cemetery at Kensal Green." As to Mrs. Gore abusing Lady Leveson Gower in the shape of verse, we can only say, that Wordsworth praised her ladyship infinitely better, when he described her as "A violet near a mossy stone,

Half hidden from the eye,
Fair as a star when only one
Is shining in the sky!

The "Vision of Coventry," only reminds one of "Peeping Tom," a gentleman immortalized for the fervour of his anticipations, which, though unrealized, were at all events worthy of a man of vast designs. If Mr. Francis Ainsworth can advance science, we shall be happy to celebrate him. At present we have only to say, that he is too good-natured to set the Thames on fire.

The Income Tax Act Epitomized and Simplified. Smith, Elder and Co., Cornhill.

Let there be a science to be learned, a sight to be seen, or even a new rule of etiquette to be acquired, numerous guides are sure to start up to point out the way by which all obstacles are to be overcome. Whether it is a pleasure to be pursued or an evil to be borne, they shake force upon us their individual notions as to how we should conduct ourselves during the period of our novitiate, but in the fruitful, and shortly to be, popular subject the Income Tax, but little of this sort of aid can be given. The difficulty cannot be conquered we must pay, and all that remains for our helpmate to do is to place before us, in a form that may be readily understood, an epitome of the leading features of the impost. Mr. Nicholson in his abridgment has shorn it of all legal technicalities—half an hour's study makes us as familiar with it as though we had lived under it in the "good old times when George the Third was King," and the best guarantee that he has done his work ably and with accuracy, is the fact of his being one of the Clerks to the Commissioners. It is a pamphlet with which every one liable to the impost should make themselves speedily acquainted.

The Principles of Physiology applied to the Preservation of Health, by Andrew Combe, M.D. Eleventh edition. London, Simpkin and Marshall.

That this valuable work has reached the eleventh edition is a sufficient indication of the estimation in which it is held. Until recently, all works on anatomy and physiology were looked upon by the public as either wholly useless to them or beyond their comprehension; whereas, it requires no very great expenditure of trouble to render these sciences easily acceptable to all. There is no subject which requires popularizing so much as anatomy, because it is one on which most people, though otherwise highly educated, are unpardonably ignorant. This is easily accounted for. There is no arcana to anatomy, which is the basis of all medical science, save through the dissecting-room. Now for all popular purposes, preparations in wax and other substances might be used. For many reasons, which we have not room to state, we can safely affirm that such a mode of learning anatomy and physiology would be resorted to by thousands. However, in the absence of these means, the public have just reason to feel grateful for this work. We give a short extract, and shall return to the work and the subject on which it treats.

"A damp locality or air is the most favourable to the absorbtion of hurtful external agents, because moisture affords a natural stimulus to the action of the absorbent vessels. Hence malaria is always most dangerous after sunset and during the night; and hence also, in some measure at least, the full watery lymphatic constitutions of the inhabitants of marshy and moist districts of country, and the prevalence of ague among them. On the same principle, the operation of dry heat in putting a stop to the diffusion of plague, fever, and dysentery, may be partially explained. The absence of moisture leaves the cutaneous absorbents inactive, while the heat increases the exhalation from the skin. For a similar reason, contagion is known to be more likely to take effect on a person who is fasting, than on one who is well fed; because, in the former state, the system craves for a supply, and all the absorbents are ready to act, while, in the latter, the exhalents are more stimulated. In the navy, this principle is recognised and acted upon by never exposing the crews in the morning to the dews and damps of warm climates until after they have breakfasted. In like manner, the alleged immunity from plague of oilmen and others, whose skins are more or less covered with oil or grease, may probably be accounted for by absorbtion being rendered more difficult."

HADDON HALL. By DOUGLAS MORRISON. H. Graves and Co., Pall-Mall.

This work is a noble contribution to the rich store of English engraving; it is also thoroughly English in its character, and is not the less interesting on that account. Haddon Hall, once the seat of the Vernons, is one of those fabrics, half castle, half mansion, which bear in their structure the indications of the different eras they have witnessed; the "battles, sieges, fortunes, they have passed," seem to be written in legible characters upon them, and the instructed eye can trace the portions founded in troubled and in peaceful times; parts partaking of a fort-like character, and those which show that security brought with it a sense of ease that could dispense with moat and drawbridge, and settle down into that stately and picturesque style, which distinguishes so many of the mansions coëval with Haddon Hall, and of which none present such fine examples as Haddon Hall itself. We highly approve of the idea that leads our artists to turn their attention to the past, with the view of affording gratification to the present generation, and directing the taste of those who are to succeed to it. We also like the sort of defiance it gives to Time, that old destroyer, who is nowhere more active than among such old mansions as Haddon Hall, which, being left all empty and tenantless, are going fast to decay. If we cannot preserve the edifices themselves from the common fate of all things, we can at least encourage the pencil of the artist in its task of preserving to us these faithful and elaborate sketches of their beauties in every possible variety. The halls and mansions of England contain a rich mine of that picturesque style of building, which more than any other is capable of affording materials for effective illustrations, even apart from the historical associations and romantic interest which are so often found linked with ruin, and going hand in hand with decay, but capable, from their less material nature, of surviving the destructive power of both. In Haddon Hall these sources of interest, the pictorial and the romantic, are joined to an eminent degree. It was the seat of a line celebrated for their ability, both in council and in the field, through the most eventful periods of our history; and their mansion, whose foundations go far back in the roll of centuries, speaks of many changes; the revolutions society has undergone since its foundation may be traced in different parts of the edifice. It has its "King John's Tower," its "Hall," its "Banqueting-room," its "Chapel, built "while yet the church was Rome's," and, lastly, its "Boudoir" and "Terrace." Through all these our artist has wandered with a quick eye, a discriminating taste, and, let us add, a skilful hand, for these splendid plates afford an ample proof of its ability:—and it has been tried in every possible manner, for the views present every variety, exterior and interior, architecture and landscape. It would be difficult to say in what he most excels, but our judgment inclines us to prefer his exteriors: he has a bold and vigorous pencil, which throws in effects in a masterly manner, and he seems to work in the true spirit of what Wordsworth calls "a dweller out of doors." The view of the hall from the stream below the walls is one of the best of the series. In the interiors, where all is architectural detail, we have imagined that sharper and more unbroken outlines might be an improvement, but we offer the opinion with diffidence, because we are aware that many artists would differ from it. We must not omit to point out one great merit in the views of the different apartments; that depressing air of neglect and decay which every long uninhabited building possesses has been faithfully preserved—for instance, in the view of the banqueting-room. While looking at it we instinctively know that, were we within its walls, the lines of Moore would become not only figuratively but literally true, and that we should—

> "feel like one
> Who treads alone
> Some banquet hall deserted,
> Whose lights have fled
> Whose garlands dead
> By all but me deserted."

We cannot go through the whole series of views, but earnestly recommend them to every patron of English art. The work is published in the most superb style, and is an unrivalled specimen of the perfection to which lithography is brought: high as the reputation of the publishers already stand, this work will add to it; there is no library in the kingdom to which it would not be a noble addition. We have selected one of the views, as an illustration, partly because it embodies one of the romantic incidents of the family history of the line to which the mansion belongs. The lady descending the staircase which leads to the gardens, is the heiress of the broad lands of the Vernons, who was wooed and won by a scion of the house of Manners, who, to obtain stolen interviews with his "ladye love," lurked in the neighbouring woods as an outlaw. It is doubtful whether the lady was at first aware of his name and rank; her lover might have said in the words of the old ballad—

> "A blithesome eye, a soldier's mien,
> A bonnet of the blue,
> A doublet of the Lincoln green,
> Were all of me you knew."

But however this might be, the lady took advantage of a grand entertainment, given in her father's mansion, to steal from the hall-room, descend the steps, as the reader sees, and elope with her lover; thus it was that the families of the Vernons and the Manners were united; and with this incident we must close our notice of Haddon Hall.

HADDON HALL.

THE NEW ROYAL EXCHANGE.

As one of the features of present interest in the City, we give a drawing of the new Royal Exchange, as now in progress; and we take the opportunity thus afforded us by the illustration to join in the general tone of dissatisfaction which prevades all the men of taste and judgment in the metropolis, upon the subject of this expensive but ill-considered erection. As it is not yet finished, however, we can only speak of it as a design—or rather of what is to be, according to the accepted plan of the ill-judging committee of taste, which consigned its architecture to the genius of Mr. Tite. Those who have watched the spirit in which competition for honours in art is generally projected and conducted in this country, must regret how completely the higher and more ennobled principles of design are ever more sacrificed to private considerations, or the influence of evil taste, and how sadly the "good personal" is allowed to predominate over the "good general." The progress of elevated art will never be, in this sense, more effectually checked than by the putting into practice the decision of the committee for the erection of the new Royal Exchange, a decision bestowed, as it appears to us, with uncultivated taste, an ignorant judgment, unfairness of principle, and a general absence of the valuable quality of common sense. We have seen three designs for the proposed building—one by Mr. Tite, one by Mr. Donaldson, and one by Mr. Cockerell. Mr. Tite is par excellence common councilman, a railroad architect and surveyor, a man of interest in the city, but no Sir Christopher Wren. His design is comparatively worthless, but it is accepted. We set his design as worthless comparatively—we mean comparatively with Mr. Donaldson's, only in the smallest and meanest degree of comparison—the comparison which pilfers, borrows, and imitates—steals what is grand only to despoil it of its grandeur, and deteriorates the genuine diamond into paste. Mr. Tite has managed such an achievement in regard to Mr. Donaldson—he has topped the art of disfiguration to prevent recognition—"and the gentleman would not know his own silver spoon." Mr. Donaldson's design is conceived in a purely classical spirit—it is plain, massive, ponderous, requiring much relief of ornamental figures—but it takes the air of ancient grandeur, and rises like a temple of stately solemnity, with the calm dignity of repose. Such may be a beautiful structure—it may recal the memories of the famous architecture of antiquity—it may wear a commanding aspect and a proud front, but it is not suited to the climate or habits of the place where it is supposed to stand. It has the drawback from all its merits as a design of singular inappropriateness—entire contradiction to the genius loci—and palpable contrast with the character of the institution it is intended to represent. But if Mr. Donaldson's classically-conceived edifice be open to this strong and insuperable objection, what must be thought of the taste of the committee in accepting the miserable abortion of it delivered by Mr. Tite? On the other hand, the third design, by Mr. Cockerell, seems almost perfect. It is a glorious elevation, presenting fine proportions, beautiful columns, rich and appropriate ornaments, and altogether a gorgeous and imposing front. It comes nearest, exactly up to our idea of what the richest commercial building of the richest commercial city in the world should be—it gives the double conception of wealth and grandeur, and harmonises admirably with surrounding edifices, neither unduly lowering the Mansion-house nor the Bank. Moreover, its interior design is spacious, appropriate, and finely conceived. It is the interior of the Palace of Dives—it looks like the hall and home of business and riches—and, while it seems to throw the shadow of gold from its walls, it retains the symbols of national greatness, and finds niches of memory for the forms of England's sculptured kings. In all senses the design of Mr. Cockerell seems admirable, and in none more than its combination of convenience with elegance, and appropriateness with taste.

It is possible that in some future engravings we may submit the designs of Messrs. Donaldson and Cockerell, to our readers, but in the meanwhile it is necessary to call attention to the sad affair which is now [illegible] a work of excellence which competed with it. Really it is seriously disgraceful to the City, and degrading to art in England in the nineteenth century, that we cannot have a characteristic national edifice in the heart of the City of London to represent the commerce, the wealth, the greatness, and the intelligence of so vast and glorious a metropolis

PRESENT STATE OF THE EXCHANGE

THE CHINESE COLLECTION, HYDE PARK CORNER

Upon the left-hand side of the inclined plane, extending from Hyde Park Corner to Knightsbridge, and toward the extremity of St. George's-place, a grotesque erection has lately sprung up with all the rapidity which distinguishes the building operations of the present day. As the work proceeded, many were the guesses at the purpose for which it was intended; and, to feed the suspense of the many thousands who daily pass this thoroughfare, the work was covered with canvas until just completed. The structure in question is the entrance to an extensive apartment filled with "curiosities of China." In design this entrance is characteristically Chinese, and is taken from the model of a summer residence now in the collection. It is of two stories, the veranda roof of the lower one being supported by vermilion-coloured columns, with pure white capitals, and over the doorway is inscribed, in Chinese characters, "Ten Thousand Chinese Things." Such summer-houses as the above are usual in the gardens of the wealthy, in the southern provinces of China, often standing in the midst of a sheet of water, and approached by bridges; and sometimes they have mother-of-pearl windows. Although the above building is raised from the pathway, whence it is approached by a flight of steps, it is somewhat squatly proportioned. But such is the character of Chinese buildings, so that when the Imperial Pekin-king saw a perspective view of a street in London, he observed, "that territory must be very small whose inhabitants were obliged to pile their houses to the clouds," and, in a poem on London, by a Chinese visitor, it is stated,—

"The houses are so lofty that you may pluck the stars."

The collection we are about cursorily to notice, has been formed by an American gentleman, Mr. Nathan Dunn, who resided in China for a period of twelve years, and experienced more courtesy from the Chinese than generally falls to the lot of foreigners. Mr. Dunn was, moreover, assisted in his labours by Howqua, Tingqua, and other Hong merchants of note; and who, in this instance, seemed to rise above the prejudices of their countrymen, in being most "willing to communicate." The design at first was merely to collect a few rare specimens for a private cabinet; but the appetite grew with what it fed upon, and thus Mr. Dunn has assembled what may, without exaggeration, be termed the Chinese world in miniature; and, it is equally true, that by means of this collection, we may, "in some sense, analyse the mental and moral qualities of the Chinese, and gather some knowledge of their idols, their temples, their pagodas, their bridges, their arts, their sciences, their manufactures, their trades, their fancies, their parlours, their drawing-rooms, their clothes, their finery, their ornaments, their weapons of war, their vessels, their dwellings, and the thousand et ceteras which make up their moving and living world." The beauty, rarity, novelty, and extreme singularity of these "curiosities" are very striking. A single article illustrates whole pages of written description. The visitor appears to have the living Chinese in the images before him; and, with a little imagination, to be moving and living among them. An hour passed among such curiosities will afford, even to the youthful, and to those who are careless of inquiry, a more definite and permanent idea of these Tartar-governed millions, than volumes of ordinary details. The eye and the mind are both enlightened at one and the same moment; and thus, as it frequently happens, an individual to whom it would be impossible to convey a notion of a certain machine or piece of fancy work by a written description, has a full and perfect impression of the entire object at a single glance. As a means of education, this enterprise is invaluable. It teaches by things rather than words. The images are visible and tangible, and therefore cannot be easily misunderstood. What immense labour, for example, and what intricate details, would be necessary to give an individual who had never seen such an invention, a correct idea of a ship in full sail. Yet, present the object to the eye, and a look would at once suffice to elicit admiration, and impart a more complete general knowledge, than page upon page of the most minute and elaborate composition. So with this collection. Here we have not one object, but thousands: not a single discovery, but an empire with all its variety of light and shade, its experience, its mind, and the results of both for four thousand years! So states the introduction to the catalogue, extending to 150 large pages, and the assertion is not overcharged.

The present collection has been already exhibited in Philadelphia, where it has been visited by hundreds of thousands of persons. Of the catalogue, upwards of 50,000 copies have been disposed of; and this popularity, backed by the suggestions of many influential scientific and learned persons, has induced Mr. Dunn to transport his collection to England, and to build purposely for its exhibition, the characteristic and commodious premises already mentioned.

Having been politely favoured with a ticket of admission, we chose a cool evening for our visit; and, after passing through a vestibule of extreme plainness (doubtless, to give better effect to the collection itself), we found ourselves in an apartment 225 feet in length, by 50 in width, with a lofty ceiling, supported by numerous columns; it is principally lit from above, through translucent blinds. On entering this saloon from one end, the effect is very striking, and you are almost bewildered with the vast assemblage of rare and well-work, elaborately carved and gilt, at either end of the apartment; the multiform and many-coloured lanterns suspended from the ceiling; the native paintings on the walls, the Chinese maxims on the columns and entablatures; the gaily-embroidered silks above cases (each the size of a large closet), and the ranges of smaller cases crowded with rare and interesting objects.

We commenced with a superb screen at the upper end of the saloon, presenting a vast surface of green and gold, and panels of silk paintings of flowers, ships, and boats, admirably drawn and coloured. The whole is surmounted by richly-carved and gilt fretwork, and strongly reminded us of the screens in some of our own magnificent halls of the time of Elizabeth or James I., but so illuminated with gold and brilliant colours, as to throw our decoration into the shade.

Next is a Temple and three colossal Idols, each 11 feet in height, representing "the three precious Buddhas," "past, present, and to come." Their holinesses are entirely gilt, so that they merit the epithet of precious in a secular as well as in a spiritual sense. Their habiliments are very grotesque, and the gilding has the richness of "an inch thick." The eight cases, or glass closets, occupy the side and the extreme end of the apartment; and within them are grouped certain figures, in proper costume, in apartments so accurately appointed as even to satisfy the recherché taste of Mrs. Charles Mathews herself. The figures we here mention are of life-size, and like ourselves, made of clay.

It is impossible within a newspaper limits to enter into the details of this extraordinary exhibition. The article we had ourselves written would, we find, be lengthy even for a monthly magazine; but its introduction is here given, accompanied by a spirited illustration, may well serve also as the introduction of our readers to the Pagoda itself.

THEATRICAL PORTRAITS.

MR. KEELEY AS THE CONJUROR OF CRIPPLEGATE.

Ha, ha, Keeley!—little Keeley!—dry Keeley—cunning Keeley!—Keeley anything!—Keeley everything!—what a boy you are!—what a broth of a boy—you have been the life of us—you will be the death of us—but who made you a magician? Keeley the conjuror! Well, it is as good an alliteration as "Cox, Kung, and Curtis" after all—but—Keeley the conjuror!! So, our hero has taken a dip into the magic art. He is not a Medici malgré lui, but a magician in spite of himself. He must be a magician—the farce in which he is playing says so—his wife says so—we say so—and, of course, a magician he is. Look at his wand—look at his traps and toggery—look at his quiet knowing look of conviction that he is well up to his business—look how his whole attitude is redolent of Keeley the conjuror, and nobody else in the world. But why should we dilate (we hope he may die late, by the way, or, as the Irishman paid his compliment, that "he may never die till he is fit to die, and then he will live for ever"),—why should we dilate upon his conjurations, when the world may go and witness them night after night at Mr Hall's little theatre in the Strand. And then, as for criticism or life-writing, or telling all about him—is he not known to every man-jack and child-jack, let alone the ladies, that ever poked his nose into the histrionic atmosphere of a theatre. Was he not one of the choicest spirits of the Olympic? One of the most demure of the comedy-wags of Covent Garden? One of the most illustrious but what was he not, that could ever bring the heart within the range of laughter, and make humour and quaintness the pungent nostrum of a roar? Then we know his nice little wife too, who Jack Sheppardized London, and has done everything else that all other kinds of cleverness could achieve. And they drive about together, and are known personally and popularly as well as on the stage; though it is not upon the stage that they drive, but in a nice little gig of their own, Keeley having wisely declared and proved it, that he always was fond of a bit of gig. So, amen, Keeley! but keep on flourishing like a schoolmaster, at the Strand, and from time to time we shall have a talk about you with our readers.

THEATRICALS IN THE UNITED STATES.—The engagement of Fanny Elssler, like all her engagements, has been a brilliant one. Everywhere the same—she has drawn crowded houses even in the midst of summer. She returns to Europe 100,000 dollars richer than she left it.—The Brahams are out west, delighting all who hear them, and reaping a rich harvest. Forest is also out west. When last heard from he was playing a brilliant engagement at Cincinnati. Mrs. Fitzwilliam and Buckstone have not yet reached the city. Brown, the celebrated light comedian, has returned, to the delight of his numerous admirers. Billy Williams is still a great favourite at the Park. Chippendale is managing Niblo's theatre with great skill. Miss Ayres is a great favourite at Niblo's; she looks as young as ever. New York Herald

SPORTING INTELLIGENCE.

THAMES ROYAL YACHT CLUB.

The closing sailing match of the season amongst yachts belonging to this distinguished club was decided on Tuesday. The contending yachts started at eleven on Monday, and after drifting to Erith, in the space of five hours, were obliged to turn back, their captains feeling that it would be impossible, against the tide, to arrive at the distance-buoy at Coal-house Point, before five o'clock, as required by the articles of the club. It was then determined that, in accordance with the rules, the match should be re-sailed on the following day (Tuesday). The owners were at their posts early, as the morning indicated but little more air than on the previous day; and as there had been no opportunity whatever of going through the necessary preparations for a steam-boat excursion, the commodore, W. Harrison, Esq., took his place in the Fortuna to witness the contest. At ten o'clock the boats were at their stations, the wind having freshened, and blowing from the east with a little of the south in it. The signal was given at a quarter past ten, and Messrs. Meesoms' Gnome, of 21 tons, and Mr. Gunston's Champion, of 25 tons, started, the distance being to Coal-house Point, and back to Greenwich. The Champion took the lead and held it, arriving first at the distance-buoy at three o'clock, the Gnome being eighteen minutes later. The Champion retained the lead, run up in gallant style, and arrived at Greenwich, fronting the Hospital, at a quarter to six, and the Gnome at six o'clock. The club then assembled at the Royal Yacht Tavern, when, after an excellent dinner, the handsome service of plate was presented to Mr. Gunston by the commodore.

THE CHAMPIONSHIP OF THE THAMES.

The great contest for the amateur championship of the Thames was rowed on Wednesday, under the disadvantage of such a late and unfavourable tide, as served to deter many from attending that which, amongst all others, could boast a superiority of company on former occasions. This, the silver sculls contest, amongst gentlemen amateurs, has been invariably looked upon as one of the greatest treats of the season, and some of the first gentlemen on the river have been candidates for the honorary distinction of holder of the prize. The race was first instituted in 1831, and the sculls have passed through the hands of men of first-rate power as scullers. Mr. Bayford first won them, then Mr. Lewis, next Mr. Julius, and then Mr. Lewis again. Mr. Julius was a second time the holder, and Mr. Wood, of the great Leander club, followed him. Mr. Colquhoun held for a season, and then Mr. Wood repeated his victory. In 1839 Mr. Wood, in a desire to encourage emulation in the science of sculling, resigned the prize, and, in a very fine race between Mr. Crockford, Mr. Pollock, and Mr. Chapman, the latter won. The challengers on this occasion were Mr. Wallace and Mr. Chapman; and, as both had exhibited power of no ordinary stamp, a first-rate struggle was expected. The tide was most unpropitious; indeed, to meet it even half-way the start ought to have been at nine at night; but, as rowing at that hour was out of the question, the gentlemen started at dusk, with just light enough to prevent the chance of accident, Mr. Wallace in a beautiful boat of Searle's, and his opponent in one built by Cownden and Weatznell. Mr. Wallace took the lead, and held it to the Horseferry, where his opponent came up and tried to get by. Off Nash's-pad, near the beacon at the Penitentiary, they were scull and scull, and both went within the road. Mr. Wallace again was in the course his opponent intended to take, and in the foul Mr. Chapman drew a stroke or two, and, the stem of his boat being on his adversary's quarter, Mr. Wallace's boat swamped, and he was taken on board the Leander. Mr. Chapman rowed on, and arrived at Putney at twenty minutes to nine. There were a great many club boats out.

DOGGETT'S COAT AND BADGE.

This very old-established wager, on which the popular musical farce of The Watermen is founded, took place on Monday. The following were the competitors

George Henry Ross . .	Greenwich.
John William Rugg . .	King Edward Stairs, Wapping.
George Edward Ross . .	Horseleydown.
Lewis Louis Shell . .	Tower.
James Liddy	Wandsworth.
William Meekiff	Horseferry, Westminster.

LIDDY, THE WINNER OF DOGGETT'S COAT AND BADGE.

Of these, Meekiff, who rowed in the wager for Lyon's sovereigns a month since, was the first favourite, and Liddy the second. At three o'clock, it wanting about ten minutes to flood, the men took their stations. A very good start took place, and, having proceeded nearly as far as Blackfriars-bridge, some fouling occurred, when a fresh start was demanded, and, accordingly, the boats again started,

THE ROWING MATCH.

Liddy taking the lead, followed by Sholl, Meekiff, Rugg, and Ross, in which order they proceeded as far as Chelsea College, when Meekiff shot ahead of Sholl and got into the second place, which he kept. Liddy came in first by two lengths only. This was said to be the best wager for the coat and badge seen for many years.

GREENWICH REGATTA.

The 65th annual regatta, under the patronage of her royal highness Princess Sophia Matilda, Earl Fitzhardinge, and Admiral Sir R. Stopford, took place on Monday. The day's sport was exceedingly attractive, the fineness of the weather inducing many respectable families from London to pay a visit by the numerous steamers that run the distance almost every ten minutes throughout the day. The first prize was a new boat, value £23; for the second man, £5; for the third, £2 10s.; for the fourth, £2; for the fifth, £1 10s.; and for the last, £1 5s.. It was a sculler's wager, with six free watermen of Greenwich, in five heats, and the following were the competitors:—

First Heat—James Hubbard, green; John Hogan, red; and Henry Ribbons, pink.

Second Heat—Theophilus Bagley, dark green; William Horn, yellow; and John Frenge, light blue.

Red won the first heat, dark green the second, light green and yellow the third, and light green and red the fourth. At half-past seven Hubbard and Hogan (green and red) started for the grand heat; green took the lead, but was cut out by red, who held the distance but a short time; green then again took it, and, after a sharp race, won by two lengths.

CRICKET.—GRAND MATCH BETWEEN KENT AND ENGLAND, AT CANTERBURY.

On Monday this grand match, which has created an interest in the circles of cricketing in all parts of the kingdom, commenced on the Beverley ground.

From an early hour the rattling of vehicles wending their way over the macadamised entrances to the old city was heard, and long before the hour of play commenced, the streets began to assume the appearance of a holiday.

The Beverley ground, at eleven o'clock, was made the rendezvous of visitors and cits. The ground was very tastefully laid out. The pavilion, in which a first-rate cold collation was spread, occupied the further part of the field, and on each side, in the form of a semicircle, were marquees, tents, benches, and accommodation of all kinds for the spectators. There were a considerable number of vehicles upon the ground.

Kent went in first, and Adams and W. Mynne, Esq., took the bats. After scoring 12, in which he made 1 four, 1 three, and 5 ones, Adams was caught by the Honourable F. Ponsonby. Hillier succeeded, and after adding three to the score, was stumped by Box. Pilch, the Kentish champion, then entered the lists, and maintained his station and his high character during the remainder of the day. At the close of the day's business, at seven o'clock, he had scored 92 runs, of which there were 1 five, 6 fours, 4 threes, 11 twos, and 35 single runs. Mr. W. Mynne increased the tally to 21, by 1 five, 1 four, 3 twos, and 6 ones, when he was caught by Box at the wicket. Mr. Felix then joined Pilch, and they played away in right good earnest, to the admiration of the surrounding throng, until the dinner hour arrived. At the conclusion of the repast they again took the bat with renewed vigour, and, despite the bowling of Lillywhite, Good, Dean, and Barker, kept the game alive until one of Lillywhite's slow balls was sent into the air from Felix's bat, and caught by Box, who carefully watched every movement of the bat. Felix went out with 74 runs, having made 6 fours, 3 threes, 3 twos, and 3s singles. A. Mynne, Esq., took Felix's place, and scored 16, in 2 fours, and 8 single runs—when time was called to close the sports. During the day were scored 6 byes, 3 wide, and 4 no balls—making a total on the first day of the astounding number of 237, and only 4 wickets down.

Upwards of 2000 persons were on the ground. The day was beautifully fine. Nearly 150 dined at the ordinary in the pavilion.

On Tuesday morning the remainder of the wickets fell for 40 runs, making the total 278. Pilch did not add one to his score of the previous day, being caught out by Dean. Mr. A. Mynne swelled his score to 27, when he was caught out. All England played the whole of Tuesday, and lost only two wickets, and their score stood at 126. Penner bowled by Hillier, 3; Box caught by Mr. A. Mynne, 22; Guy, not out, 34; Barker, not out, 53; byes 8, wide balls 8. Betting even. The game was resumed on Wednesday morning.

CRICKET.—THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

These contests, which take place annually, always occasion much stir and bustle at Lord's, and invariably excite considerable interest of a speculative nature among the aristocratic members of the Marylebone and other fashionable clubs, and also those noblemen and gentlemen who join in the varied diversions at this renowned sporting establishment, doubtless in consequence of most of them having been prepared for the Universities at these celebrated public schools, and also from their having played, when students, in these matches. The Wykehamites last season proved themselves the best players, beating the Etonians and Harrovians, the Etonians coming off second best, by defeating the Harrovians; but this year the result has been very different, the Harrovians having achieved a great triumph by winning both their matches with the Wykehamites and Etonians, the former also being defeated by the latter. The students of the three schools have this year good reason to be proud of their representatives, each 11 including some first-rate players, while others are most promising cricketers; and the improvement in their play since the last time they appeared at Lord's is very apparent, particularly among the Harrovians, who on this occasion had to contend with opponents much their superiors in point of height, weight, and physical power. The ground each day was most numerously and fashionably attended.

TATTERSALL'S.—MONDAY.—The settling for Goodwood drew a full attendance, and occupied nearly the whole of the afternoon. To all appearance it went off smoothly—that it did so in reality may be doubted, as several persons obtruded themselves into the ring during the races whose names and reputation are, to say the least of them, very questionable.

THE MOORS.—Notwithstanding the various favourable accounts of the moors from the north, we are enabled to state, that in the upper wards of Lanarkshire, Peebles-shire, and the South generally, the broods are by no means plentiful, and these small in number, varying from four to six birds in each. For the last three years in these districts, the grouse have been gradually diminishing. Various reasons have been assigned for this decrease; but we believe the late severe winters, together with the increasing practice of burning the heather, and the great number of ravens and other voracious birds now among the hills, will account for this falling off. In former years it was no uncommon thing for a good sportsman to bag 20 to 30 brace per day, for the first eight days of the season, but now he would have difficulty in bringing down eight or ten brace. For the last two seasons hares and partridges have been decidedly on the increase, but this is checked by the nefarious practice of poaching, by snaring and netting, now carried on. The present excellent weather, however, as regards grouse shooting, promises good sport under the above limitations.—Caledonian Mercury.

LINCOLN'S INN.—In consequence of the continual accession of members to Lincoln's Inn, the benchers of that ancient and learned society have resolved on building a new hall, and a contract has been entered into for that purpose. The site chosen is nearly the centre of the terrace on the westward side of the garden, overlooking Lincoln's Inn-fields. A council chamber and library are to be added to the new erection. The old hall will, it is presumed, be reserved for the use of the Lord Chancellor when sitting out of term, as hitherto. This society was established in 1310, and has ranked among its members many of the first luminaries of the law.

The favourable state of the foreign exchanges continued without material alteration upon the rates of Friday, but with rather an increased business.

THE UNIVERSITIES.

PREFERMENTS AND APPOINTMENTS.—The Rev. Archibald Campbell Tait, M.A., Fellow and Tutor of Balliol College, Oxford, was on Thursday last elected to the head mastership of Rugby School. The trustees present on the occasion were the Earl of Dunraven and Aylesford, Earl Howe, Sir G. Skipwith, Sir F. Lawley, Sir H. Halford, Sir G. Crewe, Mr. W. S. Duggale, M.P., Mr. E. J. Shirley, M.P., and Mr. Holbeche. The Rev. William Henry Brookfield, M.A., of Trinity College, Cambridge, late curate of St. James's, Piccadilly, has been elected assistant preacher at that church; he is also appointed to the incumbency of St. Luke's district church, Berwick-street, Oxford-street, on the nomination of the rector of the parish. The Rev. Richard Kirby, B.A., Scholar of St. John's College, Cambridge, and Bedford Exhibitioner, has been appointed second master of the Felsted Grammar School. The Rev. Henry Atkinson, A.B., assistant minister of Selby, has been elected master of Drax Grammar School by the trustees of Reed's charity, assembled on the occasion. We understand that the Rev. — Faithful, M.A., tutor to Lord Cranborne (eldest son of the Marquis of Salisbury), is to succeed to the vicarage of Cranbourne, Wilts, void by the resignation of the Rev. F. H. Pare. The Rev. Egremont Richardson, B.A, to the rectory of Oxcombe, Lincolnshire, vacant by the death of the Rev. Thomas Furners, M.A; patron, Benjamin Grant, Esq., Scamblesby Crove. The Rev. Robert Allen, M.A, of Westbourne, has been unanimously elected minister of St. Peter's Chapel, Emsworth, Sussex, void by the resignation of the Rev. D. Davies, D.D. The Rev. Robert Wilson Evans, B.D., senior fellow of the Trinity College, Cambridge, to the vicarage of Haversham, Westmoreland, vacant by the death of the Rev. G. Lawson. The Rev. Joseph Leeson, B.A., of Trinity College, Dublin, to be assistant curate to the parish of St. Giles, Durham.

OBITUARY.—At Farnham, the Rev. W. Hardis Lushington, third son of the Right Hon. S. R. Lushington, and rector of Eastling, in Kent. At the Vicarage, Stebbing, on the 23rd ult., the Rev. H. Sharpe Pocklington, vicar, aged 89. At the Rectory, Boxford, the Rev. John Wells, aged 72. The Rev. Joseph Goodenough, rector of Godmanstone, and perpetual curate of Nether Cerne.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

CONSISTORY COURT. WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 3.
(Before Dr. Lushington.)

PEMBERTON v. PEMBERTON.—THE INCOME-TAX.

This case has frequently been before the court. It was a suit instituted by the wife against the husband for a divorce on the ground of cruelty. A separation was pronounced for Mrs. Pemberton, with alimony.

The proctor for Mrs. Pemberton appeared this day, and stated that Mr. Pemberton had attended to pay the last quarter's alimony, deducting the amount demanded under the Income-Tax Act. He (the proctor for Mrs. Pemberton) submitted that his client was not chargeable with the income-tax. Mr. Pemberton stated that he had applied to the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon the subject, and the reply was that the amount ought to be deducted.—Dr. Lushington thought it very inconvenient that he had been called upon to give an opinion upon a question such as this, without having had notice of the application. He thought that an opportunity ought to be given for the court's attention hereafter being directed to it, and if Mrs. Pemberton was not liable to the deduction the amount must be repaid. The court was placed in an awkward position. The Vice-Chancellor of England had in a recent case observed, that three years was too short to decide the various difficulties that would arise out of the enforcement of the law. He would consider the point.

ASSIZE INTELLIGENCE.

OXFORD CIRCUIT—SHREWSBURY, JULY 29.
(Crown Court. — Before Lord Chief Justice Tindal.)

MANSLAUGHTER.—Isaac Cooper was indicted for the manslaughter of his brother, James Cooper, at Wellington, on the 22nd of May last.—Mr. Johnson Neale (instructed by Mr. Yardley) defended the prisoner.—It appeared that, until the day on which the melancholy occurrence which formed the subject of this prosecution took place, the prisoner and his deceased brother had always lived upon terms of the most perfect friendship, and had never even been known to have had a quarrel, or indeed an altercation of any kind, though they had always resided under the same roof. On the night of the 22nd of May, the deceased had been drinking with some friends in Wellington, and the prisoner, accompanied by a man of the name of Machin, had gone out in search of him for the purpose of bringing him home. They met him in New-street, and requested him to return with them, which he attempted to do, but being exceedingly drunk, he could only walk with difficulty; the prisoner, therefore, and Machin supported him between them, and had conveyed him some distance, when they came to a large shop, which the deceased expressed a wish to enter. The prisoner objected, and endeavoured to induce him to go home, upon which the deceased became extremely violent, and catching hold of the prisoner by the collar, and at the same time placing his leg behind him, threw him violently to the ground, falling heavily by his side. The prisoner lost the control of his temper upon this provocation, and when they rose a struggle took place, during which the deceased received a blow upon the right eye, which felled him to the pavement, and the back of his head falling upon the kerbstone, a wound was inflicted, causing concussion of the brain, and terminating, shortly after, the existence of the unfortunate man. After striking his brother the prisoner expressed the greatest contrition for his hasty conduct, and was the first to call in a medical man, but the deceased, after lingering for a week in a state of insensibility, expired.—Mr Yardley addressed the jury for the prisoner, and suggested that the untimely fate of the deceased might have arisen from his having slipped backwards, and struck his head against the ground, and that the inflammation was increased, if not produced, by the quantity of drink which the unfortunate man had taken.—The jury adopted the suggestion of the learned counsel, and acquitted the prisoner.

MIDLAND CIRCUIT.—LEICESTER, JULY 30.

Mr. Baron Parke arrived in this town late on Thursday evening, and immediately proceeded to the town and county halls and opened the commissions.

MURDER.—Charlotte Barnacle and Sarah Barnes were charged on the coroner's inquisition with the wilful murder of an elderly woman of the name of Waring.—Mr. Hildyard and Mr. Miller conducted the prosecution, and Mr. Mellor and Mr. Macauley the defence.—The prisoners were persons of prepossessing exterior, but for some time before the commission of the crime had to their charge, they had been leading dissolute lives. From the evidence of the surgeon, who made a post mortem examination of the body of the poor woman, he found appearances that denoted the presence of arsenic. The teapot of the deceased was analysed, and found to be impregnated with poison, as was also the kettle of the Barnes's. Evidence of the purchase of the arsenic by the prisoners was then given.—The great difficulty in the case was the absence of all apparent motive for the deed, unless it was on account of the fact that Barnacle, on the previous Sunday, had brought a man into the room, for which she was scolded very much by deceased.—The learned Judge (Mr. Justice Patteson) having summed up, the jury returned a verdict of guilty of, administering the arsenic, but not with intent to kill; whereupon the judge told them that was no verdict at all, they must either find them guilty of murder, of manslaughter, or not guilty. After consulting a short time further together, they returned a verdict of guilty of manslaughter, and the prisoners were sentenced to be transported for life.

William Vann was indicted for cutting and maiming his wife, with intent to kill. The prisoner, who has long been afflicted with paralysis, had for some time before the commission of the offence with which he was charged, been jealous of his wife. It appeared that on the evening before the morning of the day when the act was committed, the prosecutrix had gone out, and did not return until long after her husband had gone to bed. It further transpired that she had more money in her possession than he thought could be fairly accounted for, and high words arose between them, with some violence on his part, whereupon his wife quitted the bedroom, and laid herself down in what is termed the house place. About four in the morning she went up stairs to complete dressing herself, when her husband offered to assist her in buttoning her gown, and while pretending to do so he drew her down on the bed and cut her throat with a razor, and afterwards severely wounded himself. The woman got away as well as she was able, and gave an alarm; he was taken into custody. The prisoner was found guilty, and sentence of death recorded against him.

POLICE.

MANSION-HOUSE.—A man, who has been known sometimes by the name of Newry Knott, and sometimes by the name of Henry Nott, was brought before the Lord Mayor on Monday, charged with having defrauded several respectable tradesmen of property. The prisoner had taken the house No. 62, in Sun-street, Bishopsgate, and pretended to open an extensive business as a general and commercial agent, as his cards indicated, but the only business he transacted was that of ordering goods which were to be paid for upon delivery, receiving them at one door, humbugging the bearers of them, sending them out at another door, and turning them into money as soon as possible. Several of them gave evidence in support of the charge, after which the prisoner was remanded in order to afford others an opportunity of coming forward.

MARYLEBONE.—At an early hour on Monday the court was much crowded, in consequence of its having been the day appointed for the further examination of George Raymond Kelly, a self-styled Naval officer, who, on the previous Monday, was brought before the sitting magistrate, Mr. Rawlinson, on the charge of having, by false representations, obtained property of west-end tradesmen to a considerable amount.—A number of witnesses having been examined, the prisoner was fully committed to Newgate for trial on three distinct charges.

On Wednesday afternoon Mr. Harrison, a gentleman residing in the Edgware-road, attended at this court, and preferred the following atrocious cases:—Mr. Harrison stated that on the previous night, about ten o'clock, as his mother and sister were passing along Nutford-place, two females ran up to the latter, and asked her if she was aware of the condition of her dress? She replied that she was not, and placed on the back part thereof her hand, which she immediately drew away, and on looking at it, found it to be quite red, as if covered with blood. Being much alarmed, and imagining at the moment that there was something serious in the matter, she made all possible haste home, and, on taking off her black satin dress, discovered that the hinder part thereof had been completely destroyed by some burning liquid; her shoulder was also much burnt, and she was still under the hands of a medical gentleman named Edwards. Mr. Harrison further stated, that a short time ago a lady, living in Gloucester-place, was similarly injured in her person and attire by the like infamous conduct, and his principal object in coming before the magistrate was that the facts, as he had given them, might go forth to the public through the medium of the press, he being of opinion that publicity would be productive of much benefit. Mr. Harrison was about to enter into further particulars in reference to the cowardly and dastardly atrocities, when he was stopped by Mr. Rawlinson, who said, have you a charge to prefer against any one?—Mr. Harrison: I have not, Sir; but I thought that if the case were to appear in the papers the public might

Mr. Rawlinson: As you have no charge to make, I shall not hear any more. I don't sit here to make paragraphs for the newspapers; if publicity is your object you can write to them yourself.—Mr. Harrison: I have the dress here, Sir (untying a bundle), and you will perhaps be pleased to look at it.—The magistrate declined doing anything of the sort; upon which Mr. Harrison, who was evidently much astonished, and annoyed at the reception he had met with (considering, as he very properly did, that the offence, which the law looked upon as one of a very heinous description, was a matter in which the public was deeply interested), then quitted the court. He afterwards informed the reporters that Dr. Edwards had pronounced the deleterious liquid to be a mixture of vitriol and syrup of roses. The dress was of rich black satin, and that belonging to the other lady to whom he had alluded was black silk velvet; she (the latter lady) had offered a reward of £50 for the apprehension of the miscreant perpetrator of the outrage upon her; her person was also burnt, and she had been attended by the medical gentleman in question.

CLERKENWELL.—A gentleman named Cook, was charged with assaulting Henry Beshridge, a builder, living in the Paddington-road. The offence was admitted, but the defendant pleaded that he had received extreme provocation, and he called a witness who proved that the builder had applied to him the epithet of liar. He was fined 10s. After paying the money, the defendant requested to be furnished with a certificate of the judgment, as he was threatened with further proceedings.—Mr. Mallet, the clerk, said, if you are indicted, or an action is brought, then come here for a certificate, which will stop all proceedings. Mr. Greenwood (the magistrate). No, it will not, for according to a recent foolish decision of the Judges, it is now held that a certificate must be given instanter, therefore as I am asked for one I will of course grant it.—A certificate was accordingly filled up and handed to the defendant.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.—On Tuesday evening the police, under the direction of Superintendent Baker, obtained an entrance into a well-known gaming-house of the lower class, at No. 3, Castle-street, Leicester-square, and succeeded in capturing the principals, and about two dozen of the players.—The first charge was made against Wil-

lam Winter alias Mark Wincup, James Gregory, Anthony Joseph and Abraham Levy, as the parties concerned in carrying on and management of the gaming-hous

Mr. Robinson attended professionally on their behalf.—The parties examined in proof of the connexion of the four defendants with the business of the gaming table, were Superintendent Baker, Inspector Beresford, Sergeants Whall, Grey, Smith, Wells, and Chandler. Their evidence was to this effect:—Two housekeepers had made necessary affidavits before Mr. Harawick, the previous evening, upon the strength of which the police proceeded to the house Inspector Beresford and one or two sergeants, in plain clothes, watched the door of the house in Castle-street, and saw the defendant, Levy, acting as porter, by admitting persons who came to the door with a pass-key. In this way the police saw Levy admit about thirty persons. At ten o'clock the police made their attack by first seizing Levy, and possessing themselves of his pass-key. Inspector Beresford having by this means obtained admission into the house, proceeded up stairs into the playing-room, and immediately made a seizure on the bank, which, as may be expected from the wretched class of players and the poverty-stricken proprietors, did not amount to more than a few shillings. As soon as the alarm of the police was given, a scene that beggars description ensued. Each tried to make his escape by either jumping out of the windows or overpowering the constables by the sudden rush down stairs. The police, however, had taken their precautions too well, and were in too great force to be overpowered, and the result was, that, with the exception of one man, all persons on the premises were lodged in the station-house, together with all the materials for gaming—rakes, dice, cards, roulette tables, and bank. The evidence against Gregory was that he acknowledged himself to be the landlord of the house; the evidence of Josephs and Levy, was that they had acted as porters, and had pass-keys on them; and the evidence against Wincup was, that he was sitting behind the bank when the police entered, acting as principal. Mr. Robinson submitted that as far as Levy and Josephs were concerned they could not be charged as being engaged in the "conducting or managing the affairs of the gaming-house. Levy was only employed as porter, and Josephs had only a pass-key on him, which any one who was accustomed to frequent the house might have been accommodated with. Mr. Harawick was of opinion the objections were not valid. Though Levy had not been taken in the house, he had shown himself to be connected with the carrying on by the fact of his having let in numbers of players. With respect to Joseph enough had been produced in evidence to show that he was intimately connected with the gaming-house —In defence, Winter, or Wincup, said he never had anything to do with the gaming-houses. He got his living by selling ginger-beer and porter at races and fairs, as the police well knew. He had gone to No. 3, Castle-street, to look after a person who owed him a trifle, and was waiting there when the police came in.—Gregory said he rented the house, and he let out the rooms, but he knew nothing of the purpose to which the rooms on the first floor were applied.—Mr. Hardwick said the evidence satisfied him that all the defendants were implicated in maintaining and carrying on gaming-houses. He considered that a gaming-house of the low character of the one maintained by the defendants was one of the worst pests of society, and he should, as far as was in his power, help to suppress them by putting the law in force against all convicted upon evidence as conclusive as that produced in the case before him. Gregory to be fined £50, or four months' imprisonment; Wincup £25, or three months' imprisonment; and Levy and Josephs £15 each, or two months' imprisonment. The players were then put to the bar in batches of half-a-dozen each. If their excuses were true, they were a collection of very unlucky individuals, almost all having come to the house for any purpose except to play. John Picard, Italian refugee, had gone to look for a friend. George Barney, living at 97, Long Acre had been sent by his master to collect a debt, and was told he would find the creditor at the house in Castle-street. John Langley, cabinet-maker, did not go to play. Pierre Dure had earned a few shillings by interpreting, and had been taken by the person who employed him, he said at the house in Castle-street, and there made excuses of a similar nature. All the defendants, with the exception of one, who was stated to be nearly blind, were fined 40s., or four-teen days' imprisonment. Pallachi was fined 20., or seven days.

LAMBETH-STREET.—After the night charges had been disposed of on Tuesday, Mrs. Susan Lea, the wife of a wealthy Jew in Rosemary-lane, was placed at the bar before Mr. Norton on a charge of purchasing a gold watch, of the value of ten guineas, for thirty shillings, well knowing it to have been stolen. Elizabeth Connor was also charged with disposing of the property. From the evidence previously adduced, it appeared that on the evening of Wednesday last, Miss Stallybrass, the daughter of the Rev. Mr. Stallybrass, a dissenting minister residing at Stepney, had the watch in question stolen from her side, on her way from Denmark-street, Ratcliffe-highway, to her father's residence, and on the following day bills were circulated offering a reward of two pounds for its recovery. On Friday morning a young man named M'Carthy called on Mr. Stallybrass, and informed him that the watch had been purchased by Mrs. Lea, from two women for 30s. The prosecutor, accompanied by his brother-in-law, the Rev. Mr. Prout, proceeded to the shop of Mrs. Lea, and on seeing her and challenging her with purchasing the watch, she positively denied all knowledge of it. On being told, however, that there was abundant proof she had purchased the property, she changed colour, became much confused, and said she had lent 30s. upon the watch to two women, who said they had found it, brought it down stairs, and delivered it up to the parties. The rev. gentlemen, however, feeling it to be their duty to have the case inquired into, gave the prisoner into custody. Since the first examination, the man, M'Carthy, has absconded, and though the police have been on the look out for him, they have not succeeded in tracing him out. Mr. Hunt, who attended on the part of Mrs. Lea, submitted that there was no evidence to justify the committal of his client, and offered to submit her as a witness. This offer caused some surprise, as the offence previously made was that no offence had been committed, that two females had picked up the lost watch in the Commercial-road, and carried it to Mrs. Lea, who had merely advanced them 30s. upon it, until a reward for its recovery was offered. Mr. Norton remarked upon the fact of the prisoner Lea having in the first instance denied all knowledge of it until she had been told that there was sufficient proof of the fact of her having purchased it on the day before, and her then giving it up. He also said that the fact of Mrs. Lea giving up the watch to the prosecutor without saying a syllable about the thirty shillings she had paid for it, or the two pounds offered a reward, but, on the contrary, requesting the prosecutor not to give her into custody, was, to say the least of it, exceedingly suspicious, and he did not think he should be discharging his duty towards the public if he did not send the case before a jury. Both the prisoners were then committed for trial.

UNION-HALL.—On Tuesday George Clarke, an engineer, employed at Messrs. Maudsley's manufactory, in the Westminster-road, was brought before Mr. Cottingham for a violent assault on his wife, under the following aggravated circumstances.—From the evidence of Gatley, a policeman of the L division, it appeared that on the preceding night at a late hour, a female was given into his custody by a gentleman who prevented her from precipitating herself off the battlements of Waterloo-bridge into the river. When the woman was questioned as to the cause of her having attempted suicide, she said that her name was Clarke, that she lived in Gloucester-street, Westminster-road, and that the brutal treatment she experienced from her husband (the defendant), to whom she had been married only nine months, had such an effect upon her mind as to prompt her to put a period to such a miserable existence. Upon hearing her statement the inspector on duty at the station-house sent for the husband in order to apprise him of the condition in which his wife then was, but he did not return home until two o'clock in the morning; and when the circumstance was communicated to him he did not express the slightest regret, and it was with difficulty that he even could be prevailed upon to proceed to the station-house to fetch her home. On the way to their lodgings the defendant was heard to abuse the unfortunate woman, and when they arrived at the door, and were about to enter the house, he struck her a violent blow on the side of the head, which he cut, and from which the blood poured down her clothes. The policeman who witnessed the brutality of the man immediately went up and took him to the station-house. It was stated that although the defendant's wife was so shamefully treated by him, yet she refused to come forward in order to save him from the punishment he so justly merited.—Mr. Cottingham said, that the conduct of the defendant presented one of the rarest specimens of brutality ever brought before him—that of a man married to a wife only nine months, beating her to such a degree as to make her attempt suicide; and when she was prevented from carrying it into effect, and saved by the interposition of Providence, then, even under such circumstances, repeating his brutal behaviour; it was a foolish excess of affection that prevented a woman from coming forward and giving her testimony of the gross misconduct of such a husband.—The defendant said that his wife was in the habit of drinking, and that it was to correct that propensity he was compelled to have recourse to harsh measures with her.—The policeman stated, that the defendant's wife exhibited marks of severe punishment, and that her body and legs were bruised and swollen from the effects of the beatings and kickings which were inflicted by her husband.—Mr. Cottingham having made some strong observations on the brutal disposition evinced by the defendant, suggested that the wife had not come forward, or he should certainly send such a case before a jury, as he considered a summary punishment was inadequate for such an offence. As, however, she refused to attend, he should inflict a fine of £5 on the defendant, the highest the law empowered him, and in default of payment he should stand committed for two months to gaol.—The defendant was accordingly committed.

CORONERS' INQUESTS.

DISTRESSING SUICIDES.—Two inquests were held on Saturday afternoon, before Mr. Carter, the coroner for Surrey, at the Hero of Waterloo, in the Waterloo-road. The first inquiry gone into related to Mr. Nathan Wood, aged 43, an extensive and respectable livery stable keeper, residing in Duke-street, Stamford-street, who was found on Thursday morning suspended from a beam in his stables. The deceased, it appeared, took great interest in the movements of the "turf," and was well known in the sporting circles. He invariably staked large sums upon the races, and he had several heavy bets pending on the Goodwood races. The horse he backed was beaten, and this seemed to affect his mind. On Wednesday he was in company with Mr. Worley, a baker, and had some half-and-half and brandy and water with that tradesman. He then complained of some losses he had sustained; and upon Mr. Worley asking him if he had been successful with the races, he replied, "Oh, no, it—is it, quite the reverse; and, with other matters. I don't know what the devil I shall do." He appeared very melancholy, but, upon being spoken to the same evening by his wife, he observed, "I have lost a great deal of money, but never mind, I dare say I shall recover it all again." The next morning he was found, as already stated, by George Grove, a stableman, at six o'clock, and Mr. Sewell, a surgeon of Lambeth Marsh, was called in, but his aid was unavailing, life being quite extinct. The deceased was a veterinary surgeon, as well as a livery-stable keeper, and was in other respects in comfortable circumstances. Evidence having been given of the unsound state of his mind, the jury returned a verdict of "Temporary insanity."—The second inquest was taken on the body of George Darville, an ostler, aged 54, in the employ of Mr. Standen, a livery-stable keeper, of Wilham-street, New-cut, Lambeth. In consequence of the deceased's intemperate habits, his wife, an old woman, eloped with a sugar-baker, residing in the borough, and this so deeply affected him that he got exceedingly drunk for three nights, and on Wednesday he was taken home by police-constable Hosre, L 92, and the next morning he was discovered hanging in the stable. The jury returned a verdict to the same effect in this instance as they did in the preceding one.

THE LATE LOSS OF LIFE NEAR CHATHAM.—On Monday afternoon an inquiry, which had been adjourned from Saturday, was resumed by Mr. Lewis, the coroner, in the Guildhall, Rochester, on the bodies of Mr. Thomas Correll, surgeon, David Edger, quartermaster, William Marshall, quartermaster, Henry Kemp and Stephen Bond, seamen, all of whom belonged to her Majesty's surveying steamer, Shearwater, who lost their lives on Monday week last, on the river Medway, by the upsetting of a boat near Chatham. The jury returned a verdict of "Found drowned."

Spohr's new oratorio, The Fall of Babylon, was rehearsed at the Hanover Rooms last week, preparatory to its performance at the Norwich Festival, next month.

PROVINCIAL FESTIVALS.—There will be five music meetings in the autumn—first as Preston, during the Guild, early in September; then at Norwich, which will be followed by the Worcester, then Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and early in October, at Reading. The grand music hall at Liverpool has been commenced, but it will not be opened until the autumn of 1844.

THE BRIDGES TOLL FREE.—In consequence of the committee on metropolitan improvements having recommended Vauxhall Bridge, and Southwark bridges to be thrown open to the public, the government intends, next session, to introduce a bill to purchase the vested interest of the shareholders with the unclaimed dividends.—Morning Herald.

The questions as to the weight of sovereigns when tendered in payment, and the difficulty of obtaining silver in exchange, now appear to be quite forgotten. It would seem that the greater portion of the light coin has been removed from circulation, and it is almost a rarity to find a piece below the standard. The means adopted by the Bank of England to procure a necessary supply of silver, which is only to be viewed as a gratuitous act for the benefit of the public, and the amount which having been hoarded, and now has been brought out precludes any probability of a scarcity of the latter metal. Although these facts are notorious, a party has the modesty to put forth an announcement that country bankers and others can be supplied with any quantity of silver money at a moderate premium, by application, &c.

A SEASONABLE HINT TO THOSE LADIES WHO CANNOT GO OUT OF TOWN.—(From a correspondent.)—Pursue the same system as if you were at a fashionable summer residence or watering place. Rise early, breakfast soon after—stroll into the fields (if near), if not, the parks, your book or work with you—enjoy the fresh air the whole or part of the day as the weather permits. Returning, you will prove the enjoyment of your own house in lieu of, perhaps, a small uncomfortable lodging, and, I will venture to predict, with quite as good an appetite for your dinner as in the country. It is often the fear of appearing indolent that restrains females from such a course. I except those who are really so, and must have some excitement to provoke a "lazy circulation of the blood," who could not be prevailed on to take a walk unless some hundreds congregated near the sea-side or promenade to partake the same dull routine of pleasure—to such I say go, by all or any means. But to those who really value their domestic happiness, and consider the saving of ten or twenty pounds, as the case may be—the confusion necessarily caused at home by their absence, that home it is their pride to illumine by their smiles. I tell them plainly indolence will not attach her name to such—but will give place to activity, health, and economy.

SHORT SIGHT.—Those who are engaged in occupations which require the long-continued employment of the eyes on minute objects, are more apt to become near-sighted than those who are not thus employed. Mr. Lawrence attended a book-sale, and found that out of twenty-three persons who were present, twelve of the number wore glasses. Like several other affections of the eye, myopia is sometimes hereditary; the children of short-sighted parents being more apt than others to be affected with the disease. All minute occupations, such as sewing, long-continued reading, &c., should be abandoned; the head should be kept erect; the coverings of the neck should be loose; and straining of every kind should be avoided, to prevent increase of congestion. Mild unirritating diet, pure air, active exercise, and the practice of looking at distant objects in the open country, will be found very beneficial.—Medical Times.

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE COURT ARCHITECT'S DAUGHTER, DOROTHEA.—The manner in which I became acquainted with the Speck family, was a good joke against me at the time, and I did not like then to have it known, but now it may as well come out at once. Speck, as every body knows, lives in the market-place, opposite his grand work of art—the town-pump, or fountain. I bought a large sheet of paper, and having a knack at drawing, sat down, with the greatest gravity, before the pump, and sketched it for several hours. I knew it would bring out old Speck to see. At first he contented himself by flattening his nose against the window-glasses of his study, and looking what the Englander was about. Then he put on his grey cap with the huge green shade, and sauntered to the door; then he walked round me, and formed one of a band of street-idlers who were looking on; then at last he could restrain himself no more, but pulling off his cap, with a low bow, began to discourse upon arts, and architecture in particular. "It is curious," says he, "that you have taken the same view of which a print has been engraved." "That is extraordinary," says I, (though it wasn't, for I had traced my drawing at a window off the very print in question). I added that I was like all the world, immensely struck by the beauty of the of the edifice; heard of it at Rome, where it was considered to be superior to any of the celebrated fountains in that capital of the fine arts; finally, that if, perhaps, the celebrated fountain of Aldgate, in London might compare with it, Kalbsbraten building, except in that case, was incomparable. My operations on old Speck were so conducted, that in a quarter of an hour I had elicited from him an invitation to go over the town with him, and see its architectural beauties. So we walked through the huge half-furnished chambers of the palace, we panted up the copper pinnacle of the church tower, we went to see the Museum and Gymnasium, and coming back into the market-place again, what could the Hof-architect do but offer me a glass of wine and a seat in his house? He introduced me to his gattin, his Leocadia (the fat woman in blue), "as a young world-observer, and worthy artfriend, a young scion of British Art, who had come to refresh himself at the urquelleos of his race, and see his brethren of the great family of Hermann." I saw instantly that the old fellow was of a romantic turn, from his rhodomontade to his lady; nor was she a whit less so; nor was Dorothea less sentimental than her mamma. She knew everything regarding the literature of Albion, as she was pleased to call it; and asked me news of all the famous writers there. I told her that Miss Edgeworth was one of the loveliest young beauties at our court; I described to her Lady Morgan, herself as beautiful as the wild Irish girl she drew; I promised to give her a signature of Mrs. Hemans (which I wrote for her that very evening); and described a fox-hunt, at which I had seen Thomas Moore and Samuel Rogers, Esquires; and a boxing-match, in which the athletic author of Pelham was pitched against the hardy mountain-bard, Wordsworth. You see my education was not neglected, for though I have never read the works of the above-named ladies and gentlemen, yet I knew their names well enough.—Fitz-Boodle's Confessions.—Fraser's Mag.

THE FIRST WALTZ.—ITS AGONISING RESULT.—At the end of four weeks there was a grand ball at court in honour of H. H. the Prince of Dummerland and his princess, and then I determined I would come out in public. I dressed myself with unusual care and splendour. My hair was curled and my moustache dyed to a nicety. I stepped up to Dorothea. Heavens! how beautiful she looked! and how archly she smiled, as, with a thumping heart, I asked her hand for a waltz! She took her little mother-of-pearl dancing book—she wrote down my name with her pencil—we were engaged for the fourth waltz, and till then I left her to her other partners. Who says that this first waltz is not a nervous moment? I vow I was more excited than by any duel I ever fought. I would not dance any contre-danse or galop. I repeatedly went to the buffet and got glasses of punch (dear simple Germany! 'tis with rum-punch and egg-flip thy children strengthen themselves for the dance!)—I went into the ball-room and looked —the couples bounded before me, the music clashed and rung in my ears—all was fiery, feverish, indistinct. The gleaming white columns, the polished oaken floors in which the innumerable tapers were reflected—all together swam before my eyes, and I was in a pitch of madness almost when the fourth waltz at length came. "Will you dance with your sword on?" said the sweetest voice in the world. I blushed, and stammered, and trembled, as I laid down that weapon and my cap, and hark, the music began! Oh, how my hand trembled as I placed it round the waist of Dorothea! With my left hand I took her right—did she squeeze it? I think she did—to this day I think she did. Away we went; we tripped over the polished oak floor like two young fairies. "Courage, Monsieur, said she, with her sweet smile; then it was "Très bien, Monsieur!" then I heard the voices humming and buzzing about. "Il danse bien, l'Anglais!" "Me for, oui," says another. On we went, twirling and twisting, and turning and whirling; couple after couple dropped panting off. Little Klugenspohr himself was obliged to give in. All eyes were upon us—we were going round alone. Dorothea was almost exhausted, when * * * I have been sitting for two hours since I marked the asterisks, thinking—thinking. I have committed crimes in my life—who hasn't? But talk of remorse, what remorse is there like that which rushes up in a flood to my brain sometimes when I am alone, and causes me to blush when I'm a-bed in the dark? I fell, sir, on that infernal slippery floor. Down we came like shot; we rolled over and over in the midst of the ball-room, the music going ten miles an hour, 800 pair of eyes fixed upon us, a cursed shriek of laughter bursting out from all sides. Heavens! how clear I heard it, as we went on rolling and rolling! "My child! my Dorothea!" shrieked out Madame Speck, rushing forward, and as soon as she had breath to do so, Dorothea of course screamed too, then she fainted, then she was disentangled from out my spurs, and borne off by a bevy of tittering women. "Clumsy brute!" said Madame Speck, turning her fat back upon me. I remained upon my séant, wild, ghastly, looking about. It was all up with me—I knew it was. I wished I could have died there, and I wish so still. Klugenspohr married her, that is the long and short; but before that event I placed a sabre cut across the young scoundrel's nose, which destroyed his beauty for ever. O Dorothea! you can't forgive me—you oughtn't to forgive me; but I love you madly still.—Ibid.

"OLD MORTALITY."—The only occupation of the old man was wandering about the country, repairing the tomb-stones of the Covenanters, travelling from one churchyard to another, mounted on his old white pony, till he was found dead one day by the roadside. His family experienced a singular variety of fortune. One of his sons went to America, and settled at Baltimore, where he made a large fortune. He had a son who married an American lady, and the latter outliving her husband, became Marchioness of Wellesley! His daughter was married to Jerome Bonaparte, and after her separation from him, wedded Monsieur Serrurier, the French Consul at Baltimore. What would Old Mortality have said, as he pored among the neglected gravestones in Scotland, had he foreseen that the widow of his grandson was to become an English Marchioness, sister-in-law of the Duke of Wellington, and his grand-daughter, Queen of Westphalia, and sister-in-law of Napoleon!—Inverness Courier.

ANGLING.

To the Editor of the Illustrated London News.

THE CARP.

Now to our business let us once more bend,
Truce to all cares, one pleasing work attend.
I see the angler dip—he strains his line—
A carp!—the laurel of the day is mine

The carp is the most valuable of all fish for stocking ponds; and many of the lakes, ponds, &c., in this country, are well stocked with these fish. They are quick in growth, and spawn three or four times a year. The breeding of carp is more particularly cultivated in Germany; and they are said to have been introduced into England from Spain, in the year 1514, in the reign of King Henry VIII., which has given rise to that old English distich—

Hops, reformation, carp, and beer,
Came into England all in a year.

Sussex abounds more with this fish than any other place. Mr. Mascal, who is said to have brought them over, resided at Plumstead, in that county. They delight in ponds that have marly sides, clay ponds, sheltered from the winds, and having weeds and long grass about the edges, on which they feed in the hot months. The best season to fish for them is from April to July; and Walton says the tenth of April is reckoned by many a fatal day for carp. They are said to have lived in some instances to neh
